Unless legislation shall shortly be had which will enable the banks to issue currency at a fair profit, circulation will from the present time be reduced at the rate of at least $40,000,000 per annum.

There is, then, a contraction of the national-bank currency going on, and it is rapidly on the increase. We all know it. The country knows it; and there is danger that the pepole may soon feel it, if they are not now feeling it.

I am not an alarmist, nor do I forget that on October 1, 1884, we had in this country a total circulating medium of $1,806,412,324, and giving a per capita circulation of $17.41 in paper and $19.39 in specie, based on our census returns of 1880. I note the fact that our monetary system gives to each individual a larger proportion of money than is given to the people of Great Britain, Canada, Germany—in brief, every government on earth save France.

But these facts may deceive us. Our people need greater facilities in this regard than any other people. Our extended domain, our varied industries, our tremendous system of railroads making rapid transits and changes of persons and products—these, combined with the wonderful mental activity of our people in all business matters, make necessary a larger amount of money in this country than is needed in any other land.

The next question that naturally comes up is:

WILL THIS LEGISLATION INCREASE THE CURRENCY OF THE COUNTRY?

It will, and to an extent that will prove a safe antidote to the decrease now going on.

On September 30, 1884, there were 2,664 national banks in the United States, holding on that date Government bonds amounting to the sum of $327,435,000. On that amount, under this bill, they would be entitled to increase their circulation $32,743,500 without the deposit of another bond. This amount we are sure of. The Comptroller in his last report gives the "increase by the McPherson bill on maximum of bonds" as $229,574,845. This must be understood as the possibilities under the McPherson bill, and not as the probabilities. But there can be little doubt that with the increased inducement presented by this bill a very large increase in the issue by the banks must follow.

I will here give the Comptroller's table, which shows the increase by States under this bill:

Touching the effect of this bill as an inducement to the banks to keep up and to increase their circulation the views of the Comptroller will be of interest. He says:

The bill introduced by Senator MCPHERSON provided that any national banking association shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes not exceeding in amount the par value of the bonds deposited, and further provides that the total amounts of such notes issued to any association shall not exceed the amount of its paid-in capital stock. The bill passed the Senate and was favorably reported to the House by the Banking and Currency Committee, and is now upon the regular Calendar of the House. In case it should become a law, it would increase the aggregate circulation of national banks upon the basis of the present deposit of United States bonds with the Treasurer in trust to the amount of about $32,000,000, and would increase the profit to the banks on circulation from two-fifths to three-fifths of 1 per cent. per annum. No doubt the increased profits which by this bill would inure to the banks would induce those holding fours to continue to hold them, and the profits would probably be sufficient to induce banks who hold threes to replace them when called for redemption with 4 percents. The passage of this bill seems a simple and feasible measure of relief to the banks, and while it is possible that some bill which provided for the funding of the high-rate bonds into bonds bearing a lower rate of interest would afford more permanent relief, the bill of Senator MCPHERSON is regarded as an excellent measure by the Comptroller, and would not interfere with any funding bill which might hereafter become a law.

In another place he says:

Whatever course may be deemed expedient by Congress in regard to the funding or future payment of the public debt, the Comptroller is of the opinion that it is perfectly safe and will afford great benefit to the public to permit an issue by the national banks of circulation to the extent of 100 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited instead of 90 per cent., as under the present law.

If, sir, it is clear that there is a rapid decrease in the national currency and that the proposed legislation will stop that decrease, then it seems to me that there is but one question remaining, namely,

WILL THE BILL-HOLDER BE PERFECTLY SAFE UNDER THIS LAW?

I believe, sir, that he will be absolutely safe. I have shown that the Comptroller so believes. Briefly let us consider the protection given to the holder of the bills.

First. The bond of the Government is good. It must be paid in full at its face value.

Second. Should the market value of the bonds fall below their face value the law steps promptly in with this iron-clad provision:

Whenever the market or cash value of any bonds thus deposited with the Treasurer is reduced below the amount of the circulation issued for the same, the Comptroller may demand and receive the amount of such depreciation in other United States bonds at cash value, or in money, from the association, to be deposited with the Treasurer as long as such depreciation continues.

Third. If a bank fail to pay its notes, the law promptly forfeits the bonds deposited as security and the Comptroller may cancel the same, the Government paying the notes in full.

Fourth. Therefore the bill-holder has the Government back of his bills, making him absolutely safe.

Fifth. Then the law gives a paramount lien on all the assets of the association in favor of the bills.

Sixth. The stockholders are personally liable to the amount of their stock for the debts of the association.

Seventh. The 5 per cent. deposited for redemption is also a protection.

Mr. Speaker, safeguard after safeguard is left to protect the bill-holder. I repeat, he is absolutely safe. Did I believe that there was even a doubt upon this point I would oppose the bill, for I want the currency of the country absolutely safe in the hands of our people.

If I am correct in my conclusions thus far, I find my duty clear to vote for the pending bill. It is a measure in the interests of the people and not in the interests of the banks.

LARGE CITIES WILL OPPOSE.

I expect that the opposition to this measure will come mostly from the largest cities or great money centers, especially if they have before them the hope that they can secure legislation peculiarly favorable to them, as I believe that the Potter bill, so called, is.

The large cities are not the places where national-bank circulation is most liberally given to the people. This circulation comes more largely from the country banks.

Let us see what the increase under this bill will be to the eleven large cities of the country and consider this in connection with the capital of their banks. I will demonstrate that in proportion to their bank capital they do not get the increase of circulation that the country banks will receive:

Cities.	Bank capital.	Increase.
New York	$46,250,000	$1,560,250
Boston	50,950,000	2,715,615
Chicago	10,550,000	93,350
Cincinnati	8,600,000	638,450
Cleveland	5,664,100	140,500
Saint Louis	3,250,000	76,000
Philadelphia	18,058,000	965,280
Pittsburgh	10,150,000	708,050
Baltimore	11,713,260	620,100
New Orleans	3,525,000	232,500
San Francisco	1,500,000	60,000
Total	170,210,360	7,810,095

The total bank capital of the country is $524,266,345. Take from this the total capital of the cities just named, and it leaves $354,055,985 as the bank capital outside of these great centers. The total increase to the country of circulation under this bill is $32,743,500. Subtract the increase going to said cities, and it leaves $24,933,405 increased circulation to the outside banks. So that while the country banks, with a capital of $354,055,985, give the country an increased circulation of $24,933,405, these great money and business centers, with their bank capital of $170,210,360, give only an increased circulation of $7,810,095. With these facts before us we can understand perhaps why this bill does not meet such generous support from the great cities as from other quarters.

But I can see still another reason why some of the banks, at least of one great city, New York, should oppose this bill while they have a hope that the Potter bill may pass. The Potter bill contains a scheme for the refunding of the $250,000,000 4½ per cent. bonds and the $737,691,550 4 per cent. bonds into 2½ per cent. bonds, the Government to pay the premium on the fours and four-and-a-halfs. This, if made a law, would involve very large bond transactions, and the city of New York, with her ever keen eye for "a good thing," would become the rich field for these gigantic bond transactions. Even now, I doubt not, more than one far-seeing banker is casting over in his mind for congenial spirits with whom to form a syndicate to reap the harvest ripening in the Potter bill. In these remarks I do not include the respected author of said bill in this House. I believe that he is full of an honest purpose in advocating it. I only regret that he is so in love with his own bill that I fear he can not see the good that is in any other.

And here let me add a few words concerning which we have been told will be offered as a substitute. I am opposed to it now certainly because—

First. I am certain that if this House does pass it, still it will not become a law at this session.

Second. It is being used to destroy the McPherson bill, which, after full debate, if I may refer to this, has passed the Senate, and if passed here the country is assured of relief from the danger of contraction that is now upon us.

Third. I believe the Potter bill to be most largely in the interest of the banks, while the McPherson bill will best serve the public.

In support of—as proof of this view I quote from the report signed by Mr. George S. Coe, president of the American Exchange National Bank of New York, said report being to the "Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York," and circulated in support of the Potter bill. Mr. Coe's third reason for favoring the Potter bill is as follows:

Third. For the national banks, this opportunity to capitalize the premium cost of the long-date bonds, when purchased, would make these bonds available for note issue at a margin of profit in all sections of the country, i. e., in all localities where ordinary rates for money do not exceed 18 per cent. per annum. As a result of the enactment, therefore, it might reasonably be expected that the national banks would gradually, in time, become possessed of 4 per cent. bonds, or their substitute, 2½ per cent. bonds, and these are not redeemable for twenty-two and a half years. In this respect the proposition is superior to the measure known as the McPherson bill, which, without further legislation, would not serve to make note issue profitable in localities where current rates for money exceed 7 per cent. per annum.

Here we have an admission, boldly made, that the Potter plan will let banks operate even in a field giving a profit of 18 per cent. It means this or nothing. It is also stated that the McPherson bill holds forth no such captivating inducements to the national banks.

Fourth. I am afraid of the Potter bill for the reason that I believe the bonds to be bought can be secured by the Government at a lower rate than that fixed in the second section of that bill.

But the friends of the Potter bill tell us that

THE M'PHERSON BILL IS BUT A TEMPORARY MEASURE.

This is true. It is equally true of the Potter bill. Both aim at keeping up the circulation until some system can be wisely chosen, some system that will outlive our national debt, finally maturing in 1907. The McPherson bill insures relief for many years to come, but not beyond 1907, and Mr. POTTER'S plan, he admits, dies in 1907.

We have no plan before us proposing a security for national-bank notes after our bonds all mature. Our ablest financers thus far are silent in the presence of this great problem.

This being true, it only remains for this House to say whether it will pass the McPherson bill now, giving safety at a time when all business is uneasy, or whether it will kill the McPherson bill by substituting the Potter bill, knowing as we do that the latter can not become a law at this session of Congress and probably never will.

THE NATIONAL BANKING SYSTEM.

Some may oppose the present measure because they are opposed to the national banking system. If such are patriotic and desire the prosperity of their country they will not make this the time to strike at the system, even though they may find the occasion tempting for the usual abuse with which some enjoy feeding the minds of those with kindred views.

Before closing my remarks I desire to submit a table, prepared at my request by the honorable Comptroller of the Currency, giving the dividends paid by the national banks since September, 1869, as far back as the Government has data on this point. I include this as a complete answer to the stale and unwarranted charge that these banks are robbing the people. Here are the facts:

*Dividend reports were first required by the act of March 3, 1869, and there are no data on file earlier than the dates given.

† General average of the whole country for fifteen years.

Do these dividends show the system to be one giving unreasonable profits? What business man will be content with such low profits on the capital invested in his business? Let us here contrast these divivends with those paid by the banks in other countries, and it will be found that the rates are lower here than in nearly all the other countries on earth.

In the Bankers' Magazine, Journal of the Money Market, and Commercial Digest, for December, 1884, published in London, I find that the Bank of England pays 9½ per cent., and that the London and partly provincial banks pay dividends ranging mostly from 10 per cent. to 22 per cent. The Yorkshire and northern banks pay mostly from 10 per cent. to 20 per cent. The Bank of Scotland pays 14 per cent., and the Scotch banks mostly pay from 12 per cent. to 16 per cent. The Irish banks pay about 12 per cent., some running to 20 per cent. The Bank of France pays 29½ per cent., and the French banks mostly pay from 10 per cent. to 19 per cent. The German banks, like our own, pay low dividends.

In conclusion, I am frank to say that I care nothing for the national banks excepting as they are instruments of convenience to the people and as they are a part of the business interests of the country which have the same rights here, and no more, than the citizen whose only capital is in his head and hands.

Certain it is, however, that our monetary system of the past decade has given and is still giving the greatest satisfaction to the people, and he must be a very thoughtless or reckless man who, in the light of the past and the present of our financial experiences and in the light coming from other and older governments, is prepared to strike down the national banking system of this country.

To this system I am committed until such time as a better is offered, a time that has not yet come.

Mr. ERMENTROUT was recognized.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRUMM. I desire to ask, Mr. Speaker, if the five minutes which were occupied in the discussion with reference to the proposition to call the previous question were taken out of the time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YAPLE]. If so, he was thereby deprived of five minutes of his time which he subsequently yielded to me. I was informed of this by a gentleman who kept the time. That being the case, I desire to ask if after having yielded the remainder of my time to Mr. SHIVELY he is not now entitled to five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, if there was a mistake in the computation of the time. The Chair will cheerfully correct any such mistake, as it was not the intention that there should be any reduction from the time of the gentleman from Michigan on account of the remarks made with reference to the limitation of the debate.

Mr. BRUMM. I was satisfied that the time so occupied should not have been deducted from the time allowed the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. It should not have been.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. BRUMM. I understand I have five minutes remaining, and this I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY].

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Am I recognized?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be recognized at the expiration of the remaining five minutes which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] now yields to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. Speaker, the pending measure, known as the "McPherson currency bill," together with the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM], clearly illustrates the two antagonistic ideas struggling for supremacy in the financial legislation of the country. The discussion of these propositions develops and sharpens the real issue which the liquidation of the national debt is thrusting on the attention of Congress. The issue does not lie between a metal currency and a paper currency. The issue does not lie between a redeemable and an irredeemable currency. The issue does not lie between a State-bank currency and a national-bank currency. On the contrary, the issue does lie, clearly and distinctly, between a corporation currency on one hand and a Government currency on the other. Here the issue is drawn, broad, plain, and deep, and on this line this controversy will proceed until it is settled in the interest of the Government, and settled forever.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], who just resumed his seat, insists that the provisions of this bill are "very simple," and adds that it is only designed to "get more money into the hands of the people." Indeed, sir, the provisions of the bill are very simple, and so far from getting "more money into the hands of the people," it involves a plain, broad, explicit proposition to appropriate $32,743,500 to the national banks without requiring a single farthing of compensation to the Government in return. The people, through the Government, are to furnish all the funds and bear all the burdens, while the banks are only required to monopolize the profits and harvest all the benefits. Such is the delicate partnership contemplated by this measure; such the philanthropic impulse inviting its adoption.

But, sir, we have not the slightest assurance that this measure will arrest the contraction of the currency. Even the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER], who is not only friendly to the banks but claims partial authorship of the present system, admits that it must produce the opposite effect. This gratuity to the banks would certainly enhance the value of their issue franchise; to enhance the value of their issue franchise is to increase the premium on their bonds; to increase the premium on their bonds is to render the stockholders more clamorous than ever for the retirement of the notes and the sale of the bonds to secure the benefits of the premium. So this measure, while containing a rich morsel for the banks, would only aggravate and intensify the evils which threaten the people.

Moreover, it does not appear that the contraction by the banks during the past year has been at all compulsory. On the contrary, the report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows conclusively that the banks can avail themselves of over $196,000,000 additional circulation under existing law. In spite of this, however, the Comptroller, in substance, distinctly avows that Congress must by legal enactment increase their profits or they will still further deplete the volume of currency. These facts clearly demonstrate not only that the contraction by the banks is entirely voluntary, not in any sense compulsory, but also that profit is their only object, whether sponged from the fields of prosperity or gathered from the wrecks of insolvency. Profit points the compass, and greed, armed by the Government with the power of expansion and contraction of the currency, leads the way, careless alike of outraged patriotism and bankrupted industry.

Such, Mr. Speaker, are the difficulties that must arise from every experiment of associating a public function with private enterprise. Such are the inevitable results of transforming a prerogative of sovereignty into an instrument of individual profit. As well, sir, might Congress lodge the right to "declare war and make treaties of peace," to sit in judgment on the issues of life and death, to a corporation of manufacturers of gunpowder and fire-arms and expect uninterrupted peace, as to lodge the purse-strings of society in a symposium of credit corporations and expect uninterrupted prosperity. As well delegate the power of collecting and disbursing the public revenues to a junta of prohibitory tariff enthusiasts and expect justice to the consumer, as to transfer the power of issuing and controlling the volume of currency to twenty-six hundred non-producing corporations and expect safety and stability to the productive and distributive interests of the country. Every transfer of public power to private control for private gain quickens into activity the most selfish instincts in human nature, and breeds disaster to the people and danger to the Government.

The present attitude of the national banks toward the Government and the business interests of the country presents a striking illustration of this truth. Within the past eighteen months the lines of credit have been drawn with constantly increasing tension, caused by contraction, from manufacturer to wholesaler, from wholesaler to retailer, and from retailer to consumer. And now these 2,600 children of privilege demand that Congress accede to their terms and grant this gratuity, or by further contraction they will snap these lines and ripen a harvest of foreclosure and confiscation. Even this accession to the banks would be no guarantee to the people. Privilege acknowledges no reciprocal obligation. It knows no friendships. It claims tribute of all. It feels grateful to none. It has no heart to touch, no sympathies to arouse, no conscience to awaken. Privilege would lay the whole world under contribution, but stand sponsor to nothing.

Then, sir, shall we seek a remedy by increasing the power of privilege? Why, alternate expansion and contraction, appreciation and depreciation, prosperity and bankruptcy, are the unfailing fruits of banks of issue. Neither regard for the Government nor solicitude for the people can be imparted to them by legal enactment. Said Mirabeau, "Banks of issue support governments as ropes support criminals." Their guardianship over the business interests of a country is the guardianship vouchsafed by the highwayman to his victim. This is no impeachment of national bankers. I distinctly disclaim the slightest hostility toward any class of men for availing themselves of the advantages conferred by the laws of their country. It is not a question of men, but of systems. It is not a question of individuals, but of institutions. It is not a question of private profit, but of sovereign prerogative. National bankers are but the beneficiaries of a system granted to them by the highest law-making power in the land. Congress has only been taken at its own word. He who hoists the floodgates should not complain of the deluge.

In their capacity as banks of exchange, discount, and deposit the national banks are useful and necessary factors in the business economy of the country. In their capacity as banks of issue they are the source of constant annoyance to the Government and menace to the people. As the former their business stands on its own merits, as does that of the merchant, the manufacturer, and the farmer. As the latter they exercise a public power only for private gain and utterly regardless of the public welfare. As the former they take equal chances with all other forms of private enterprise. As the latter they hold despotic sway over the producing and distributing forces of the country. As the former they are useful servants. As the latter they are despotic masters. The defects shown by these distinctions clearly indicate the proper remedy. Leave their exchange, discount, and deposit functions, all clearly private and local in character, intact, and let the national banks do business on their own capital, with no more and no less protection under the law than is granted to other forms of private business. Let the issue function, entirely public and national in character, revert to the Government, where it belongs. Such a divorce of the proper from the improper functions of the national banks will destroy none of their power for good, and will remove all their power and temptation to harm. The temptation is removed by the repeal of the law which confers the power. That a law tempts only the selfishness of human nature is conclusive evidence of its injustice and abundant cause for its repeal.

The economic world is subject to laws as immutable in their character and as universal in their application as are the laws of nature. Violation of these economic laws is followed by commercial distress as certainly as the violation of natural law is visited with physical distress. Violent expansion and contraction of the volume of currency are a clear violation of one of these economic laws, and business bankruptcy and commercial paralysis are the inevitable penalties. To increase the temptation of private corporations to ignore these laws is suicidal policy. The proposed measure will not only provoke a further contravention of these principles, but also delay a permanent solution of the financial problem.

Want of time, sir, forbids me to dwell on the comparative merits of a corporation currency and a government currency. Suffice it to say that beyond all points of similarity as between the two the latter must ever possess substantial and conclusive advantages over the former. Every element of strength and safety inhering in our national-bank currency is lent to it by the Government, while all its defects arise from private control of its volume. Gentlemen who question the wisdom and expediency of trusting the control of the volume of currency to the Government are left to their skepticism in popular institutions; for the last analysis of every objection to such a currency demonstrates that it is founded on a lurking doubt in the ability of the people for self-government. Professing faith in free institutions, I leave such objections to others. They are the excuse of kings, the only plea of tyrants, the first and last argument of despotism. If the chosen and instructed representatives of fifty million people must abdicate the sovereign prerogative of issuing and controlling the volume of currency to private corporations, as a means of self-defense, the problem of popular government is yet unsolved. That only is a pure democracy, a perfect republic, where all the essential prerogatives of sovereignty are lodged in and exercised by the whole people in their collective capacity, through their representatives, for the common good of all. That government under which such prerogatives are farmed out to private corporations, to be prostituted to the individual gain of the few, is unworthy of the name democracy.

Again, sir, I respectfully suggest, in the interest of candor and fairness, that the substance of this measure should have been clothed in different form, submitted to the House, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and reported back here, to stand on its own merits as an appropriation bill. It is certainly nothing more nor less. We deceive neither the public nor the banks; why humbug ourselves? Why present a gift and seek to obscure its value? Why tender the banks a tray of diamonds labeled "cobble-stones?"

Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes allotted me I have sought to emphasize the folly of this measure, which is as unjust in principle as it is vicious in policy. It would relieve the distress of the many by granting gratuities to the few. It is privilege seeking by additional legal enactment to fortify itself against the processes of natural justice. No candidate for public position would dare go before the people advocating such a measure as this. Its friends may steal a march on public opinion, but can it form a truce with fate. My vote shall be cast in favor of settling the question that this House is the exalted refuge of the people, not the paradise of class legislation.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. In the brief argument I propose to make in advocacy of this bill it is not my intention to follow the gentlemen who have already spoken in a discussion of the various theories advanced by them. I propose to pay my attention directly to the matter in hand, making only this preliminary remark: The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YAPLE] has shown a disposition to arouse antagonism to this bill by appealing to party spirit. He says that the measure is anti-Democratic. In all that has been said by gentlemen in that line I beg leave to disagree with them.

We have heard a good deal of Bourbon Democracy and progressive Democracy and the Old South and the New South. I think if the gentleman who has thus appealed to the Democratic side of this House will take the Chicago platform as his guide on this question his doubts would vanish. That platform declares:

> We believe in honest money, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution, and a circulating medium convertible into such money without loss.

And they announced another principle as a guide for legislative action and as a matter of policy:

> That legislation affecting the occupations of the people should be cautious and conservative in method, not in advance of public opinion, but responsive to public demands.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I decline to be interrupted. If the gentleman can not find his answer in my general remarks on this subject I do not propose to fritter away my time in any colloquy.

If there is one section in the Union which has become notorious, whether truthfully or falsely, for upholding the banner of Bourbonism, whether truthfully or not, it is, by common report, the State of Kentucky. And yet even a Senator, a Democratic Senator from the State of Kentucky, in some remarks made before the Senate, used the following language in regard to the national banking system:

> National banks are out of politics. There is nobody making war upon them; nor are they as such interfering in political affairs. We need their circulation for a growing country, and therefore it will be a benefit for us all to maintain it.

I read the above from Money in Politics, a work lately published by J. K. Upton. You may call this new Democracy if you will; that is the Democracy which I follow.

Now, the argument for this bill is in a nutshell. Briefly stated, it is as follows: The President of the United States in his message, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency in their reports, have told us that in consequence of the rapid payment of the 3 per cent. bonds and their withdrawal as a basis for the issue of national-bank currency there has been an inconvenient contraction of the currency. This amount is stated by the Comptroller of the Currency to have been for the year ending November 1, 1883, $8,284,017, and for the year ending November 1, 1884, $24,170,676, aggregating for the two years $32,454,693. It is also said by these authorities that of the two hundred million of these bonds outstanding one-fourth will be retired by the operations of the sinking fund during the coming year; that, if this state of things is allowed to continue and no appropriate legislation had, this process of contraction will proceed at the rate of $40,000,000 per annum. Because it is well understood that the high rates at which the 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds rate preclude their profitable use by the banks as a basis of circulation. All these authorities unite in a recommendation, almost universally approved by the business community, that something be done to retard contraction and maintain circulation. Of all the bills having this for their object but two are presented for the consideration of this House. They are, in all likelihood, the only bills which the House will have an opportunity to act upon, if action is to be had in the present Congress. The one is known as the McPherson bill. It has already passed the Senate and is the one immediately before us for discussion. It is a measure which has also the approval of all the authorities I have named. The opposition to the measure comes from a very incongruous combination indeed. It is composed of two classes of persons:

First. Those who denounce national banks as burglars, robbers, and everything diabolical, and who are bent on expediting the approaching extinction, real or supposed, of the national banking system, by refusing to broaden the basis for the issuing of the national banking currency, and by substituting greenbacks in its place.

Second. Those who have proclaimed themselves, in season and out, as the progenitors, protectors, and defenders of the system, and who now profess to be actuated by a desire to make a more permanent basis for the issue of the national-bank notes by a refunding of the national debt in a bond bearing 2½ per cent. interest.

It is a sufficient answer to the opposition embraced in the first class to say that the action of the Forty-seventh Congress in passing the bill for the rechartering of national banks was a declaration on the part of the representatives of the people that the national banking system should be maintained for the present. It would be superfluous to enter into the reasons for this conclusion. They still exist and are as potent as ever. For obvious reasons the large majority of the people do not wish any disturbance or change in the system unless it be unavoidable. Believing this, it is my intention to support any and all proper measures looking to the maintenance of the present system. I do not mean that I would seek to perpetuate the public debt, or even extend the time of payment to subserve such a purpose. But, subject to that limitation, with my present lights, I am in favor of using the national debt as long as it may exist for national banking purposes.

Exclusive of all other bonds representing the debt there are $738,000,000, nearly two-thirds of our bonded indebtedness, that can not be liquidated under existing laws till July 1, 1907, more than twenty-two years. Certainly a sufficient basis for banking purposes for years to come. It needs only appropriate legislation. So that in my judgment the time is not yet on us when it has become a pressing duty "to provide for the retirement of the national banking system with the payment of the public debt," nor for the settlement of the other proposition, what currency shall take its place in the future?

To the opposition embraced in the second class I say that the funding of the public debt in bonds bearing a lower rate of interest is at all times desirable when it can be accomplished. But believing that there is no likelihood of Congress agreeing upon any such measure at this time, I think it wiser to support such measures as are more easily comprehended, as will give rise to less discussion, and are more likely to become law. Therefore, I am not disposed at this time to undertake any such legislation.

I am well aware that much effort has been made to forward the success of the particular project advocated by my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. POTTER] through the press, by private correspondence, and the action of public bodies. I confess that the representations thus made are entitled to great consideration. In all probability if I saw daylight I would yield the measure at the present time my hearty support. But my conclusion as to its unfeasibility is more than fortified by the fact that the funding scheme presented in Mr. Potter's bill, though introduced into this House as early as January 16, 1884, just one year ago, has up to this hour failed to receive the imprimatur of the intelligent committee to which it was referred.

It is but just to Mr. BUCKNER, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, who may probably join the ranks of the opposition, that I should say that he is not identified with either class, but has a project of his own, embraced in a bill he has introduced in the present session, which he will no doubt take occasion to explain, and which may prove a useful measure. It is obnoxious to the objection made to the Potter bill. I believe that legislation of so comprehensive a nature on so important a subject as is embraced by both these bills should come before the House through regular and appointed channels, and after due consideration by your committees. Such a course affords the surest guarantee against unwise action.

The only bills having for their object the maintenance of circulation which I see any hope of passing, and which the Committee on Banking and Currency propose to consider to-day, are the McPherson bill and the Dingley bill. If it appear that they will accomplish their purpose, I should consider their passage the best possible thing at present feasible.

The McPherson bill, by allowing the issue of notes to the par value of the national bond, instead of 90 per cent., would allow an additional circulation upon the bonds at present deposited of $32,000,000, a sum of itself sufficient to fill up within nearly half a million the decrease in circulation of the past two years. If, in addition to this, we should pass the bill introduced by my colleague on the committee [Mr. DINGLEY], authorizing the Secretary to invest in United States bonds the fund deposited by national banks for the redemption of their outstanding circulating notes, an additional amount of $42,837,408 would be put into circulation. Both bills together would be instrumental at this time in increasing the circulation nearly $75,000,000, or, in exact figures, $74,837,408—more than twice the net decrease circulation of 1883 and 1884. These measures will not only remedy a present evil, but will also prevent future mischief. Should we fail to legislate on this subject, the decrease in circulation, it is estimated, will be at the rate of $40,000,000 per annum—an estimate by some believed below the mark.

The fund which the Dingley bill aims to loosen up, as explained by its author, would increase at the rate of about $15,000,000 per annum. The result of these bills is, therefore, to relieve present and prevent future contraction. If the figures of those who ought to know are correct, and there is no reason to doubt them, these bills would restore and keep in circulation for the next two years $187,000,000, as follows:

McPherson bill	$32,000,000
Dingley bill	42,837,408
Present operation of the bills	74,837,408
In absence of legislation, estimated decrease in bank circulation:
Two years	$80,000,000
Increase of redemption fund, two years, from $42,837,408 to $75,000,000	32,162,592
Total	112,162,592
Present operation of the bills	74,837,408
Total	187,000,000

I do not understand any one yet to have found fault with the bill touching the redemption fund, and yet in results the action of the McPherson bill seems to me to be far more effective, by restoring and keeping in circulation a greater amount. It is objected to because it is a makeshift, and we are told that it is discredited and dishonored by its own author and friends because of this admission. I make nothing of this argument, because it is an objection that applies to both bills proposed and to the national banking system. It was a makeshift and is a makeshift to-day so far as its circulation is concerned. There are few laws which are not makeshifts. I am not going too far in saying that all legislation, whether it be contained in your constitutions or your enactments, are makeshifts, measures calculated for given times and given circumstances, all liable to change and abolition with changing times and circumstances. But a makeshift which produces the results that I have shown in financial matters is a makeshift which rises to the dignity of wise and judicious legislation.

It is objected that this is a step in the direction of the perpetuation of the debt. There is no provision in either of these bills affecting that question. The committee I have the honor in part to represent, by the passage of a resolution early in the first session of the present Congress, while declaring their desire to continue the benefits of the national banking system, expressly protest against the perpetuation of the national debt for any such purpose. A point is attempted to be made against the bill because it is said that if you give the banks the additional 10 per cent. of circulation when they go out of business the contraction will be greater to that extent. This argument goes upon the presumption that the banks go into business to go out of it again. It does not take into account the inclination that men have to adhere to a business in which they are engaged, which they understand, and for which there is a call in the community in which they reside. No man changes his business, particularly the business affected by this legislation, so long as there is a safe and reasonable profit.

Gentlemen speak of all legislation touching the national banking system as being in the interests and to the profit and advantage of national banks exclusively. I do not so regard it. Have the people, the community, no interest in having a safe, sound, and universal currency, and in maintaining its circulation to the point called for by the business of the country?

If this legislation were not, in my judgment, of reciprocal and mutual advantage to all concerned and all affected by it it would not have my support. It is because I believe that the universal sentiment is for legislation of this kind that I am here to advocate it to-day. It would be a difficult thing indeed always to construct legislation in such a way that its benefits could be meted out in equal and exact proportions to all men. It is our province to enact just and wise laws of whose provisions all may avail themselves. That this man or that man may sometimes get more out of legislation is a result against which no human foresight can provide.

I make nothing of the argument that the passage of the McPherson bill will appreciate the bonds. To whom and why will it appreciate the bonds? It will appreciate them simply because of their use as the basis of circulation. The party that desires to go into the banking business will buy them and he will pay the price. They will be affected in the market simply by their value for these purposes. I see very little, if any, increased temptation in this for the banks to withdraw from business. If, as alleged, the banks by reason of the high premium will sell their bonds and retire, then investors will also largely sell. They can only find their purchasers in those who wish to go into banking or other investors. These parties will meet each other in the market, and at the end this matter will square itself. Under the present system the banks will remain in as long as it is profitable and no longer. The case will be no different in the future.

This argument seems to be singularly inconsistent with the argument made in the same breath that the McPherson bill in wiping away the 10 per cent. wipes away conservatism and prudence in banking. The gentlemen assert that by the passage of this bill the bonds will go up, away up, as high or higher than the difference between 90 and 100. I submit that under these circumstances the inducement for the banks to avoid mismanagement, for the purpose of holding on to these valuable bonds, will be no less persuasive than at present with the 10 per cent. margin. And the Government will be just as securely protected against fluctuations and risks arising from bank mismanagement. Under this law there will be about as much conservatism and prudence in banking as there has been in the past. I think experience has shown that this depends more upon the character of the people who are engaged in the business than upon legislative fines, penalties, and restrictions. Finding nothing in the objections made to this bill to change my convictions, I propose to give it my support.

[During the delivery of the above remarks, when the ten minutes yielded by Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, had expired,

Mr. ERMENTROUT said: I should like to have five minutes longer.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. As the gentlemen in favor of this bill are anxious to get to a vote, I yield the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERMENTROUT] asks the extension of his time for five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ERMENTROUT then resumed and concluded the delivery of the remarks printed above.]

Mr. POTTER addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, for printing the report of tests of iron and steel and other materials for industrial purposes by Maj. F. H. Parker.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1374) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker, in the singularly felicitous and very eloquent presentation of the argument against this bill made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YAPLE], he was pleased to refer to New York and, when he predicted the passage of the bill, to read out of the Democratic party the Representatives of that State who might vote for this measure. Now, I know him to be an earnest Democrat, and I know he appreciates the fact that the party is not yet large enough to spare any of its members, even in the State of New York, where we did not get through with a majority of the popular vote. He will be relieved, therefore, when he discovers that the vote of the city of New York, so far as I have been able to canvass it, will be found to be cast against this bill.

I am opposed to this measure, and I am opposed to it not because I am either the friend or the enemy of the banks or the banking system. I look upon banks as a part of the machinery with which the business of the country is carried on. They would not exist if they were not useful; and my only concern in regard to the banks is that the machinery shall be kept in good order so that it will run. But this bill will not, in my judgment, contribute to the public welfare, although it may add to the profits of the banks, in regard to which we have no other concern than not to deprive them of the opportunity of making enough profit to induce them to serve the public, so long as the public shall require their services.

I have no concern in these profits. This House has no concern in these profits. The only question is whether the operations of commerce will be promoted or damaged by the passage of this bill. I think they will be damaged. Therefore I am against the bill. It proceeds upon a false assumption, which has been repeated many times in the course of this debate. It proceeds upon the idea that there has been during the last year a contraction of the currency. There has been no such contraction. I hold in my hand the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. On page 14 he estimates that the net decrease of bank circulation has been $24,170,676. But it is a remarkable fact that the increase in the coinage of silver represented by silver certificates (which are currency) during the same period was exactly $24,000,000. The bank currency, therefore, that has been retired was driven out of circulation by a currency of superior circulating power, and it lost its place in the circulation of the country because there was no use for it. We want circulation when we have an active business. The circulation of this country prior to the past fiscal year was adjusted to a very large volume of business.

Naturally, in time of depression, when prices are low, the amount of money required to make the exchanges is reduced. And not only were the twenty-four millions driven out by another currency which took its place, but by the last bank statement in the city of New York it appears there were $47,000,000 over and above the legal reserve required for the security of the bill-holders of this country; $47,000,000 lying idle because the productive power of the country has been paralyzed and is standing still.

This bill, if you pass it, will authorize the issue of $32,000,000 of additional currency to be added to the $47,000,000 for which to-day there is no profitable use. You will say it will not be issued if there is no use for it. But that is a mistake. It does not cost the banks who have got the bonds lodged in the Treasury as security one dollar to take this $30,000,000 into their possession; and it is more than you can ask of human nature to resist the temptation to take possession of $30,000,000 which, if it can not be loaned at 6 per cent., can be loaned at 5 per cent. or at 3 per cent. or at 2 or even 1 per cent., as it is to-day being loaned at call in the city of New York.

This bill then gives us expansion when we need contraction. Will it give us expansion when we need expansion? The test of the merit of this bill is then to be applied. When shall we need this expansion? When business revives? Heaven knows when that will be; certainly not until many obstructions created by the existing tariff laws to the free course of trade shall be removed. But when this revival comes, whether it be in two years or in three years hence, will the passage of this bill have prevented the payment and retirement of the bonds upon which the bank circulation is based? No, sir; the surplus in the Treasury under the McPherson bill must be invested day by day and month by month in retiring the principal of these bonds. And hence when the time comes that we shall need bonds to get new issues of money the bonds will have been paid off and canceled, and the injury we have been seeking to avoid will have been accomplished beyond redemption. It is for that reason that I oppose this bill.

I confess that I advocate the substitute offered by my colleague from New York [Mr. POTTER], not because I think either of the bills is of such immediate or transcendant consequence as the banks contend and as the advocates of these measures in this House would try to have us believe. But what the Potter bill accomplishes is this: It takes the surplus money in the Treasury and uses it for reducing the rate of interest. In other words, it anticipates a portion of the interest for which it gets full compensation in the reduced interest on the debt, instead of using it for paying off the principal of the bonds. The mathematical calculation shows that the Government will be the gainer by this process. But the great advantage which this plan offers to the mercantile community is that the principal of the bonds will still remain as the basis for circulation when needed. The debt consists of the principal and the interest. We shall have discharged the interest, and the principal will remain as the basis for banking.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ten minutes yielded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] have expired.

Mr. POTTER. I have four minutes still remaining. I yield that time to my colleague.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My colleague [Mr. COX] asks me to explain a little more fully—I certainly had not intended to explain it at all—the process by which the United States, in anticipating the interest on the bonds—that is, the reduction from 4½ per cent. and 4 per cent. to 2½ per cent. by the Potter bill—would make a profit. The reason is this: When you pay a debt before it is due, and the interest is a debt which the Potter bill proposes to pay before it is due to the extent of 2 per cent., we get a discount. That discount is realized by the Government in the shape of a reduced rate of interest thereafter payable on bonds. The saving in interest thus made leaves in the Treasury a sum in cash which otherwise would have been paid out for interest. The sum thus saved, if invested quarterly at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, will produce an amount equal to the compensation paid to the holders of the bonds for reducing the rate of interest to 2½ per cent. Practically the Government gets 3 per cent. upon its advances and pays 2½ per cent. on its debts, and thus makes a profit.

Now, when my time expired I was about to call the attention of the House to the contingency when contractions, severe and griping, will come upon this country. That day I can not predict, but within one year, within two years, within three years at latest, it will come without notice like a thief in the night. That day will be when, by the steady coinage of silver and the issue of silver certificates, this country shall pass from a gold basis to a silver basis in the commercial transactions of its citizens. That day is as inevitable as the Day of Judgment, and when it comes then every dollar of gold in the Treasury and in the banks and in the possession of private individuals will be hoarded. It is estimated that the gold of the country amounts to $610,000,000. In one day that six hundred and ten millions of gold will disappear from the circulating medium of this country. It will not be lost; it will not be stolen. It will cease to be money.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Where will prices go then? Will not prices shrink?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Prices will shrink, fortunes will shrink, a financial earthquake will open gaps greater than those that Spain has just seen, and we shall be plunged, rich and poor alike, into a common ruin.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will not gold come in then? If prices fall to the degree which the gentleman predicts, will not gold come in from other countries as fast as ships can bring it?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The difference between the commercial value of gold and silver will make silver the standard of value, and the ships of which the gentleman from Ohio speaks will come back loaded with the silver of all the world to be tumbled into our reservoir in exchange for the gold thus driven from circulation. Our greenbacks will then be redeemable in silver, the interest on our debt be payable in silver, and all private obligations not by contract expressly made solvable in gold will be discharged in silver.

The losses will be terrific, and business will for a time come to a standstill. Then will come from every quarter of the land a wail of distress and a demand for more money. Congress will respond to the public demand, and, exercising its new-found power of issuing legal-tender notes in times of peace, will supply circulation equal to the wants of trade. No deliberative body can convert itself into a bank of issue without bringing on a suspension of specie payments. It was so during the Revolution. It was so during the war of the rebellion. It was so in France, in Germany, Austria, Italy, wherever the issue of paper money has depended upon the will of the legislature responsive to the clamor and the sufferings of the people.

Thus it ever will be; and when the gentleman from Michigan invites the Democratic party to accept the doctrine that the issue of paper money is to be made dependent upon the will of Congress he invites it to its downfall and the country to its ruin.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to append to my remarks the resolutions of the New York Chamber of Commerce, of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, and of the leading bank officers in the city of New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Leave is granted.

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York views with anxiety the existing doubts and uncertainties as to the extent and effect of the continued contraction of national-bank notes and concurrent disturbance of the national banking system.

Resolved, That, for the general welfare in all the varied business interests of the country, these doubts and uncertainties ought to be dispelled. And, in conformity with the report of its committee on finance and currency,

Resolved, That, for remedial legislation, this chamber approves and hereby urgently appeals to Representatives and Senators in Congress to promptly enact the measure known as the Potter refunding bill, amended as now proposed, and of which a copy is hereto annexed.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions, together with copies of the amended bill and committee's report, be forwarded at once to kindred organizations of the merchants and business men of other cities, in suggestion of like action on their part if they approve.

Resolved, That like copies be forwarded at once to the Representatives and Senators in Congress from this city and State of New York.

We have the honor to transmit herewith copy of preamble and resolution adopted at the annual meeting of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation yesterday:

Whereas any considerable contraction of national-bank notes, such as is justly apprehended by the continued redemption by the Government of the bonds which are pledged by the banks as security for their notes of issue is reasonably calculated to excite financial distrust and consequent embarrassment to all business interests throughout our country; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Board of Trade and Transportation of the City of New York regards the measure known as the "Potter refunding bill," amended as now proposed, a copy of which is hereto annexed, as being skillfully devised to promote and protect the public interests, and, to the end that existing fears and doubts be allayed and public confidence restored, would respectfully but firmly urge upon Congress the immediate passage of the bill.

AMBROSE SNOW, President.
FRANK S. GARDNER, Acting Secretary.

Being asked to express our opinion of the measure known as the Potter refunding bill, amended to read as per copy hereto attached, we, the undersigned officers of the associated banks of New York city, hereby reply that we approve and heartily recommend its prompt enactment:

Mr. LYMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] be extended.

Mr. WILKINS. The opposition to this bill has occupied two hours and fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] may be permitted to proceed with his remarks?

Mr. REAGAN. That can only be consented to in case an opportunity is allowed to answer the gentleman.

Mr. WILKINS. I would be very glad indeed to yield to the gentleman from New York, but our time is limited. I regret that I can not do it and I ask his pardon for not doing it, but under the circumstances I can not consent.

I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter touching this question which I have received from Hon. John J. Knox, late Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS] to yield to me to make a request.

Mr. WILKINS. I will do that.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask permission to attach to my remarks the resolutions and report of the chamber of commerce, to which, if I had had more time, I would have referred, and also a statement signed by all the banks in the city of New York, in regard to the operations of the Potter bill as compared with the McPherson bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the request of the gentleman from New York will be granted. The Clerk will report the letter sent up by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS].

The Clerk read as follows:

THE NATIONAL BANK OF THE REPUBLIC,
New York, January 13, 1885.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your letter of the 30th ultimo asking for my views in reference to the passage of the McPherson bill which is now pending in the House. This bill passed the Senate during last sesion by nearly a unanimous vote, many Senators who had previously opposed similar measures voting in favor of this. Other bills providing for the funding of the 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds into 2½ or 3 percents have been under discussion in the Finance Committee of the Senate for more than two years, and have failed to obtain a favorable report. One other measure providing for a greater rate of issue than par upon bonds deposited was debated in the Senate and defeated, the McPherson bill afterward passing the Senate by a non-partisan vote. This bill authorizes either an increase of circulation upon United States bonds deposited with the Treasurer of 10 per cent. or authorizes the withdrawal of 10 per cent. of the bonds at the option of the banks. Thus a bank having $100,000 of United States bonds on deposit with the Treasurer may increase its circulation from $90,000 to $100,000, or it may withdraw $10,000 of its bonds and dispose of them, still retaining the same amount of circulation as at present.

The whole amount of 3 percents outstanding on the 1st January, 1885, was one hundred and ninety-six millions, of which the banks hold one hundred and forty-seven millions as security for circulation. As these bonds are called, fours or four-and-a-halfs must be substituted or the circulation reduced. The banks hesitate to buy other bonds at the present high rates, and are therefore rapidly reducing their circulation to the minimum point; that is, to an amount equal to one-fourth of their capital or less, as provided by law; but if the McPherson bill shall pass increasing the amount of circulation from 90 to 100 cents on the dollar, the banks will generally substitute other bonds for those which are called. It is not probable that the circulation will be largely increased, but the passage of the bill will have the effect to prevent any rapid reduction in national-bank circulation. Some of the banks will dispose of 10 per cent. of their bonds which are released by the operation of the bill, while others will increase their circulation. The price of the bonds in the market will not therefore be materially changed nor the aggregate bank circulation be largely increased at present. The bill will, however, do much good in the future, for as the time for payment of the fours and four-and-a-halfs diminishes the value of the bonds will also diminish, and they will be purchased by new banks as well as by those already organized, for the reason that the premium will not be large and that circulation can be obtained upon them for the par value thereof. The banks will thus probably come into possession of a sufficient amount of the fours to maintain their circulation for the next twenty years, thus perpetuating the national banking system with a slightly increased circulation and without much inconvenience to the banks.

The prompt passage of the bill will have a good effect upon the business of the country. Many of the banks have suffered losses during the present financial crisis, and such institutions will appreciate the relief afforded by the provision of the bill adding 10 per cent. of the amount of bonds held by them to their available funds. The passage of the bill by the House by a non-partisan majority like that which it received in the Senate will reassure the country that the policy of the new administration toward the banks is not to undergo any sudden change. During the present depression such an assurance is needed, and can not fail to have a beneficial effect upon every business interest. The pending measure, which is simple in its provisions, originated with a leading Senator in the Finance Committee of the Senate, who is an influential member of the party which is to control the incoming administration, and is the only financial measure now before Congress which is likely to pass during the present session, and its passage will be hailed by the business men of the country as one step toward furnishing the relief needed to remove the business depression, and its future effect will be much greater than is generally supposed.

You request me to inform you if the banks in this city are in favor of the passage of the McPherson bill. I have met many of the officers of the leading banks, and with but one or two exceptions they are heartily in favor of the bill. Many of the banks would as a matter of choice prefer a refunding bill, and have affixed their signatures to a paper recommending the passage of such a bill, but it is generally believed that such a measure can not pass during the present year, and it was not their intention in signing such a recommendation to obstruct or interfere with the passage of the McPherson bill, but simply to express a preference for a bill of that kind as an independent measure.

The banks in this city hold but a small amount of bonds upon which circulation is issued, and are not therefore interested directly in the question; but they are the correspondents of all the smaller banks in the country, and it would be an ungrateful act upon their part to oppose a measure now pending in Congress which will afford but moderate relief to their correspondents.

A similar bill to the refunding measure now pending was recommended by the Comptroller in his report for 1882, and has been fully discussed by the Finance Committee, and I am informed by members of that committee that there is no probability of such a measure, even if it should pass the House, being reported by the committee during the present session. The McPherson bill, on the other hand, has already passed the Senate and been reported upon by the Committee on Banking and Currency. It has been repeatedly recommended by the President, Secretary of the Treasury, and other officers of the Government, and a day has been fixed for its consideration, and it now only requires the vote of the House to insure its enactment.

The two bills should not be allowed to antagonize. They are not inconsistent with each other. If the Potter bill should be adopted as a substitute for the McPherson bill, the defeat of both measures is certain. Let each bill stand upon its own merits.

I earnestly hope that the McPherson bill, which is the only measure which has a reasonable chance of becoming law during the year upon which we have just entered, will receive the vote of the House, and that the Potter refunding bill will receive favorable consideration from the next Congress.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN JAY KNOX.

Hon. BERIAH WILKINS,
Committee on Banking and Currency,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WILKINS. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana does not appear to be in the Hall.

Mr. WILKINS. Then I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. I want more than ten minutes. My side of this question has not had a fair opportunity to be heard. The gentleman from New York who opposes this bill advocates one infinitely worse. The views which I wish to present to the House, my own and the views of those who are associated with me in opposition to the bill, have not had a fair chance to get a hearing to-day, and I want something more than ten minutes, and it must be accorded.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 7964) to provide for the expenses and compensation of special messengers to be sent by the Secretary of State to the States, respectively, of Iowa and Oregon, for the certificates of the electoral vote of 1884 for President and Vice-President of the United States, in pursuance of the provisions of section 141 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. 1820) to provide for the ascertainment of the claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801; when the Speaker signed the same.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. WILKINS. I observe that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] is now in his seat. I yield to him ten minutes of my time.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Speaker, we are warned by the officers of the Government of the reduction in the national-bank circulation, which is occasioned by the redundant revenue of the country. We know that the warning rests upon a proper foundation, because a large part of the indebtedness of the Government is in bonds redeemable at its own pleasure, and the revenue available therefor is appropriated as it comes in to the payment of the bonds. In the reports which were placed last session upon the desks of members it is stated by the Secretary of the Treasury that so rapid is the reduction going on that a contraction in the banking currency of the country amounting, say, to some $60,000,000, will have taken place in a very brief period of time.

Now then, Mr. Speaker, what are we called on to say in the present bill? Simply whether in our belief the increase of circulation called for can be furnished with safety. I do not address myself to the bill of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER], because I apprehend that under the rules it will be found impracticable to have a vote on that bill, and that it will be found practicable at the present session to determine little else than the issue presented in the bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency now before the House.

Now, then, how can the circulation which seems to be required by the country be properly utilized through the instrumentality of the national banks? At present the banks are allowed to receive currency to the amount of 90 per cent. of the face of the bonds deposited by them, and besides they have to lodge in the Treasury a reserve of 5 per cent.; so that really they are under a restraint amounting to 15 per cent. The present bill proposes as a measure of relief to permit the banks to receive currency to the amount of the par value of their bonds. But, Mr. Speaker, it ought to be noted the banks, under this bill, would still be subject to the restraint of depositing 5 per cent. for the redemption fund. So that in reality there is a margin of 5 per cent. for security other than has been generally understood or generally insisted on, at least in the present debate.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] argues that there will be great danger in allowing the banks, as is proposed, to receive in currency the par value of their bonds. If he has that apprehension regarding the United States bonds to be deposited when it is brought to his notice that there is a reserve in the redemption fund of 5 per cent., so that the banks would really handle only 95 per cent.—if he thinks it unsafe to trust the banks with circulation to that extent, I undertake to say he is one of a very limited number of persons. I venture to add, too, that the apprehension he has expressed has not found expression in the consideration which has been given this topic elsewhere and in the best-informed quarters.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York, having indulged in this one apprehension, goes on to another, and says the measure before the House will be unwise because the bonds in question will be necessarily enhanced in value in the hands of the banks, will rise in the market, and the Government be thus obliged in the end to pay a great premium in the redemption of its debt. The gentleman then proceeded to indulge in a prophecy of evils. I submit we have no business with speculations here. This proposition involved in the bill under discussion has been before the country at least one year. It passed the Senate with the approval of those in that body who are best informed on financial topics, and no such rise as the gentleman now predicts ever came with the improving prospects for the final passage of the measure. If we are to occupy ourselves with speculations, we may as well take the speculations of some other gentleman who may be thought equally sound in judgment with the gentleman from New York. I think this is not a proper, not a statesmanlike course. The true and only question before us is, I submit, Can we not give the banking currency security, and do we not give it security when it is based by us upon United States bonds, the banks receiving only 95 per cent. thereof in circulating notes?

But, says the other gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], the banks have directors and officers, who are human; and the entire currency to be authorized will be issued at once, and the country afflicted with a redundant circulation. Are the banks then going to give away their funds? Are they going to loan money unless they get interest on it? Are the channels of trade going to be overflowed in violation of the laws of demand and supply? Will the banks take out circulation if it is not to their interest to do so? And will the people call on the banks for loans unless the conditions of trade require it? These questions, Mr. Speaker, I think answer themselves.

One great advantage which the country has enjoyed under the national banking system has been a good circulation. Thirty years ago a traveler leaving the Mississippi River and going East lost upon his bank-bills from the time he left his point of departure until he reached his destination; and the increase in the loss was in proportion to the distance he traveled. Under the national-bank system the circulation has been stable and satisfactory; by it nobody has suffered loss. Besides the security upon which this bank circulation rests, and which I have endeavored to explain, it is secured by the guarantee of the Government. It is morally impossible, therefore, that any holder of a national-bank note shall lose one cent.; and it is familiar, as a matter of fact, that no note-holder ever has lost.

Will you then authorize this additional amount of currency to go into circulation to be used if the demands of trade exact it, or to be left unused if not needed—to respond to the demands of the time, to answer the varied requirements of business? Or are you to listen to the proposition which, with so much astonishment, I have heard presented to-day, that the United States shall issue legal-tender notes, and the amount of the issue become matter for political consideration and action in Congress——

Mr. WILKINS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-three minutes.

Mr. WILKINS. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If I could be permitted to take the floor in my own right I would much prefer it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS] now holds the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If I can not obtain the floor in my own right I will take it for what time I can get, but would like at least twenty minutes.

I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an amendment which I propose as an additional section, and which I desire may be considered as pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That whenever the volume of circulating notes of national banks shall fall below $303,318,984 by the redemption of national-bank notes, as provided by section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, and of section 6 of the act of July 12, 1882, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue United States notes redeemable in lawful money, in denominations as nearly as may be of the bank notes redeemed, in sufficient amount to keep the volume of paper currency at all times up to a total of $650,000,000, including national-bank notes, greenbacks, and notes issued under this act; and such shall have the same legal-tender power as is now given by law to national-bank notes, and they may be deposited by national banks with the Treasurer of the United States as lawful money for the redemption of their outstanding circulation.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, are there not two amendments already pending?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to state the situation of the bill. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YAPLE] while holding the floor in his own right proposed an amendment to the bill, after which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] while holding the floor offered a substitute for the bill. Under the rules of the House there may be pending at the same time an amendment to the bill with an amendment to that amendment, and a substitute for the bill with an amendment to that substitute.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I will offer this as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGLEY. If it is offered I desire to reserve all points of order on it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this country is undergoing one of those periods of depression which so frequently visit modern nations. In the midst of plenty there is want. The granaries of the farmers are overflowing with abundance; the shelves of the merchants are loaded with manufactured products; yet trade is stagnant; industries are broken down; labor is out of employment; exchanges are obstructed; business is paralyzed, and money, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has just said, is gathered in money centers and lies idle, while failures in business have increased from $65,000,000 in 1880 to $250,000,000 in 1884.

There must be some cause for all this. I believe there are two principal causes. The first is, disproportionate production; not general overproduction—that is a condition that cannot exist; there can not be a surplus of everything. That is, a surplus or overproduction of some things as compared with others often takes place and is always followed by more or less disturbance of business, and not unfrequently by great suffering.

For as modern society is constituted and as civilization advances the dependence of man upon his fellow-man increases.

Capital and labor must go together. Machinery becomes as necessary to the laborer as are his own hands. When industries break down and the machinery of production stops the laborer is deprived of the very means of earning bread. This is the condition now over a large part of the country. I do not, however, propose to enter into a discussion of the question of overproduction. But to refute an error that seems so widely to prevail I will print with my remarks some things which have been said on that subject by men who have more ably discussed it than I can.

Among the first to combat the theory of overproduction was James Mill, one of the clearest and ablest writers on political economy. He says:

A commodity which is the instrument of demand is always at the same time a commodity added to the stock of supply. Of two men who perform an exchange, the one does not come with only a supply, the other with only a demand; each of them comes with both a demand and a supply. The supply which one brings is the instrument of his demand, and his demand and supply are, of course, exactly equal to one another. But if the demand and supply of every individual are always equal to one another, the demand and supply of all the individuals in the nation, taken aggregately, must be equal. Whatever, therefore, be the amount of the annual produce, it can never exceed the annual demand.

Professor Nicholson, late of Trinity College, Oxford, by three questions and answers completely overthrows the doctrine of overproduction.

What is demand? Demand is the offering a commodity which we have in exchange for one which we want.

What is supply? Supply is the commodity itself which we offer in exchange.

Can demand, as we define it, exist without supply, or supply without demand? Certainly not: for we must furnish a supply of some sort or other in order to offer it for the commodity which we want.

John Stuart Mill discusses the question at greater length, but with the same conclusion. He says:

The argument against the possibility of general overproduction is quite conclusive, so far as it applies to the doctrine that a country may accumulate capital too fast; that produce in general may, by increasing faster than the demand for it, reduce all producers to distress. This proposition, strange to say, was almost a received doctrine so late as thirty years ago.

Is it not almost a received doctrine now in this country? One would think so from what is said not only in the public press but on this floor.

And the merit of those who have exploded it is much greater than might be inferred from the extreme obviousness of its absurdity when it is stated in its native simplicity. It is true that if all the wants of all the inhabitants of a country were fully satisfied, no further capital could find useful employment; but in that case none would be accumulated. So long as there remain any persons not possessed—we do not say of subsistence, but of the most refined luxuries, and who would work to possess them—there is employment for capital; and if the commodities which these persons want are not produced and placed at their disposal, it can only be because capital does not exist disposable for the purpose of employing, if not any other laborers, those very laborers themselves, in producing the articles for their own consumption. Nothing can be more chimerical than the fear that the accumulation of capital should produce poverty and not wealth, or that it will ever take place too fast for its own end. Nothing is more true than that it is produce which constitutes the market for produce, and that every increase of production, if distributed without miscalculation among all kinds of produce in the proportion which private interest would dictate, creates, or rather constitutes, its own demand.

And again:

A want of market for one article may rise from excessive production of that article, but when commodities in general become unsalable it is from a very different cause; there can not be excessive production of commodities in general. * * * What a country wants to make it richer is never consumption, but production. Where there is the latter we may be sure there is no want of the former.

A German writer of distinction, Rodbertus, has undertaken to show that the equilibrium of production, as modern industries are carried on, is necessarily destroyed periodically.

The following figures will serve to illustrate this theory of periodical disproportion in production. According to the census of 1880 there were employed in the United States—

In agriculture	7,670,000
Average earnings, each	$289
Total earnings	$2,220,000,000
In manufacturing and mining	3,800,000
Average earnings, each	$350
Total earnings	$1,380,000,000
In trade and transportation	1,800,000
Average earnings, each	$500
Total earnings	$900,000,000
In professional and personal service	4,000,000
Average earnings, each	$400
Total earnings	$1,600,000,000
Aggregate earnings or share of total production of the industrial and professional classes	$6,100,000,000
Gross products of the country, say	$10,000,000,000
Left for capital and the non-producing classes	$3,900,000,000

Now, if the production of things consumed by the different classes here given be in the proportion of the earnings of the different classes, then the equilibrium of production and consumption would continue. But changes are ever taking place; improvements in production are constantly being made, and the quantity of things produced increases much faster than population. Suppose, for illustration, that production per capita doubles in a given time. Then it is clear that unless the share that falls to the different classes, that is, the wages of labor and earnings of all classes, is doubled, the power of consumption of the different classes would not increase with the increase of production. Production in some lines would then become excessive, and such industries must shut down. Idleness is then forced at first upon a small class; but as the wages of one class is cut off their power to consume, that is to buy, is taken away, and this in turn affects other industries, until the disturbance has its run through all; when a readjustment takes place and a new equilibrium is established.

CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY.

Another cause of the depression we are now undergoing, and the one I propose more particularly to discuss, is the contraction of the currency not only in this country, but throughout the world. For the first time since the discovery of this continent the production of gold has fallen below consumption in the arts, for ornaments and dentistry. And it is a startling fact that we are now actually encroaching upon the world's stock of coined gold for other uses than for money. By the stoppage of the coinage of silver in other countries and its restriction in this money supply from the silver mines is limited or cut off entirely. Then, in this country there is added to this general stringency a contraction of the paper currency of from three to four millions of dollars a month, with the danger of a still greater contraction in the near future. That cloud hangs over us. In my judgment, therefore, the most important thing before Congress is to stop this contraction of the currency. I wish it were the duty of the Speaker every morning when he takes the gavel to warn the House that its first duty is to stop the contraction of the currency, as in the Roman senate it was declared that Carthage must be destroyed.

It must be stopped if we would have a resumption of prosperity. It must be stopped if we would see our industries in a healthful state of activity again and the suffering hopelessness of the laboring classes relieved.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who has just spoken says that money is too abundant, that there is no profitable use for it. Is it strange that money is idle? Does the gentleman not know that when the volume of money in any country is undergoing contraction prices necessarily fall, and that money in consequence is withdrawn from business? A fall of prices is the necessary effect of a contraction of the currency. It can not be otherwise.

A contraction of the money volume changes the relations between money and other things, and necessarily affects prices. John Locke long ago laid down the true law relating to the value of money, as follows:

Money, while the same quantity of it is passing up and down the kingdom in trade, is really a standing measure of the falling and rising value of other things in reference to one another, and the alteration in price is truly in them only. But if you increase or lessen the quantity of money current in traffic in any place, then the alteration of value is in the money.

That is, with a stable volume of money for a given population with given wealth, which determines the volume of business, variation in the price of commodities is a variation in the goods themselves as compared one thing with another; but when the volume of money is changed, then the measure itself is changed, and we have what is taking place now, a double effect—that is, both a change in the commodities under the law of supply and demand, as above stated, and a change in the measure itself affecting the price of everything. In fact, it is an admitted doctrine of political economy that there can not be a general rise or a general fall of prices except by a change in the value of money. A general fall or a general rise of prices, when properly understood, means simply that there has been a change in the measure itself.

Nor is this law affected by the use of checks, drafts, or other means of economizing money, any more than the law of supply and demand is set aside in relation to coal because of improved means of economizing fuel. The effect of economizing the use of money or lessening the need of money amounts simply to this. In England £20 per capita, with the use of checks, drafts, clearing-houses, &c., answers the purpose of £40 per capita in France without these appliances.

I repeat, then, that prices will always fall when the money volume is undergoing contraction, and as prices begin to fall money is withdrawn from investment and hoarded in idleness. Why? Because investment is not safe. It is neither profitable nor safe to put money into property that is falling in value nor to employ it in business. Production is therefore checked or stopped. For if what is produced one month is worth less the next, who wants to invest money in production? That road need only be followed long enough to carry any one into bankruptcy. It has already carried thousands there, and has just carried the great firm of Oliver Bros. & Phillips, of Pittsburgh, into that pitfall.

No, money is not invested, because when prices are falling it is not profitable or safe to invest it. It is profitable at such times to lock up money, because although it may draw no interest it is increasing in purchasing power. It is gaining in its power of command over property. In short, to use it is to lose, to lock it up is to gain. It is the buried talent that, under such circumstances, gains other talents, and the active talent that loses. Hence it is that a contraction of $10,000,000 leads to locking up two, three, or five times as much, which reacts to reduce prices still lower. And this operation will continue just so long as contraction continues, whether it be one year or ten years.

Instinct as to money is always acute. In 1874 I heard a gentleman of wealth say he had placed in the Bank of England a million dollars at 2 per cent.—just as money is now being sent to England to be loaned. When I asked him "why he did not invest it here," he replied, "Why, I expect to be able to buy next year for $900,000 more property than I can buy now for a million." He was right. But people say there is a want of confidence. Certainly; but how can there be confidence in investments or in business when prices are falling? And if one having money of his own will not invest it, who will want to borrow on "good security" to invest?

Is it to be wondered, then, that interest is low? Interest is always low at such times, and always will be. Interest in the long run depends on profits, and if there is no profit there can not long be interest. Interest is highest and surest when business is prosperous, and is usually high too at the beginning of a decline in prices, for then everybody is trying to save himself; but when prices have fallen and business in consequence has become stagnant, then interest falls for the reason I have given. George Ward Norman, in his evidence before the parliamentary committee of 1857, stated that rate of interest did not depend on the amount of currency. He said (see page 318, question 3522):

There is no doubt that all over Europe, in the last few years, there has been a great increase in the quantity of money. The currencies of all countries have expanded, but the rate of interest has been very high. The very reverse would be the case if the rate of interest depended on the amount of currency.

Taken all in all there is nothing so far-reaching, or so ruinous in its consequences, as a shrinking volume of money. Money is the life-blood of all industrial activity, and when it is taken away it is felt in every vein and artery of trade. Stop contraction and business will revive and industries will show new life.

I have spoken only of the effect of contraction when wealth and population are at a stand. It is easy, however, to see the double effect of contraction if, on the contrary, population is on the increase as it now is in this country. In fact, in order to keep the money volume to its proper relation to population and wealth there should be at this time an annual increase of from forty to fifty millions of currency of some kind.

Hence, even if there was no actual contraction, the increase of population itself would produce all the consequences of contraction. But in fact we have now both a contraction of the currency and an increase of population.

Hence, Mr. Speaker, the importance of stopping the contraction of the currency now. Unfortunately, perhaps, that can be done only by Congress. It is the operation of law upon national banks that has brought on contraction, and it is only by law that it can be stopped; and I repeat that it is idle to hope for a return of prosperity as long as contraction continues.

How shall we stop the contraction of the currency? There are three plans before the House. One is the McPherson bill now under consideration; another the Potter funding bill, and the third the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk. I see no objection to allowing banks to take out currency equal to the face value of the bonds they deposit to secure their circulation. At the time the national-bank act was passed there was, perhaps, good reason for restricting circulation to 90 per cent. of the bonds; but that reason no longer exists. If banks were permitted to take out currency equal to the face value of their bonds it would operate as a temporary inflation of some twenty to thirty millions of dollars; but this would be followed by a more rapid contraction. In other words, the fall would be from a higher level. The reason is simple. Now, when the Government pays a $1,000 bond and a bank surrenders its circulation it surrenders $900. After the passage of the McPherson bill the bank would surrender $1,000 on the payment of a $1,000 bond; so there would be a contraction of $100 more in the one case than in the other.

I can not, however, agree with my friend from New York [Mr. POTTER] when he claims that under the McPherson bill bonds would rise in value, and that on this rise bankers would sell their bonds rather than take out new circulation. His proposition, it seems to me, is subject to a reductio ad absurdum. Bonds, he says, will go up in the market under the demand for them by banks for the additional 10 per cent. circulation, and on this rise banks will sell out! That is, banks will make the demand, and then sell out on the demand they themselves make! That would be like a man lifting himself up by his boot-straps.

There are some features, however, of the proposed Potter funding bill that I should favor, especially the reduction of interest, which is really a reduction of the debt itself.

CURRENCY REGULATIONS.

But the question we must meet sooner or later, and might as well meet now, is, Shall we continue to subject the paper currency of this country to regulation by private corporations and as private interests may dictate, or shall it be subjected to such regulation by law as shall secure stability of volume and thereby uniformity of value?

It has been well said by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YAPLE] that banks now put out currency when it is profitable for them to do so, and they retire it when it is not profitable. The quantity and regulation of the volume of money is now determined by private interests alone—the private interests of a few hundred men controlling national banks—and in permitting this we subject the value of all property, the prices of commodities and wages of labor, the relations of debtor and creditor, in no small degree to the control of private interests; for in the regulation of the currency banks are governed by no other principle. Now, I say this principle of currency regulation in which is involved such vast interests is unsound and indefensible.

Sir Robert Peel in his great speech of May 6 and 20, 1844, on the British act regulating the issue of currency, said:

> There is no contract, public or private; no engagement, national or individual, which is unaffected by it. The enterprises of commerce, the profits of trade, the arrangements made in all the domestic relations of society, the wages of labor, pecuniary transactions of the highest amount and of the lowest, the payment of the national debt, the provision for the national expenditure, the command which the coin of the smallest denomination has over the necessaries of life, are all affected by the decision to which we may come on that great question which I am about to submit to the consideration of the committee.

Is it wise or safe, I ask, to submit the control of the paper currency to private interests? Is this to become the established policy of this country? If not, now is the time to meet the question. I know we are told that national-bank notes are abundantly secured. That is all true, but there is a very great difference between security of final payment and such regulation of quantity as will insure stability of volume, and consequently stability in the value of the whole currency. Notes might be issued on the whole $1,200,000,000 of bonds, and the final payment of the notes would be amply secured; but is it not apparent enough that the value of the whole volume would be depreciated by such an issue? If you would allow national banks now, as during the war, to have bonds at par bearing 6 per cent. interest, does anybody doubt that they would put out currency by the hundreds of millions? There would be no suspension of issues until the inflation ended in collapse. The security of the final payment of notes by deposit of Government bonds, if only the profit were large enough, would not prevent the sort of expansion and contraction which took place under State banks.

On the other hand, take away the profits on issuing currency, and the banks will take away the currency itself. This is the condition of things now. It comes to this then: If you make it their interest to do so the banks will put out an abundance of currency, even to the wildest inflation; but if it is not made their interest to do it they will not put out any.

And this is the principle on which the currency volume is now regulated in this country, and on this volume, I say, depends in a large degree the business concerns of the country, as well as the value of everything that enters into commerce. For, say what you will, the truth is such currency, for the great purposes of trade, has the same influence on prices as so much gold and silver would have, and by placing in the hands of these corporations the power at will, or as their interests may prompt them, to change the volume of circulation, you place in their hands the power to control the value of all property and the obligations of every existing contract.

I attack, therefore, the very principle of bank regulation of currency. It is unsound. It is Lawism, and nothing else. John Law proposed to issue money on land. Why not on land as well as on bonds? It would seem that land, which is by nature limited, ought to be as secure as bonds, that may be unlimited. The error lies in accepting security for final payment as such regulation of quantity as is necessary to secure at all times stability of value. Value depends on quantity as compared with use; final payment upon the assets of the issuers; and this is true whether the issuers be the banks or the Government.

I come now to the principle on which those who favor bank regulation of currency lay greatest stress. The banks, they claim, adjust the volume of currency to the demands of business; that they give out and take up circulation in response to the wants of trade, so that there will always be just as much currency as business requires and no more. The real contest is over this principle, for if such an adjustment were possible there would be great force in the argument in favor of bank regulation of currency. But, even if this principle were ever operative, it certainly does not apply to national banks. National banks take out circulating notes equal to 90 per cent. of the bonds they deposit. When once taken out they are out to stay. In this respect there is no difference between national-bank notes and greenbacks. The banks do not even pretend now to be governed by any such principle as is claimed for them.

But if they did, the principle itself is deceptive. The old State banks claimed to act on this principle, but the result was always alternate inflation and collapse. The truth is there is no such relation existing between business and the money volume as admits of automatic adjustment through banks or in any other way. Such a relation or adjustment, from the nature of things, is impossible. No doubt there is greater business activity at one time than another; a greater number of exchanges at one time than at another, and if the demand for money grew only out of this relation there might be some ground for supporting the elastic principle, as this principle is called, in currency regulation. But no sooner is currency issued in abundance than a rise of prices takes place; and every rise of price is a new demand for currency. When prices are doubled the demand for two dollars to make an exchange is as great as the demand for one was before the rise.

In short, this is a demand that is never satiated. You might as well talk of adjusting fuel to the flames. The demand for more money was never greater than in times of greatest inflation during and at the close of the war. Lord Overstone said in his evidence before the parliamentary committee of 1857 (page 365), "I have no hesitation in saying that the Bank of England can put out any quantity of its notes that it thinks proper." I think this is enough to show that the elastic principle in currency regulation is a fallacy. Indeed it is a notion long ago exploded, but nevertheless one of those persistent errors that are all the time coming up anew.

The object of the amendment I have offered, Mr. Speaker, is to make fixed the existing volume of the paper currency and stop contraction. It does not propose to compel banks to give up any part of their circulating notes, nor to take from them a single privilege. I shall vote to allow them to take out circulation equal to the face of their bonds, and would vote to reduce the tax on circulation. But I want to have go along with these provisions the provision I have offered, so that if after the bill passes the banks voluntarily surrender circulation so as to reduce the total volume of paper below what it now is—about $650,000,000—the Secretary of the Treasury shall be required to issue Treasury notes having the same legal-tender power the retired bank notes possessed, in sufficient quantity to keep the volume of paper permanently up to $650,000,000.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

> SEC. 3. That whenever the volume of circulating notes of national banks shall fall below $303,318,984 by the redemption of national-bank notes, as provided by section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, and amendments thereto, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to issue United States notes redeemable in lawful money, in denominations as nearly as may be of the bank notes redeemed, in sufficient amount to keep the volume of paper currency at all times up to a total of $650,000,000, including national-bank notes, greenbacks, and notes issued under this act; and such notes shall have the same legal-tender power that is now given by law to national-bank notes, and they may be deposited by national banks with the Treasurer of the United States as lawful money for the redemption of their outstanding circulation.

This will prevent further contraction and hold the whole currency volume fast at the level at which it now stands, at the same time leaving to banks every right and privilege they now possess.

This is substantially the principle of Peel's act of 1844. That act recognized a given volume of paper as forever constituting a part of the money volume of England. To get more paper, coin or bullion must be deposited in the issue department of the bank, which, by the act of 1844, was put under the exclusive control of the Government. So it is proposed here to make the $650,000,000 of paper currency a permanent part of the money volume of this country, and then if a larger part of the whole money volume is required to be in paper, let gold or silver be deposited with the Treasurer for certificates. This principle is sound and perfectly safe. It prevents contraction; it permits no inflation; it looks only to stability. The principles on which this proposition rests are safe and incontestable. They may be stated thus:

First. If the volume of paper in any country be less than the whole volume of money required to maintain prices in that country up to the international level of prices, then coin will flow to such country and remain in such amount as, together with the paper currency, will suffice to sustain prices generally at the international level. For instance, if $1,200,000,000 of active currency is necessary to maintain prices in this country up to the international level of prices under our tariff system, and we have but $650,000,000 in paper, then $550,000,000 of the world's money will come here.

Second. If the paper currency, as above stated, be kept below the volume necessary to maintain prices at the international level, then such paper, if it have general acceptance as money, can not become depreciated; that is, can not fall below the coin level.

Third. A currency, part paper and part coin, will be regulated by the influx and efflux of the coin part, precisely as a purely metallic currency would be self-regulating.

I state these principles to show the perfect safety of the proposition I submit.

Mr. Speaker, these principles are not new or novel. They are deductions made after thorough investigation of the subject by as able men as any country has ever produced, In no country, perhaps, has this subject been subjected to as many crucial examinations as in England, beginning with the bullion report of 1819, and continuing down to 1857, and even to the present day. The act of 1844 was the result of an investigation by the parliamentary committee of 1840.

In 1857, again, a commission, composed, I believe, of as able men as ever sat on any commission, heard evidence on the operations of the act of 1844. At the head of that commission was the chancellor of the exchequer, and on it were such men as Gladstone, Disraeli, Sir James Graham, Sir James Wilson—both distinguished writers on economic questions—Sir Francis Baring, of banking fame, Sir Charles Wood, and others hardly less distinguished. Such witnesses as John Stuart Mill, Lord Overstone, George Ward Norman, also Weguelin and Twells, who were or had been presidents of the Bank of England, and others, were heard by the commission.

The one question before this commission was, Should the right to issue circulating notes be restored to the banks, or should it be kept under the control of the government, as provided in the act of 1844? I will read a part of Lord Overstone's examination by that commission. It should be remembered that Lord Overstone, besides being a distinguished writer on currency questions, was also a great banker; and I have thought it a misfortune that bankers in this country did not more of them study this question as he studied it.

At the beginning of the examination of Lord Overstone this question was asked him (question 3647, page 328):

Do you consider the separation of the issue and banking departments of the Bank of England to be founded upon the principle that the business of issue and the business of banking are in their nature distinct?—Undoubtedly; it is impossible to entertain any other view of the matter.

Again he says:

I certainly think it quite essential that the issue of paper money should be kept entirely separate and distinct from everything connected with the banking business (page 336, question 3664).

Again (page 337):

The present system of country issues which exists in this United Kingdom is undoubtedly a complete anomaly. We have it, and we do not very well know how to get rid of it; but I apprehend that no rational and intelligent person can say that he likes the system or that he approves of it.

Again (page 328):

First, the supply of the current coin, that is, the money of the realm, ought to be entirely separated from banking business, which is simply trading in money, borrowing at a low rate and lending at a higher rate. * * * Notes or certificates ought to be issued as the money, whether copper, silver, or gold, is coined, under strict provisions of law, and by an authority, such as the mint, established by law, and subject to strict regulations laid down in that law.

He then quotes this from Daniel Webster:

The circulation of paper tends to displace coin; it may banish it altogether. At this very moment it has banished it.

I would ask the committee—

Continues Lord Overstone—

to mark well that fact. There is a distinct statement of the entire banishment of coin from the United States by paper money, payable to the bearer on demand, and issued in obedience to what were deemed to be the wants of the public.

Then he continues his quotation from Webster:

If others may drive out the coin and fill the country with paper which does not represent coin, of what use is that exclusive power over coins and coinage which is given to Congress by the Constitution? Wherever paper is to circulate as subsidiary to coin, or as performing in a greater or less degree the functions of coin, its regulation naturally belongs to the hands which hold the power over the coinage. This is an admitted maxim by all writers; it has been admitted and acted upon on all necessary occasions by our own Government throughout its whole history.

Again, on page 329, Lord Overstone says:

The sole privilege of coining money, whether copper, silver, gold, or paper, ought to be vested in one institution, established for that exclusive purpose, and subject to strict regulations of law. No share of such privilege ought to be conceded in any form to banks or to private individuals.

Again, on the same page:

Perfect freedom of competition should be established in the business of banking, correctly understood, and effectually distinguished from the function of coining or from that of issuing paper tokens or representatives of coins, that is, bank notes, which, in fact, is coining under a form peculiarly susceptible of abuse, because the undue issue of paper notes is not restricted by that intrinsic value which effectually regulates the issue of metallic money.

Then he quotes Tooke as follows:

The privilege of issuing paper money is a delegation of that which is universally considered as a privilege residing in the state.

Sir Robert Peel, in the speech before referred to, said:

We might, I think, infer from reasoning, without the aid of experience, that an unlimited competition in respect to issues will not afford a security for the proper regulation of the paper currency.

But I need not multiply evidence on this point. The literature of political economy, and especially of that period extending from 1797 to 1857, covering the period of suspension and resumption in England, and of the discussions that led to the act of 1844, are full of evidence all pointing to the same conclusion, and that is, that the issue of currency should be separate and distinct from the business of banking, and that the regulation of the volume of money can not be safely left to private interests. The business of banking is to deal in money, not to create money. It would be as reasonable to leave the control of coinage to the goldsmiths as the creation of paper money to banks.

I say, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that enlightened statesmanship throughout the world has discarded the practice of bank regulation of currency, and we must give it up too. What other country would turn over the issue of currency to twenty-five hundred banking corporations to be put out or taken up only as their own interests might dictate? No nation in Europe to-day, not one, intrusts the issue and regulation of currency to private interests or to a bank, unless the bank is a state institution and the issue of its circulation is under the direct control of the state and subject to strict regulation by law. The right to issue circulating notes is not necessary to the existence of banks, nor to the existence of the national banking system. As the public debt is paid bank notes must be retired. And the people demand that the debt shall be extinguished, and the sooner provision is made to supply the place of retired bank notes the better for the country.

Mr. WILKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the leave to gentlemen to extend and publish their remarks on this bill be made general.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who desire to do so may print in the RECORD remarks on this bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUCKNER. As a member of the committee I had some desire to express my views in opposition to this bill. But I am very anxious to get another bill to final action, and therefore will not assert my right. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will call the previous question.

Mr. MILLS. If the gentleman from Ohio has yielded the floor, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILKINS. I have not yielded the floor. I move the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question and will then recognize the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question upon the amendments and upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. Pending that the gentleman from Texas desires to submit a motion.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House do now adjourn; and pending that I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Saturday next.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 47, noes 107.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Texas, Mr. MILLS, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. WILKINS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 31, noes 139.

Mr. YAPLE and Mr. MILLS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLS. I move to reconsider the vote ordering the yeas and nays, in order that the House may adjourn on account of the proposed caucus.

Mr. WILKINS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MILLS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered. [Cries of "Too late!" "Too late!"]

The SPEAKER. That is a privileged motion. The gentleman from Texas moves to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILKINS. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 104, noes 6.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I now withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Texas made the motion to reconsider, and I moved to lay that motion on the table. Thereupon there was a division of the House, and his motion was laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The House refused to lay the motion of the gentleman from Texas on the table, and thereupon the Chair submitted the question of reconsideration, and the House determined to reconsider. Now the gentleman from Texas withdraws his demand for the yeas and nays.

Upon the motion that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn until Saturday next, there were ayes 31, noes 139.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a memorial of the Cigar-makers' Union, No. 108, of Farrandsville, Pa., and a memorial of cigar manufacturers and cigar-makers of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I have a communication in the nature of a memorial, addressed to me, from iron manufacturers of Northern New York, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty. I ask that the communication may be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be received and so referred.

Mr. McMILLAN. I present the memorial of George H. and S. P. Ely, for the Minnesota Iron Company, and a large number of business men and firms representing the iron-ore producing and transporting interests of the Northwest, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a petition of citizens of Red Wing, Minn., praying for the repeal of the act of May 15, 1820, and acts supplementary thereto, fixing the tenure of certain administrative offices at four years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

First. That Congress, by appropriate action, provide for such a system of improvements, by the erection of dams and other works on the Monongahela River, as will meet the requirements of commerce, and enable the resources of the Monongahela Valley to be fully developed.

Second. That Congress will take such action looking to the purchase of said works as will at once secure the navigation of the Monongahela River free to all persons desiring to use its waters.

I commend this petition to the favorable consideration of the Committee on Commerce, to whom I move its reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I present resolutions adopted at a meeting of the cigar manufacturers of Philadelphia, appended to which are the signatures of 3,000 cigar manufacturers and their employés, against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty. As the resolutions are short, I ask that they may be read by the Chief Clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania presents a memorial of those interested in the tobacco industry in the city of Philadelphia, and asks that it be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the memorial will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable Senators and Representatives of Pennsylvania:

The following preamble and resolutions, adopted at a meeting of those interested in the tobacco industry in Philadelphia, are respectfully submitted for your consideration and support:

Whereas there is now pending a reciprocity treaty between the United States and Spain, which we consider in general unjust and unequal in its terms and provisions to the entire population of the United States; and

Whereas if the said treaty is adopted it will remove from the United States one of its most thriving industries, and with it millions of dollars of capital invested in the growth and manufacture of American leaf-tobacco, and throw out of employment almost as many American citizens in this particular industry as there are inhabitants in the provinces to which the treaty is to apply, and reduce the value of the labor of the few who may be able to find employment here to a par with pauper, slave, and cooly labor: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we, cigar manufacturers and cigar-makers of Philadelphia, do most earnestly protest especially against the ratification of that part of the treaty relating to tobacco and cigars, and do respectfully urge and request the United States Senators from Pennsylvania, and through them their colleagues in the Senate, to use all honorable means and their best efforts to defeat the ratification of said treaty.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the honorable Senators Cameron and Mitchell, and to every Representative in Congress from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that this paper is not in the form of a memorial to Congress; but if there be no objection it will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of the American Philosophical Society, praying that books relating to the physical, natural, and medical sciences be placed on the free-list; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of the cigar-makers' unions of Erie, Meadville, Bradford, Williamsport, and Farrandsville, in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of Bert Berry and 14 other citizens of Detroit, Mich., praying for the repeal of the four years' term acts of 1820 and later years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wis., urging the necessity of larger appropriations for the improvement of the harbors of Ludington, Grand Haven, and Manistee, Mich.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of William B. Faulds, of Burnside, Wis., praying for the repeal of the act of May 15, 1820, and acts supplementary thereto, by which the constitutional term of many administrative offices was changed and fixed at four years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of W. W. Newton and other citizens of Pittsfield, Mass., praying for the repeal of what is called the four years' tenure act. I understand that a bill to that effect is before the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and I hope that committee will be able to report upon the subject, so that the work which has been begun in that direction may be completed by the present Congress. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of the cigar-makers of Rock Island, Ill., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WILSON. I present resolutions adopted by the Cigar-makers' Union, No. 198, of Avoca, Iowa, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed reciprocity treaty between the United States and Spain. While this communication is addressed to me, it is evidently intended for the consideration of the Senate. I therefore present it, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The paper will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, if there is no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLATT. I present the petition of Jennette Chollar, a resident of Granby, Conn., praying that pensions granted to widows and dependent relatives of persons in the military service at a less rate than $12 per month be increased to that rate. I wish to say that the petition commends itself to my judgment. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1941) declaratory of the meaning of section 3 of the act of June 16, 1882, for the relief of Howard University, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 790) to authorize Col. George W. Getty, United States Army (retired), to be placed upon the retired-list of the Army with the rank and pay of a major-general, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2383) in relation to chaplains in the Army who served one year or more in the war of the rebellion as officers or privates, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of C. B. Searle and various other citizens of Iowa, praying for the passage of a special act of Congress granting a pension to Isabella Higgins, late hospital matron of the Eighth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2549) granting a pension to Isabella Higgins; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. From the Committee on Pensions I report adversely the bill (S. 1854) granting a pension to William D. Esley. I wish to state that the report is based upon the fact that a pension has been granted to the person named since the matter has been brought to the attention of the Senate. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I also report adversely from the Committee on Pensions the petition of David Frazier, praying for an increase of pension, and the petition of sundry citizens of Ohio making the same prayer. The adverse report is based on the fact that the increase, if the petitioner is entitled to one, may be obtained under the present law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, and it will lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON. I also report adversely from the same committee the petition of William S. Pardee, late private of Company C, One hundred and twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, praying for an increase of pension. The report is also based upon the ground that the petitioner may obtain an increase, if he is entitled to it, under the existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, and it will lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON. I report also from the same committee adversely the petition of Martha A. F. Terrett, widow of Colville Terrett, late a lieutenant in the United States Navy, praying for an increase of pension. Inasmuch as this belongs to a class of cases concerning which there is a diversity of view in the committee as well as in the Senate, I ask that the case may be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand this to be a petition?

Mr. WILSON. It is a petition. I ask that the report be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is nothing in the rules, as the Chair understands, which authorizes the placing of a petition on the Calendar. The petition may lie on the table subject to be called up at any time.

Mr. WILSON. It is a contested case, and I desire to have the report printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be printed, and the petition will lie upon the table.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave respectfully to make an observation in regard to the intimation just made from the Chair. The Chair's intimation was entirely correct, that there is no provision in our rules for putting a petition upon the Calendar. It seems to me, therefore, that when a committee differs about the disposition of a petition and desires to have the question taken up in order on the Calendar, as if it were a question upon a bill, the true way is for the committee to report an original resolution that the petition be indefinitely postponed, or that the petition lie upon the table, in which case the resolution would go upon the Calendar under the rule, it being a calendar of bills and resolutions. I suggest to my honorable friend from Iowa that if he would put the order that the petition lie on the table or be indefinitely postponed, or whatever disposition he chooses to make, in the form of a written resolution to that effect, it would come within the rule.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

Mr. BLAIR. From the Committee on Pensions I report back adversely the bill (H. R. 1813) granting an increase of pension to Ann Cornelia Lanman. This is one of those controverted cases which the majority of the committee reports adversely. The minority is in favor of the passage of the bill and submits its views, and asks that they may be printed along with the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the bill go on the Calendar, and that the views of the minority be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, That order will be made.

Mr. BLAIR. I also, by direction of the same committee, report adversely the bill (H. R. 3065) granting a pension to Emma De Long, the widow of Lieutenant-Commander De Long, recommending its indefinite postponement. Along with it I also submit the views of the minority of the committee, which I ask to have printed, and that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill reported by the Senator from New Hampshire will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report, and the views of the minority will be printed.

Mr. BLAIR. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4822) for the relief of Frances McNeil Potter, to report it adversely. I ask that it be placed upon the Calendar, and will state that the views of the minority of the committee are in favor of the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report, and the views of the minority will be printed.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3703) granting a pension to James W. Brown, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6461) granting a pension to Nelson Gammons, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2204) granting arrears of pension to Nancy B. Leech, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1336) granting an increase of pension to Ann Cornelia Lanman, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1504) for the relief of Millia Staples, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 751) granting a pension to Emma Martin and Harry E. Martin, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JACKSON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2083) for the relief of Fannie B. Giltner, to submit an adverse report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill go on the Calendar, please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 342) to increase the pension of Mrs. Margaret R. Jones, widow of Col. James H. Jones, late of the United States Marine Corps, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2520) for the relief of the heirs of colored soldiers who served in the war of the rebellion, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3370) to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to A. Schuyler Sutton," approved June 4, 1872, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 760) granting an additional pension to Watson S. Bentley, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred a petition of the board of supervisors and others, of the county of Mono, State of California, praying that an error in running the boundary line between the States of California and Nevada, by which the counties of Mono, El Dorado, and Alpine, of the former State, suffered a loss of territory, may be corrected, and a new survey of the boundary line made by the proper officers of the United States Government, reported it without recommendation, and asked that the committee be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

PORT OF ENTRY AT MOUNT DESERT FERRY.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2470) providing for the establishment of a port of entry at Mount Desert Ferry, in the town of Hancock, in the State of Maine, to report it favorably with an amendment.

The Maine Central Railroad corporation extended its road last season to Mount Desert Ferry, built extensive wharves and other erections, and commenced to receive at that port a very large amount of business from the Dominion of Canada and from other sections of the world. The port of entry is at Ellsworth, forty miles above, at the head of a river. The harbor at Mount Desert Ferry is one of the best on the coast, and it is absolutely necessary that some facilities for business shall be given at that port.

This bill was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, and by him approved with the amendment which the committee has reported. It is important that the bill should become a law in readiness for the approaching season, and therefore I am very anxious that it shall pass the Senate now and go to the other branch. The Committee on Commerce authorized me to ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the official duties of said port shall be performed under the direction of the collector of customs for the district of Frenchman's Bay and by a deputy detailed by him for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH CARSON.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 12) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson, with an amendment of the House of Representatives thereto, have instructed me to report the bill back with a recommendation that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House. If there is no objection I should like to have it considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be regarded as before the Senate, and the question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the amendment of the House read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will state that this is the claim of a woman residing in Kentucky, who, during the war, was the keeper of a county jail in that State. She was required by the military authorities to furnish rations, lodgings, &c., to confederate prisoners and also to Union soldiers. She made a claim for rations furnished, also for her personal services, and also, I think, for rent. The Senate Committee on Claims, after considering her petition and claim, reported in favor of allowing 60 cents a day for the rations which she actually furnished by order of the military authorities. That bill was favorably considered by the Senate and passed and went to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. Was the order made by the Union authorities?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes; by the national military authorities. The House amended the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and providing that her whole claim should be investigated by the War Department, and that the Secretary of War after such investigation should report to Congress his conclusions. That is all there is of it. The committee recommend concurrence in the House amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE IN WYOMING.

Mr. HARRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Territories to report favorably and without amendment the bill (H. R. 5639) extending the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in Wyoming Territory. As it is a House bill, consisting of only five or six lines, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that justices of the peace in the Territory of Wyoming shall not have jurisdiction of any matter in controversy where the debt or sum claimed exceeds $300.

Mr. HOAR. What is the present law?

Mr. HARRISON. The amount fixed in the present law is $300 in several Territories and $100 in some others. The Legislative Assembly of Wyoming has petitioned to have the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace in that Territory fixed in the same way as in other Territories, not to exceed $300.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 2550) to settle and adjust the claims of any State for expenses incurred by it in the defense of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SAULSBURY (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2551) for the relief of George E. Moore, of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 2552) for the relief of P. C. Davis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2553) to grant an increase of pension to Frederick Beno; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2554) to equalize the pay of graduates of the Naval Academy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2555) granting a pension to Van Buren Dorr; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SABIN introduced a bill (S. 2556) for relief of settlers under the homestead laws; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2557) for the relief of William Wolfe, of Shelbina, Shelby County, Missouri; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Claims, and express the hope that the committee will refer the same to the Court of Claims under the so-called Bowman act.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 2558) for the relief of Theodore De Hou; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 111) referring the controversy between the United States and Venezuela in respect to the awards of the mixed commission to the President; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 112) providing for the sale of public documents; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying letter from the superintendent of the Senate document-room, referred to the Committee on Printing.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, together with the accompanying paper, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MEMORIAL TABLET TO HENRY WILSON.

Mr. HOAR. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol, under the direction of the Committee on the Library, place a neat marble tablet in the room in the Senate wing of the Capitol where Vice-President Henry Wilson died, appropriately recording the fact and date.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose there will be no objection on the part of any Senator to the passage of this resolution. The eminent citizen to whom it relates ended a very brilliant and distinguished public service in this Chamber of more than twenty years by his death in the Vice-President's room. His wife and children had preceded him to the grave, and for many years this Chamber, more than any other place on earth, was his home.

He was an eminent instance of the opportunity afforded by American institutions to the humblest person, without early advantages, struggling against poverty, to raise himself to the highest station. He was at the time of his death one of the most beloved citizens of the Republic. He held the second office within the gift of the people, and a large number of his fellow-citizens were looking to him as likely to be elevated to the first office within the gift of the people if his life had been spared.

It will be agreeable to his friends and fellow-citizens of Massachusetts, and I think to every American who visits the Capitol, to have this simple record of the spot where he closed his distinguished and useful life.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INVITATIONS TO INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further resolutions the order of morning business is closed, and the Chief Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 1331) making appropriation for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass."

Mr. PLATT. I thought that the bill relating to the appointment of commissioners to international exhibitions was the unfinished business for this morning by general consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Then it will be necessary to move to take up that bill.

Mr. HOAR. I understand there was unanimous consent asked for and obtained that the bill referred to might come over to this morning from yesterday.

Mr. PLATT. The bill was postponed until to-day. However, I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to enable the President to accept invitations of foreign governments to international exhibitions and to appoint commissioners thereto, and for other purposes. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. PLATT. I move as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a commissioner to represent the United States in the international inventions exhibition to be held in London in May next, and, under the direction of the Secretary of State, make all needful rules and regulations in reference to the exhibits and contributions from this country, and control the expenditures incident to the proper installation and exhibition thereof, and to the preparation of reports upon the exhibition. That under like direction exhibits may be prepared in the Patent Office, and with appropriate letters patent, models, and drawings therefrom, transmitted to such exhibition, and under like direction all exhibits authorized by the commissioner may, when practicable, be transmitted to such exhibition in public vessels free of cost. And in order to defray the necessary expenses authorized by this section, and for the proper installation of the exhibition and the expenditures of the commissioner made under the direction of the Secretary of State, and with his approval and not otherwise, there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose herein specified, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey as amended.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the title of the bill and to insert:

Whereas the Government of the United States has received official intimation from that of Belgium that it is proposed to hold an international exhibition, which will embrace all industrial products, all goods forming objects of commercial transactions, and all objects and appliances of interest to navigation, to be opened at Antwerp, May 2, 1885, and will have a duration of at least five months, whereat the representation of the United States is invited; and

Whereas also, by its action as a government and by the active enterprise of merchants, the United States has attained and holds a prominent place in all that relates to the development of all industrial products, the extension of the great commercial relationship with other countries, based on the exportation of goods forming objects of commercial transactions, which now form an important factor in the national wealth, and it is expedient that the industries and interests thus concerned should be adequately represented on the occasion: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the invitation of the Belgium Government be accepted; and that, under the auspices of the Department of State, the United States commissioners to the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition at New Orleans be, and they hereby are, instructed to prepare or cause to be prepared, upon the termination of said World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition, a complete and systematic representative exhibition of the Government exhibits at the exposition at New Orleans, and to take such further measures as may be necessary in order to secure a proper representation of the productions of our industry and of the nature of the natural resources of the country at the international exhibition to be held at Antwerp in 1885.

SEC. 2. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint three commissioners to represent the United States in the proposed exhibition at Antwerp, and, under the general direction of the Secretary of State, to make all needful rules and regulations in reference to the exhibits and contributions from this country, and to control the expenditures incident to the proper installation and exhibition thereof, and to the preparation of reports on the exposition.

SEC. 3. That the President be authorized, in his discretion, to assign one or more public vessels to transport to and from Antwerp, free of cost, under regulations to be prescribed by the commissioners to the Antwerp exposition, such articles of the Government exhibit as may be selected and prepared for transportation by the commissioners to the New Orleans Exposition, and such other articles as may be offered for exhibition by the citizens of the United States.

SEC. 4. That in order to defray the necessary expenses above authorized, and for the proper installation of the exhibition, and the expenditures of the commissioners, made under the direction of the Secretary of State and with his approval, and not otherwise, there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose herein specified, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a commissioner to represent the United States in the international inventions exhibition to be held in London in May next, and, under the direction of the Secretary of State, make all needful rules and regulations in reference to the exhibits and contributions from this country, and control the expenditures incident to the proper installation and exhibition thereof, and to the preparation of reports upon the exhibition. That under like direction exhibits may be prepared in the Patent Office, and, with appropriate letters patent, models, and drawings therefrom, transmitted to such exhibition; and under like direction all exhibits authorized by the commissioner may, when practicable, be transmitted to such exhibition in public vessels free of cost. And in order to defray the necessary expenses authorized by this section, and for the proper installation of the exhibition and the expenditures of the commissioner, made under the direction of the Secretary of State and with his approval, and not otherwise, there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose herein specified, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. PLATT. It did not occur to me when I drew my amendment that there is a public statute which provides that the words "And be it further enacted" shall not be put at the head of sections. I ask, therefore, that by unanimous consent those words be stricken out, and that the section begin with the word "That."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that order will be made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to his amendment. The preamble reads:

Whereas the Government of the United States has received official "intimation," &c.

The bill then says, "the invitation." I suggest that the word "intimation" ought to be stricken out and "invitation" inserted, unless there has not been any invitation extended; and if there has not been, the bill ought not to be passed.

Mr. SEWELL. The Senator from Missouri is correct. The Government has received an official invitation. It ought to read "official invitation."

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I move to amend in the second line of the first whereas by striking out the word "intimation" and inserting "invitation." Probably "information" would be better in that connection. Let it read "official information."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri move that amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2 of the first division of the preamble it is proposed to strike out "intimation" and insert "information;" so as to read:

Whereas the Government of the United States has received official information from that of Belgium that it is proposed to hold an international exhibition, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SEWELL, the title was amended to read: "A bill to authorize the President to appoint commissioners to the Belgium international exhibition at Antwerp, and for other purposes."

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair to lay the message from the House of Representatives in regard to the naval appropriation bill before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7874) making additional appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the presiding officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. HALE, ALLISON, and BECK were appointed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEWTON, MASS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 1331) making appropriation for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

Mr. PLATT. I do not remember that during this discussion any attention has been called to a report made in the other House upon this subject. I should like to inquire, if it be in order, whether a report has been made in the House on this subject, and if so, whether it is for the full amount of this interest or for a less sum?

Mr. JACKSON. My impression is that there has been a House report for a less amount, though I am not entirely sure.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think I can vote for the payment of interest to the extent which the bill provides. It seems to me that it is equitable that the amount of interest which has accrued upon that portion of the securities which were Government bonds, upon which the United States was relieved from the payment of interest while the bonds were in its possession, should be paid; or perhaps it is equitable and proper, and I do not know but that it is according to law, that interest should be paid since the date of the judgment in the Court of Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. That has been paid.

Mr. PLATT. I think that has not been paid, and it is my impression that the committee of the House has reported a bill fixing the amount of interest to be paid as that which has accrued since the date of the judgment of the Court of Claims. I have not had an opportunity to send for the House report, but I think that is the sum which is reported by the House committee. It is not for me to propose amendments to this bill, but on the bill in its present shape I think I shall be obliged to vote in the negative.

Mr. COCKRELL. If there were no interest paid on this judgment after its rendition by the Court of Claims it was the fault of the claimants, not of the law; and I should like to know why it is that they did not follow the law and secure the payment of interest upon the judgment.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course the judgment itself and the interest accruing thereon was paid, because the judgment drew interest.

Mr. COCKRELL. But they claim that they did not get any interest after the rendition of the judgment on the amount of the judgment.

Mr. JACKSON. The Senator will allow me to say that after the rendition of the judgment in the Court of Claims the Attorney-General took an appeal to the Supreme Court in the spring of 1881, and in the fall of 1881 he dismissed that appeal, so that no judgment was rendered in the Supreme Court and no interest was awarded or paid, not a cent.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is an explanation which does not explain anything, I must confess. I read the law, section 1089 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 1089. In all cases of final judgments by the Court of Claims, or, on appeal, by the Supreme Court, where the same are affirmed in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims, on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of a copy of said judgment, certified by the clerk of the Court of Claims, and signed by the chief-justice, or, in his absence, by the presiding judge of said court.

Section 1090 provides:

In cases where the judgment appealed from is in favor of the claimant, and the same is affirmed by the Supreme Court, interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. shall be allowed from the date of its presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment as aforesaid, but no interest shall be allowed subsequent to the affirmance, unless presented for payment to the Secretary of the Treasury as aforesaid.

If when this judgment was rendered and the Attorney-General brought an appeal they had presented a transcript of the judgment to the Secretary of the Treasury, as the law provided, they would have been entitled to 5 per cent. interest upon it. Section 1091 provides:

No interest shall be allowed on any claim up to the time of the rendition of judgment thereon by the Court of Claims, unless upon a contract expressly stipulating for the payment of interest.

Under the general law no interest can be allowed by the Court of Claims upon any judgment rendered therein prior to the rendition of the judgment unless the contract upon which suit has been brought expressly provides for the payment of interest; but just as soon as judgment has been rendered the claimant then has a right to file a certified copy of it with the Secretary of the Treasury, and then that judgment draws 5 per cent. per annum interest thereon from that time. I read section 1092:

SEC. 1092. The payment of the amount due by any judgment of the Court of Claims and of any interest thereon allowed by law as hereinbefore provided, shall be a full discharge to the United States of all claim and demand touching any of the matters involved in the controversy.

Mr. President, this is to my mind a very peculiar case, and it is to me remarkably strange how it is proposed to pay to these claimants an amount of interest greater than the original claim.

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, no.

Mr. COCKRELL. What was the original claim?

Mr. JACKSON. Three hundred and seventy-one thousand and twenty-five dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. And what is the amount here?

Mr. JACKSON. Two hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars.

Mr. COCKRELL. Lacking then about $125,000 of being the amount. Now, Mr. President, what are the facts in this case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has spoken five minutes.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is not under that rule, I will inform the presiding officer with all due deference.

Mr. HARRIS. It has been relieved from the five-minute rule by a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not this morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I object to its consideration.

Mr. PLATT. At the last sitting of the Senate the suggestion was made that some Senator had spoken five minutes or more than once on this bill, and my recollection is that the President pro tempore, then occupying the chair, ruled that this discussion did not proceed under Rule VIII, and the person speaking was permitted to go on and conclude his remarks.

Mr. HOAR. This bill was taken up by vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill came up this morning regularly under Rule VIII as the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to its consideration. Now let the Senator from Massachusetts move to take it up.

Mr. HOAR. I want to state to the Chair that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] was in the chair at the time this bill was considered under Rule VIII. Thereupon, objection being made, the Senate voted to proceed to its consideration notwithstanding the objection. Upon that question I consulted the President of the Senate pro tempore, and the eminent parliamentarian who is now upon his feet [Mr. HARRIS], and I think I am warranted in saying that they both were of opinion that taking it up notwithstanding the objection still left it under Rule VIII, but took away the right of any Senator to object to it, and removed it from the operation of the five-minute restriction of debate.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desire to say, Mr. President, that the very question that is now raised occurred to me yesterday when I chanced to be in the chair when this bill was taken up. I indulged unlimited debate because the Senate had by vote proceeded with the consideration of this bill notwithstanding the objection, and the debate proceeded without limit because of that order. That was my construction. But when the President pro tempore of the Senate returned to the chair, not being absolutely certain as to the correctness of my construction of the rule, I presented the question to him, and he is decidedly of opinion that the consideration of this bill is relieved from the five-minute limit of debate, just as I held it to be by indulging the debate yesterday morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate can proceed by unanimous consent only unless a motion is made to proceed with the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. HOAR. I will not of course appeal from the decision of the Chair under the circumstances, but I will move to proceed with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, Mr. President, I want to make a simple statement of the facts in this case from the record in the Court of Claims. I now read from the sixteenth volume of Court of Claims Reports, 1880, page 55, the following:

At the same time there was in Boston a firm of brokers doing business under the name and style of Mellon, Ward & Co., of which firm the Edward Carter above named was the junior member.

Edward Carter was a member of the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co. He was at the same time the agent of the First National Bank of Newton, stationed in Boston. He was the agent of the bank, and he was also a member of the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., and he it was who induced Mr. Julius F. Hartwell, the disbursing clerk in the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in Boston, to take money belonging to the United States, upon which they engaged in a speculation. Now I read from page 56:

Prior to the 1st day of March, 1867, the said Mellon, Ward & Co., acting by and through the said Carter, had succeeded in inducing the said Hartwell to take out of the subtreasury in Boston, at various times, and place in Carter's hands large amounts of money belonging to the United States.

I read again from page 57:

Carter told Hartwell that he saw no way but to go on, and make his money whole on the 1st of March.

Carter was the agent of this bank and he was a member of the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., and he seduced Hartwell, a Government employé, and induced him to loan them money to operate upon in stock speculations. That is the position of the bank; its trusted agent, the man who did its business, and a Government employé take the money of the United States and it is squandered and stolen. Now why should the United States be liable for interest upon this claim any more than upon thousands and hundreds of thousands of other claims? It languished for years, and judgment was finally rendered, but not a dollar of interest is allowable until after the rendition of the judgment and its presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury. Take the Sugar-rebate cases, where millions of dollars were paid into the Treasury and applied to the extinguishment of the interest-bearing debt of the United States. Afterward a decision of the proper court declared that these payments were not required to be made by law. In other words, the interpretation of the Secretary of the Treasury was not justified, and an excessive tax had been exacted. Those who had paid the money sued, and they got judgment in the proper court. Was any interest paid to them? Their money went into the Treasury; their money extinguished the interest-bearing debt of the United States; but no interest has been paid to them; and are their equities not just as strong as the equities of this bank, whose own trusted agent seduced and induced an official of the Government to betray his trust and take the sacred fund from the Treasury and use it for his private speculations?

There are thousands of cases where money has gone into the Treasury, been applied to the payment of the interest-bearing debt, and the party has recovered it afterward, but no interest has been allowed. I say there is no reason why an exception should be made in this case.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to correct him as to a matter of fact?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that it is true that any person occupying the relation of a trusted agent of the bank did what the Senator says.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was only reading what the Court of Claims said, that Mr. Carter was the trusted agent of the First National Bank of Newton.

Mr. HOAR. "The trusted agent?" Where do you find that?

Mr. COCKRELL. He was intrusted with large sums of money and with delicate and intricate business transactions, and unless he had been trusted he would not have been the agent. Therefore, he was the trusted agent.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, this person was one of the directors of the bank. He had no agency whatever as an individual. He was one of the board of directors. He had an influence. Somebody said the other day in debate that the managing director of the bank did this thing and therefore the bank was responsible. You might as well say that a leading Senator of this body did something and therefore the Senate was responsible. He had no agency, no power to bind the bank.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then who is responsible on the part of the United States? Here is a humble financial clerk in the Boston subtreasury, and he is seduced by the agent of this bank; and the people of the United States, who seem to have no representatives here, are to be mulct in the payment of $249,000 because some insignificant employé in the Boston subtreasury was seduced and bribed to betray his trust.

Where is the equity and justice in this case now? This money comes out of the pockets of the tax-payers of the United States. This man was no more their agent than was any other employé of the Government. He was not the Government of the United States, he was an insignificant officer of theirs, who by reason of the seductive influences held out by this man Carter, the agent of the Newton bank, betrayed his trust and perverted the funds of the people placed in his hands from a legitimate to an illegitimate object, and now the people of the United States are to be held as indorsing the thefts and larcencies of this scoundrel Hartwell, and be made to pay $249,000 for his dereliction of duty when it was superinduced and caused by the agent of this bank.

Mr. President, I fail to see any justice or equity in such a case as this. Mr. Carter was a member of the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co.; he was the agent in Boston of the Newton bank, and he transacted its important business, as the records of the Court of Claims show:

At the same time the said Carter was a special agent, in Boston, of the Newton bank, appointed by the directors thereof to transact the business of the bank connected with Government, and to assist the cashier of the bank in matters pertaining to the bank which required attention in Boston.

He was the agent of the bank appointed by the directors for the express purpose of transacting business with the officers of the United States. They trusted him. He was their trusted agent to confer and transact business with the officers of the United States, and he, for illegitimate gains and profits, seduced and led astray the officer of the United States; and now the people of the United States, the Government, the men who pay all the taxes, are to be mulct $249,000 to this bank for the action of its trusted agent and representative!

Mr. President, I can see no justice in allowing this interest. The greatest amount that could possibly be allowed would be the amount suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, the amount due upon the bonds which were taken and converted. There is pending elsewhere a bill (H. R. 5669) making appropriation for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., and that bill, in its second section, appropriates the sum of $36,746.15 "for the purposes set forth in section 1 hereof, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" and section 1 reads thus:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the judgment rendered in favor of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., against the United States, in the sum of $371,025, from January 24, 1881, to the date of payment of said judgment; also the sum of $17,949, interest on $25,000 in United States bonds and $20,000 in United States interest-bearing notes taken from said bank and deposited in the United States subtreasury at Boston, Mass., on the 28th day of February, 1867.

In other words, the House bill proposes to pay interest upon the judgment from the day of its rendition in the Court of Claims, and then proposes to pay interest on the Government bonds which were canceled and which were found in the subtreasury, and interest on which the Government thereby saved. It was the laches of the claimants that no interest was paid upon the judgment of the Court of Claims, but so far as I am concerned it may have been excusable, and I will not raise that point. It may have been excusable, and therefore I should join with the Senator from Connecticut in saying that I would offer no further opposition to the passage of a bill making the allowance indicated in the House bill. I shall offer that as a substitute for the pending bill.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether in the last of his remarks he refers to the interest on the unpaid portion of the judgment for about ten months?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. There was a large part, two-thirds of the judgment or more, paid within four days after the rendition of the judgment, and the balance of it, one hundred and odd thousand dollars, within ten months.

Mr. COCKRELL. This sets forth the amount. I move now to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what I send to the Chair.

The matter proposed to be inserted was read, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the judgment rendered in favor of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., against the United States, in the sum of $371,025, from January 24, 1881, to the date of payment of said judgment; also the sum of $17,949, interest on $25,000 in United States bonds and $20,000 in United States interest-bearing notes taken from said bank and deposited in the United States subtreasury at Boston, Mass., on the 28th day or February, 1867.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $36,746.15 is hereby appropriated for the purposes set forth in section 1 hereof, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. COCKRELL. I now ask for the reading of a report which I hold in my hand, and in that report I will call attention to one or two facts which were not elicited, or I did not observe them, in the report of the Senate committee.

On the 24th of January, 1881, the First National Bank of Newton obtained in said court a final judgment against the United States in said cause for the principal claimed, namely, $371,025. (See thirteenth Court of Claims Reports.)

On the 28th of April, 1881, it served a copy of the judgment upon the Secretary of the Treasury—

That was three months after the rendition of the judgment—

as is prescribed by section 1090, Revised Statues of the United States. In March, 1881, the incoming Attorney-General of the United States appealed from said judgment to the Supreme Court of the United States, and on the 25th of October, 1881, withdrew the appeal.

On the 29th of October, 1881, the Treasurer of the United States paid $260,000 of said judgment, and waits only for an appropriation to pay the balance.

But it is claimed that the judgment bears no interest, because it is not within the letter of the section 1090 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the bill under consideration is to obtain such interest and have an appropriation made for paying the balance of the judgment.

The act of March 3, 1863, ch. 92, sec. 7 (12 U. S. Stat., 766), provided as follows:

"In all cases of final judgments by said court, or on appeal by the said Supreme Court where the same shall be affirmed in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of a copy of said judgment, certified by the clerk of said Court of Claims, and signed by the chief-justice, or, in his absence, by the presiding judge of said court.

"And in cases where the judgment appealed from is in favor of said claimant, or the same is affirmed by the said Supreme Court, interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. shall be allowed from the date of its presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment as aforesaid."

Now I ask that the whole report may be read, as sustaining the amendment which I have offered.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. COLLINS in the House of Representatives March 4, 1884:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred bill H. R. 751, having considered the same, beg leave to make the following report:

This case was fully investigated by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh Congress, whose favorable report we quote from and make a part of our report, as follows:

"[H. Report No. 353, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

"The State National Bank of Boston was swindled by Hartwell, a United States subtreasury agent, at Boston, Mass., in 1867. It sued the Government, obtained final judgment therefor, and was paid. For the facts, see 10 Court of Claims Reports, 519, and 96 U. S. S. C. Reports, 30.

"The First National Bank of Newton was also swindled by Hartwell at the same time, and substantially in the same way. It brought suit against the United States in the Court of Claims in February, 1873, but allowed its cause to await the final judgment in the suit of the State National Bank vs. The United States, above mentioned. On the 24th of January, 1881, the First National Bank of Newton obtained in said court a final judgment against the United States in said cause for the principal claimed, namely, $371,025. (See 13 Court of Claims Reports.)

"On the 28th of April, 1881, it served a copy of the judgment upon the Secretary of the Treasury, as is prescribed by section 1090, Revised Statutes of the United States. In March, 1881, the incoming Attorney-General of the United States appealed from said judgment to the Supreme Court of the United States, and on the 25th of October, 1881, withdrew the appeal.

"On the 29th of October, 1881, the Treasurer of the United States paid $260,000 of said judgment, and waits only for an appropriation to pay the balance.

"But it is claimed that the judgment bears no interest, because it is not within the letter of the section 1090 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the bill under consideration is to obtain such interest and have an appropriation made for paying the balance of the judgment.

"The act of March 3, 1863, chapter 92, section 7 (12 U. S. Stat., 766), provided as follows:

"'In all cases of final judgments by said court, or on appeal by the said Supreme Court where the same shall be affirmed in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of a copy of said judgment, certified by the clerk of said Court of Claims, and signed by the chief-justice, or, in his absence, by the presiding judge of said court.

"'And in cases where the judgment appealed from is in favor of said claimant, or the same is affirmed by the said Supreme Court, interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. shall be allowed from the date of its presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment as aforesaid; but no interest shall be allowed subsequent to the affirmance, unless presented for payment to the Secretary of the Treasury as aforesaid.'

"Section 1090 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is as follows:

"'In cases where the judgment appealed from is in favor of the claimant, and the same is affirmed by the Supreme Court, interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. shall be allowed from the date of its presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment as aforesaid; but no interest shall be allowed subsequent to the affirmance, unless presented for payment to the Secretary of the Treasury as aforesaid.'

"The first sentence in the act of 1863, quoted above, provides for payment of judgments against the United States, whenever final, either in the Court of Claims (of which that statute was the basis), or if appealed from by the United States, made final by affirmance in the Supreme Court of the United States, and makes the mode of payment simple and prompt.

"The second sentence of the act of 1863, above quoted, provided for payment of interest upon and after notice of either of those facts duly served upon the Secretary of the Treasury. In transferring the quoted law into the Revised Statutes of the United States it was made sections 1089 and 1090. But in section 1090 the 'or' after claimant was changed to 'and.' This changed the law, in the letter, so that no interest can be collected on a final judgment against the United States in said court unless, if it be appealed from, it is also affirmed by the Supreme Court. At least this is the construction of the Treasury Department. Under that construction the United States may simply appeal in every case with or without meritorious ground for appeal, put the claimant to the delay and expense of having the cause docketed and dismissed by the claimant under rule of the Supreme Court, or, worse, wait till the cause is about to be heard and withdraw the appeal and save interest ad interim. For there is no concurrence of final judgment below and affirmance by the Supreme Court, as there is no judgment of the Supreme Court affirming the judgment below. Such a construction manifestly does violence to the intention of the law and to justice between the Government and claimants who obtain judgments against it on its contracts. After any final judgment by its own Court of Claims, and notice thereof served upon the Secretary of the Treasury, it is right for the Government to pay interest unless it shows that judgment below to be wrong. It may be perfectly right for the disbursing officers to stick thus to the letter, for they should pay out no money without plain statutory authority.

"We suppose that the revisers did not intend to produce such an absurdity, but meant to say, 'In cases where the judgment appealed from is in favor of the claimant, and in cases where the same is affirmed by the Supreme Court, interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. shall be allowed,' &c.; that is, on the original judgment."

Among the funds taken from said bank were $25,000 in United States coupon bonds, and $20,000 in United States compound-interest-bearing notes. The interest upon these bonds and notes, of which the Government received the benefit, and of which the bank was deprived by the conversion, amounts to $17,949.

The bill calls for and the counsel for the bank claim interest upon the whole amount ($371,025) from the date of conversion to the date of payment. Many precedents and authorities were cited in support of the claim.

But your committee are of the opinion that while this is an exceptional case, and one of extreme hardship, the general policy of the Government is fixed and declared to be that—

"No interest shall be allowed on any claim up to the time of the rendition of judgment thereon by the Court of Claims, unless upon a contract expressly stipulating for the payment of interest." (Revised Statutes, section 1091.)

The bonds and compound-interest notes are such contracts. The Court of Claims did not allow this interest, and your committee believe that good faith, justice, and equity require the payment thereof.

They therefore report the accompanying bill as a substitute for the one referred to them, and recommend its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. SHEFFIELD. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a very narrow question and depends on very narrow principles, principles that are well settled. The powers of this Government are distributed into three departments. The judiciary department has determined that this debt is due. Out of comity to that department we should regard that judgment as a final judgment, as the end of the matter, and not undertake to go behind it. When the court determined that question it determined at the same time that the United States was the tort debtor of this bank. It is well settled as a matter of law in questions of this character, the court being deprived of the power to grant interest or damages by way of interest, that where the United States are tort debtors interest should be allowed. If that is the case, it seems to me that is the end of the argument; it is a mere cold question of law; and on these principles it seems to me that the whole matter would be easily settled. I may be in error about this, but this is the way the question strikes my mind.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I wish to say a word or two in reference to the objections which have been urged by the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Michigan.

It is a very unusual proceding to me, and could have been objected to as out of order, to bring in a House bill and a House report here to defeat the action of a committee of this body. Here is a unanimous report from a committee of this body who have gone over the whole subject. But let that pass.

What is the position taken by these gentlemen? Let me briefly state the facts, so that the Senate will have its recollection of them refreshed for a moment. Hartwell was the cashier of the subtreasury at Boston. Mellon, Ward & Co. were stock speculators in the city of Boston. Carter was a member of the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., and he was also a director of the First National Bank of Newton, some distance out from Boston. The firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., with Hartwell's consent, got possession of the Government funds; they used them, and lost them in stock speculations. Subsequently, after the loss of those funds, after the Government had sustained this loss, in order to make it good Carter assisted in robbing the Newton bank, and took the stolen assets and placed them in the subtreasury with the knowledge of the Government agent. He did this to make good that loss. Mr. Whittle, the chief clerk, was told by Hartwell himself at the very time he took and appropriated these assets that they were the assets of the First National Bank of Newton. That is the fact disclosed by the record in the court and by the proof before our committee.

The gentlemen are in the position of asserting that because of the accidental circumstances of Carter being a member of the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co., and at the same time a director of the bank, he was justified in making good Hartwell's default by stealing the assets of the bank of Newton! Why, suppose the case of a director of a national bank in the city of Washington conniving and colluding with a paymaster to get possession of Government funds, by which that paymaster becomes a defaulter, and after that money is lost, not a dollar of which ever gets into the bank, as was intimated by the Senator from Michigan in regard to this case—and after that money is lost the man who has thus colluded with the paymaster of the Government to obtain these funds and squander them then robs the bank of which he is a director and places that money there to make good the default, would it be said that that justified the robbery?

The case does not admit of discussion when the facts are understood; but there is no committee of this body and there is no committee report that can answer objections when they are developed from gentlemen's own imaginations. There is not, as argued by the Senator from Michigan, an iota of proof to warrant the idea that the assets which were stolen from the Government by Hartwell ever found their way to the First National Bank of Newton—not a dollar, not a cent, not a single item of the securities, and yet he argues this case as though the same funds came back from the Newton bank which went out of the subtreasury by the default of Hartwell and of Mellon, Ward & Co. That is not the fact.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator will allow me to say that I did not argue that they were the same funds. I did not intend to say that they were the same funds, but I said that they came back through exactly the same source, and from the same person who took out of the subtreasury the money. The transaction was by the same person.

Mr. JACKSON. The RECORD shows that the Senator did say what I have stated. But let me go on. The bank had nothing to do with the original embezzlement, and the highest courts in the land have ascertained every fact in this case, and have stated that by no possibility could the act of Dyer, the cashier, and Carter, the director, have transferred the title either to Hartwell or to the United States in those assets placed there to make good the previous robbery. The United States is first robbed, and after that the money is squandered and lost in speculation, and then the three parties robbed the bank and it is proposed to say that that robbery in favor of the United States is valid and should be sustained.

Mr. President, no interest was allowed in this case as I have stated before; none was allowed after the rendition of the judgment, though every compliance was made with the law, and a committee of the House under some report and under some bill are seeking to give interest from the date of the rendition of the judgment; and that is appealed to here to break down this meritorious claim.

I think it would be a shame for this Government to shield itself behind the fraud and rascality of agents to make a profit out of other people's money, use it to sink and satisfy its own interest, to cancel its own interest-bearing obligation, and employ that money to stay and stop interest on its other obligations, and then to say "we will profit by that fraud" and deny to the private citizens the relief which every court in the land would grant as between private individuals.

How does the fact that the statute forbids jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to allow interest except in cases where it is expressly stipulated for bear on this case? That does not meet the obligation of the Government in a case like this where the private relation of debtor and creditor was not voluntarily assumed. Here is a case where it was involuntarily assumed. The bank was robbed, in the language of the court, and its stolen assets used to make good the previous default of the Government's agent; and at the time of the appropriation the chief clerk was told by Hartwell that these were the assets of the bank of Newton. That is the whole case. If there ever was a case that called for the payment of interest for the honor of the Government this is one.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, it is remarkably strange to me why it is that the distinguished Senators advocating the payment of interest in this case will not come down to the plain, naked fact that Carter was the special agent of the bank of Newton. My friend from Tennessee spoke of Mr. Carter as a member of the firm of Mellon, Ward & Co.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If he were a special agent he was a special agent for some purpose. What purpose was that?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will read what the court says. I never heard of the case until I found the facts stated in the Court of Claims report, upon which you rely. I will read it:

> At the same time the said Carter was a special agent, in Boston, of the Newton bank, appointed by the directors thereof, to transact the business of the bank connected with Government, and to assist the cashier of the bank in matters pertaining to the bank which required attention in Boston.

He was the general agent of the bank of Newton in Boston. Let me read a little further. Finding 7 is:

> At the same time the Newton bank had been appointed, and was, a depository of United States moneys; and received also deposits of collectors of internal revenue; and received from the Government of the United States fractional currency and revenue stamps, ordered by it from the Treasury at Washington, in which said bank did a large business, often sending orders to the Treasury to the amount of $30,000 a week.

Then I read the eighth finding:

> At the same time the said Carter was a special agent, in Boston, of the Newton bank, appointed by the directors thereof, to transact the business of the bank connected with Government, and to assist the cashier of the bank in matters pertaining to the bank which required attention in Boston. The Newton bank ordered the fractional currency and revenue stamps to be delivered, for the sake of convenience, to Carter, in Boston, by mail or express, for they were to be used in that city; and he disposed of the stamps to banks, stationers, and other parties requiring them, and the fractional currency to banks and manufacturing corporations, and returned to the bank the funds derived from such disposition, and those funds were placed by the bank to the credit of the United States Treasury. The stamps were usually sent by mail to Carter by the Internal Revenue Department, and the currency was sent by the Treasury Department to him by express—usually $10,000 at a time—packed in sealed paper boxes.

There he was the general special financial agent in the city of Boston of the bank of Newton, receiving money from the United States, appointed to transact business with the officers of the United States. And now what did he do? Let us see:

> Prior to the 1st day of March, 1867, the said Mellon, Ward & Co., acting by and through the said Carter, had succeeded in inducing the said Hartwell to take out of the subtreasury in Boston, at various times, and place in Carter's hands large amounts of money belonging to the United States, until, first and last, the sums which Hartwell so let Carter have aggregated a million to a million and a quarter dollars.

They were speculating upon these funds and there had been no adjustment of the account. About the last day of February it became necessary to have an account and settlement; the funds in the subtreasury had to be counted, and this man Carter, the special agent of the Newton bank, was the man who went to Hartwell and told him how he could arrange the whole thing; that he would get these drafts and certificates of deposit, and he would take them and place them in the subtreasury, and they would be counted, and the moment they were counted then Hartwell was to deliver them back to him, and he would put them in the bank; and in that way would tide the matter over until they could have a settlement of their transactions. Hartwell was the only living man in the subtreasury (and he was merely the disbursing clerk) who knew anything about it. The Senator from Tennessee speaks about the chief clerk, Mr. Whittle, knowing about this matter. That was after all the larceny and stealing had been committed.

Mr. JACKSON. I beg your pardon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg your pardon. I speak by the record as it is, and I challenge the Senator to show one solitary thing contrary to this statement in the record in the Court of Claims.

Mr. JACKSON. It was the 28th of February.

Mr. COCKRELL. Everything was done then; the assets were there; and Hartwell saw that the storm was coming, and he went and made a confession. That was all there was about it. Hartwell told Whittle and the subtreasurer that he and Carter had been speculating with the Government funds and they had lost, and these things had been put there by Carter, and thereupon the officers of the United States did their duty: they refused to let the thief, Carter, have the securities; they refused to let the principal of the thief Carter take away the stolen goods which he had obtained from the bank as its trusted agent and placed in the hands of the innocent officer of the Government. They did exactly right; and now because the officers of the United States would not recognize the stealing by the scoundrel Carter and his seduction of an employé of the Government by leading him astray and inducing him to permit him to use the funds of the people for speculation, doubtless with the intention of dividing the profits, the tax-payers are to be made to pay $249,000, in violation of the acknowledged and well-established principle of law that no claim against the Government draws any interest until it is in the form of a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction; and there is no reason why that principle of law ingrafted upon our statutes and maintained there for half a century or more shall be set aside in this case. The committee recommend the absolute repeal of that law in this case.

I have been here now nearly ten years, and it is the first instance in the history of the United States Senate in the last ten years that an attempt has been made to override that well-established principle of law, of the statutes, that the United States shall not be made responsible for interest. Here is a case where the principals, who employed a thief and enabled him to seduce and lead astray a poor Government clerk, are trying to take advantage of the larcenies of their own trusted agent, and advantage of the seduction of a mere clerk in the subtreasury, and make the tax-payers of the United States responsible in $249,000; and the Senator from Tennessee thinks that it is a strange thing that a Senator should speak in behalf of the tax-payers of the United States to prevent the payment of this $249,000 as interest on what was stolen by their agent.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. JACKSON. I wish simply to say that I was not talking about the tax-payers or anything but the justice of this claim.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. 491) for the relief of John W. Franklin, executor of the last will of John Armfield, deceased.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 2799) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn.; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. SLATER in section 4, line 14, after the word "class," to insert:

Or shall charge or receive any greater compensation for transporting a similar amount and kind of property a shorter distance than for a longer distance over the same line of road and in the same direction.

Mr. HOAR. I have but a word to say to correct a statement I made the other day. In speaking the other day of the railroad commission and the railroad policy of my own State, I said that while there was a short haul law, so called upon our statute-book, the railroads were not held by it. I think I ought to qualify that statement by stating a fact which has since been called to my attention by a friend in the other House, though I had myself proposed to make the statement before he called the matter to my notice.

There has been no enforcement of that law by the courts so far as I am aware; on the contrary, the only attempt to enforce it failed in consequence of a decision that it was not applicable to the particular case before the court; but the railroad commissioners have certainly in one instance, if not in more than one, called the attention of the railroads to the fact that complaint was made of their charging a larger sum for short distances than for long distances, and the railroads have yielded to the expostulation of the railroad commissioners and reformed their practice in the particular case. I have no doubt that the existence of the law upon the statute-book, and the fact that if the suggestion of the railroad commissioners was not complied with further action might be had, had considerable effect in causing their recommendations to be acceded to; and to that extent I ought to modify what I said the other day, supporting so far as it did go the argument on the other side.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts will concede that an enactment of that kind by the Congress of the United States might have a similar effect upon the railroad system throughout the country.

Mr. President, the position of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that this act of justice proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon will necessarily increase the through rates can not be sustained. The through rate is controlled entirely by other considerations. He says competition from Chicago east is on account of the great lakes and Erie Canal. The railroads now charge up to the highest point water competition allows, and justice to the local shippers could not increase it.

West of Chicago we have no water, therefore no real competition; instead, a system of discrimination and pooling, which the Senator [Mr. ALLISON] alleges is just the thing to protect railroad property.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire that the Senator in making his remarks shall not address himself personally to me and put words in my mouth which I have not uttered. I have said no such thing as is now quoted by the Senator from Nebraska anywhere in any remarks that I have made upon this question.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If the Senator has not used the words his whole line of remark spoke them distinctly. The Senator was arguing substantially from beginning to end that injustice would be done commerce, and when he speaks of commerce he necessarily means the railroads, the channels of commerce, by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon. He said it would be injustice to the people in his State and in mine, because when you decrease the local rates you necessarily force the railroad companies to increase the through rates where competition exists, and, therefore, it was that the proposition to provide that the local rates should not extend beyond the through rates would drive corporations to the necessity of increasing the through rates. That was the argument of my friend. And is that not saying by argument as strong as the Senator could make it that the system we have now is just the thing to protect railroad property and to protect commerce?

The Senator spoke of the water routes being in competition with railroads. So it is from Chicago east; and the rates from Chicago to New York—I think no one will deny that—are fixed on the basis of the water communication by lake and canal; and, therefore, it is no matter what may be the local rates between Chicago and points intermediate to New York; they do not control the through rates, but they are settled by the water communication and the water competition. The Senator well knows that west of Chicago there is no real competition. It is true we have now through his own State and reaching the Missouri River from Chicago no less than six railroads. The through rate from Chicago to Omaha and Council Bluffs is established, because the roads pool and do not compete. Under no circumstances would the roads think to raise it even though compelled to stop extortion on local shippers.

Years ago there were three roads from Chicago to Council Bluffs. Now six or more. Are the rates lower now than when three roads were running? Every new road forces itself into the pool and carries on competition only to secure that end. The great elevators at Council Bluffs, Des Moines, and other cities in Iowa, owned or controlled by a railroad ring, can reach the ears of the Senator from Iowa and assure him the present management is complete, but the multitude of business men and small operators, if enjoying his confidence, could illustrate the extortions which injure business and paralyze trade.

Mr. President, since 1872 all political parties in national and State conventions with great unanimity have demanded redress from grievances in transportation—that no more grants of public lands be given to corporations and that lands not earned be restored to the public domain. Since 1872 the great corporations have stifled the cry of the people, have paralyzed Legislatures and Congress so that but little of redress and no forfeitures have resulted.

WHY?

Jay Gould in his testimony before a committee of the New York Legislature, and Huntington in his wonderful letters, giving historical and biographical sketches of legislators in Congress, make mysterious revelations as to how they claim this work of infamous betrayal of the people is accomplished. So often deceived, their sufferings yearly more intense and bitter, power of corporations more aggressive and defiant, the people have become more in earnest, even to the sundering of party ties.

WARNINGS.

Warnings of the great men long since passed away seem like inspirations. The teachings of Jefferson, discarded by his own party when he declared that in the contest on account of slavery there was no attribute of Deity that could side with them, were made the corner-stone of the Republican platform, and in a hundred battlefields his truths became historic. His other great denunciation of the injustice and despotism of monopoly will become equally so. Had we in our legislation made that the keystone of the arch, as the other the corner-stone, the legions of Democracy had never prevailed against us. Politicans may have a blind man's holiday searching for the reasons of our overthrow, but to the people there is no mystery. So Jackson's proclamation that the Union must be preserved, denounced by his own, became the shibboleth of the party the people spoke into existence and continued for a quarter of a century—became history in the hour of the nation's victory. Had we as devoutly followed and drawn inspiration when he denounced the machinations of monopoly, not now, at the demand of the enemy, would we surrender our baggage and camp equipage.

DISASTER.

We seem to learn no lesson from disaster, and are still trying to amuse and cajole the people, forced to seem to do something or go into still greater retirement in the expiring days of great achievements, when the people have emphasized their determination by the defeat of an organization to which they are still attached. Party managers seem determined their cry shall remain unheeded. They ask for forfeiture. You would give it with such conditions and limitations as will not secure it in another quarter of a century; this through the specious amendment of the Senator from Alabama under the claim of a worshipful respect for the Supreme Court, when the same court in the decisions to which he refers expressly hold that Congress has the power to declare forfeitures which are so absolute that the courts can not disturb them.

POPULAR CLAMOR.

The Senator from Alabama thanked God he had the courage to disregard popular clamor. Many men have done the same without feeling the necessity of thanking God. They had sufficient respect for the Almighty not to hold Him responsible for any such performance.

Politicians not even Senators do not always have that contempt for popular clamor—not when themselves or party seek position. How earnestly they excite, and how gracefully they glide into place and power by, popular clamor!

There were men in the days of the Revolution who boasted they yielded not to popular clamor, but after seven years of privation and war the birth of a new republic showed that in popular clamor the voice of the people was the voice of God.

So in 1860 there were men in the North who boasted they had the courage to despise popular clamor, which grew deeper and more in earnest to resist the aggressions of slavery; still they boasted of their contempt for it, even when that popular clamor was the voice of the nation. And when in the nation's triumph came the second birth of freedom, and the fire-bells in the night, referred to by Jefferson, were sounding the ring of victory, and this country had become in fact as well as in name the land of the free, the voice of the people was the voice of God.

So, to-day, Senators from the Northwest, while the dwellers on the plains of Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska are suffering with granaries full to overflowing and compelled to burn corn as fuel, while the toilers in Wisconsin and Minnesota are selling wheat below the cost of production and secure but a fraction above what the pauper labor of India receives; the Senators from Pennsylvania, where the dependent and unemployed are denied the privilege of increasing production of coal and are suffering for the corn consumed on the prairies; the Senators from New York, where, with bended head, sorrowing heart, and weary fingers, women stitch, stitch their famishing lives into shirts at 3 cents each while perishing for wheat, which the Western farmer produces at an actual loss; the Senators from New England, where thousands of men and women with haggard faces and children of tender years, prematurely grown old, stand, begging to toil, at the closed doors of her factories, where tariff protection had promised immunity from suffering and the privilege to labor at fair recompense—they can all unite in the proud boast of the Senator from Alabama that they have the courage to oppose popular clamor.

But through suffering and gloom, but not through blood and prison-pen, the final victory will again come when, as in '76 and '60, the day of final rejoicing will demonstrate that the voice of the people is the voice of God.

RAILWAY REGULATION.

Now, the people are demanding—and most of the Senators are here on that platform—the regulation of railways and protection from their extortions, and while they "ask for bread you give them a stone."

You propose to amuse them with a commission without power, which really gives the citizen less redress than he has at common law, furnishing an expensive association of five men with a salary to each of $7,500 per annum, much greater than members of Congress receive, and with necessary expenses while traveling, which, by the practices of the Treasury Department, mean expenses for railroad fare, sleeping-car and porter, hotel and laundry bills, wine and lager-beer; so that the salary exceeds that of a Cabinet minister or judge of the Supreme Court. With all this they are given no power to correct abuses or redress wrongs. The only thing required is to write essays.

The bill passed in the House known as the Reagan bill is infinitely better. It declares offenses, affixes penalties, directs the prosecution, and allows the citizen to select attorneys and a State or Federal tribunal. The Senate bill denies all these privileges, and makes the latter end worse than the first. The people only demand reasonable rates, no discrimination, no pooling, no rebates, no greater charge for a short than a long haul.

THE REAGAN BILL.

All these are in the bill passed by the House. And if the Senate is in earnest to redeem pledges solemnly made by leaders of both parties, ostentatiously proclaimed in all platforms, to obey the resolutions of nearly all the Legislatures of the Union to rescue the people from the grinding of the upper and nether millstone—if we desire to rescue the Senate from the suspicions of the nation that it is controlled in the interest of railroads, we have now the opportunity. The Reagan bill enunciates a few principles which the entire nation believes, furnishes a simple remedy; true, only a beginning, but the entering of the wedge that will in the end rend extortion and discrimination.

This is no time to delay. The work of deception can not longer be carried on. You can not pretend a willingness to do something, and that an obstinate or unwilling House of Representatives refuses. If the Senate falters now to accept the House bill, an indignant people will believe that it "palters in a double sense" and is seeking by disagreement to prevent the legislation so long sought and long denied.

The Senate bill promises nothing, not even a slight veneering; the people are in no mood to be trifled with or deceived. It will be an unfortunate day when a Republican Senate declines to accept a measure adopted by a Democratic House in the interest of the people. Our hesitancy now will be our voluntary accusation and will prove in the end our condemnation by the people.

NATURAL LAWS OF TRADE.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] innocently believes that railroad corporations, like kings, can do no wrong; that stocks and bonds represent actual money expended; that pooling is one of the sources of our national prosperity, and under that we can never be miserable. I commend to his careful consideration the decision of an Ohio court that a railroad had actually wronged a citizen of that State by discriminating against him in favor of the Standard Oil Company, a gigantic corporation, into which railroad magnates had entered; wronged the State by driving honest men out of business, the extent of which may be imagined when it is reported that this company has received in rebates from railroads $10,000,000 in sixteen months.

This adjudicated case is only one of thousands establishing the injustice and robbery of discrimination extending to all branches of commerce, to grain and meats. They own and control elevators, and the farmer, if he desires, can not possibly ship his own grain and cattle, for he can obtain no rebates. Then, that no greater sum shall be charged for a short haul than a long one, the West is to be frightened by the threat that no more grain can be shipped to the East. The proposition does not affect the through rate, only this—no more shall be charged for hauling a car from New York to Philadelphia than from New York to Chicago; no pretense that the charge should be a pro rata of the through rate; only, no more should be charged for carrying a car fifty miles than five hundred miles. No farmer in the West is opposing this. Only railways see a lion in the path.

The power of absolute control by railroads is not always exercised in a saintly manner by the saints certified by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. Let me illustrate: The Union Pacific became incensed at Columbus, an active interior city of Nebraska, whose citizens were enterprising and aided to secure another road, thinking the natural laws of trade would promote their prosperity. But the Union Pacific became indignant at this attempt on the part of a public-spirited community for the development of the natural laws of trade, and determined they should be punished for such temerity and rebellion, for Columbus was called, in the vernacular of railroads, "in their territory." So rates were changed, and more was charged per car-load from Omaha than to Kearney and points farther West.

So, the Central Pacific, without the excuse of revenge or punishing rebellious subjects in their territory, actually charge to points east of San Francisco through rates to San Francisco and then local rates back. For instance, from New York to San Francisco a car is charged $300. That must be considered according to railroad honesty a fair rate, for they fixed it without competition. Then to a point six hundred miles east of San Francisco, where the car is stopped, they charge $300, the rate to San Francisco, and $500 back, the local rate, making that car cost $800, while the one carried six hundred miles farther is only charged $300. Is it not evident railroads should be restricted from exacting more for the short haul than the long one? Will some Senator defend this, and then show how the natural laws of trade can stop such outrages? The same is practiced on the Northern Pacific.

STOCK-WATERING.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] also says, with apparent earnestness and innocence, that he thinks the stock is not much watered, very slightly diluted. Poor's Manual, an acknowledged authority with railroad men, shows that nearly two-thirds is watered. If that does not satisfy the Senator I beg to refer him to a letter written April 23, 1884, by a distinguished statesman from his own State, in which he says:

> By purchase on the same terms as they were sold on the Boston market to all applicants; sold to * * * and to other reputable merchants. He negotiated for a block of the securities, which were divided as usual in such enterprises into three kinds—first-mortgage bonds, second-mortgage bonds, and stock. The price, I think, was 3 for 1. That is, the purchaser got first-mortgage bonds for his money and an equal amount of second-mortgage or land-grant bonds, and of stock thrown in as the basis of possible profits. * * * I went myself at this time into several adventures of the kind on that ratio, and have always understood that Senator —— and his friends got their interest in the Burlington and Missouri road on the same basis of 3 for 1. * * * I know of my own knowledge that Governor ——, Mr. ——, and Senator ——, and many of my friends while in Congress acquired and held interest in such enterprises.

He says that he made his investments on that basis, and that the men of Boston do this. That, of course, is the end of the law and testimony. Boston does it approvingly; that probably accounts for the disregard of popular clamor by New England Senators.

Certainly, stocks and bonds according to this evidence are owned in this Chamber and the other end of the Capitol on that basis; that is, you put down one dollar and take up three. So it would appear even members of Congress learn where the little joker is.

No wonder there is here manifested the same contempt for public clamor as Vanderbilt is said to have exhibited in language more forcible but not so reverential as by distinguished Senators.

According to the written and printed statement of one New Jersey statesman and Poor's Manual $4,000,000,000 fictitious watered stock is represented in the stocks and bonds of railroads. On this, interest and dividends are collected from the people, made a mortgage on every acre of land in the Republic—an inflation paralyzing industry, laying a tax upon the producer and consumer; yet we must remand all this to the natural laws of trade.

Who are the railroad corporations for which so much sympathy is expressed in this Chamber? Mainly a half score of syndicates of millionaires, made millionaires by the manipulation of these same roads. We are asked to further submit to extortion and stock-watering on the plea of the "innocent purchasers." For the last ten years there have been few innocent purchasers without notice. Whoever buys railroad stocks well knows the hazard he runs. The whole world is advised of the suspicions and fraud attending. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] must well know that since the report he in part made as Representative in the House denouncing the frauds of the Union Pacific, frauds which he and his colleagues said were sufficient to have the charter forfeited, the crimes and frauds which he denounced not only were continued, but increased and made public, so there could be really few innocent purchasers; but the small holders of stock, supposed to be innocent, are only used as a breastwork behind which the managers can hide and inveigle Senators into their service.

JEFFERSON AND JACKSON ON MONOPOLIES.

Pardon a sentiment from Jefferson:

The truth is that capital may be produced by industry and accumulated by economy, but jugglers only will propose to create it by legerdemain and tricks with paper. * * * Our citizens will be overtaken by the crash of this baseless fabric without other satisfaction than that of execrations on the heads of those functionaries who from ignorance, pusillanimity, or corruption have betrayed the fruits of their industry into the hand of projectors and swindlers. * * * It is raising up a moneyed aristocracy in our country which has already set the Government at defiance. * * * These have taken deep root in the hearts of that class from which our legislators are drawn. * * * And thus those whom the Constitution have placed as guards to its portals are suborned from their duties. * * * A general demoralization, a filching from industry its honest earnings wherewith to build up palaces and raise gambling stock for swindlers who are to close their career of piracies by fraudulent bankruptcies. * * * My dependence for a remedy, however, is with the wisdom which grows with time and suffering.

So Jackson, whom the 8th day of January keeps in grateful remembrance, said:

It is to be regretted that the rich and powerful too often bend the acts of government to their selfish purposes. Distinctions in society will always exist under every just government. * * * In the full enjoyments of the gifts of Heaven and the fruits of superior industry, economy, and virtue every man is equally entitled to protection by law. But when the laws undertake to add to these natural and just advantages artificial distinctions, to grant titles, gratuities, and exclusive privileges, to make the rich richer and the potent more powerful, the humble members of society, the farmers, mechanics, and laborers, who have neither the time nor the means of securing like favors to themselves, have a right to complain of the injustice of their government. There are no necessary evils in government; its evils exist only in its abuses. * * * Many of our rich men have not been content with equal protection and equal benefits, but have besought us to make them richer by acts of Congress.

At this day Jefferson and Jackson would be stigmatized as cranks and demagogues. They did not evidently bless God that they "were not as other men," and take courage to repel popular clamor. So did not the great Lincoln, who boasted that he did not create, but followed and was guided, by popular clamor.

CORN AND COAL.

In Kansas and Nebraska fifty bushels of corn will not purchase one ton of soft coal; one hundred and fifty bushels will not buy one ton of hard coal. Your sympathy expands for the pauper labor of Europe and India, while your hearts seem steeled against the cry for bread from the Americans who are forced to work at starvation wages or have their places supplied in the mines, by the specially protected mine-owners, by pauper and convict labor imported under contract from Europe.

You see an embargo placed upon the transportation of corn to the East and coal to the West—and you relegate to the tender mercies of Gould and Vanderbilt the problem of the natural laws of trade, to the uncontrolled avarice and extortion of stock gamblers, who are as merciless in demanding interest and dividends on 4,000,000,000 watered stocks and bonds as English landlords, who would take bread from the mouths of the Irish tenants. Possibly a Representative or Senator might be as unwilling as either to forego any legislation that would depreciate the three dollars for one actually expended, and to consent to any legislation which would prevent the usual dividends on stocks and bonds for which he paid nothing. So, too, in Minnesota and Wisconsin, the men who elect Representatives and Senators on the theory they will represent them and protect their interest must give nearly twenty bushels of wheat for a ton of soft coal or forty for a ton of hard.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 20 last, "The railways will elude, evade, and openly transgress the restrictions;" "The railways, if these restrictions should become laws, will ostentatiously break them all;" said to have been uttered on the floor of the House of Representatives.

A Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] blandly gives them saintly attributes—a New Jersey Representative refers to them as despotic as masters, and gives notice that the laws will not be obeyed; still this property goes on capitalized on the basis of 3 to 1.

MORAL SUASION.

The Senate bill is gentle moral suasion very much watered.

This is the bill the railroads have been begging from Congress, just as the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is providing the panacea they have been desiring to administer to the American people, not only begging but denouncing Congress for not creating a commission. Only yesterday, in the city of New York, where her merchants before the railroad commission were seeking the redress given by that State, the New York Central and Vanderbilt appeared and by counsel, substantially admitted the grievances, and claimed that it was an interstate grievance, and any action there could only affect New York roads. Said the eloquent attorney, "What is needed is the appointment of a national commission, having powers similar to those of the New York and Massachusetts boards. If the idiots at Washington would establish such a board much could be done to rectify whatever grievances exist, and which are conceded." This was more unkind than the gentle suggestion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], who intimated the Senate was only "suspected," whereas the New York Central insists it is idiotic. The public at large will accept one or the other of the conclusions suggested.

We trust, now that Vanderbilt has given his approval of some power in a commission, that the Railroad Committee will consent to insert in their bill that quantum of power which Vanderbilt kindly assures us in advance he will accept.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is fearful we will do too much. Pass this bill, he need have no anxiety; it will be as near nothing as legislative dexterity can make it. Here is a great and acknowledged wrong. The people of every State understand it if Senators do not. The remedy is simple. Make extortion, discrimination, and pooling a crime, provide penalties, and make the State and Federal courts open, and you will then have made a beginning. There should be no dread in that even for a Senator from Iowa.

The modesty and meekness and confession of ignorance is amazing. This body claims to be fully informed on every subject of legislation—about Japan, China, India; as to the sufferings of the nations from the exactions of England, Russia and Turkey, Congo and Africa; even willing to grasp the great problem of a commercial treaty with Spain and a treaty for building a canal with Nicaragua, if correctly reported in the newspapers; but the entrance of the railway problem strikes consternation and paralyzes this great body into a protestation of weakness and ignorance, and they try to conceal each and distract the nation by seeking refuge in a commission.

To-day the farmers in the West are working their own farms on shares, the railroads taking the lion's share; they receive not a dollar profit or interest on money invested in land, teams, and machinery. Other industries are equally depressed. Yet the American Senate seem intent on how not to do it; determined, at whatever sacrifice, that railroad stocks and bonds shall secure liberal interest and dividends, and great lamentation is made if stock gamblers, who have stolen $4,000,000,000 from the industries of the nation, shall be disturbed in wringing interest on the same from an overburdened people. You stand apologizing for the swindlers who are wrecking still more the prosperity of the people.

THE CONTRAST.

Look at Kansas and Nebraska, great and rich in the wealth of their soil, the energy and intelligence of their people; yet Jay Gould, who neither toils nor spins, has greater wealth than the assessed property, real and personal, of both States. And Vanderbilt could buy both States, their farms and lands, villages and cities, hotels, banks, manufactories, and railroads, and have a snug fortune of $40,000,000 left for the necessaries of life and to keep the wolf from the door.

NO NEED FOR APOLOGIES.

Do you believe these millions were acquired honestly and by legitimate means? Yet the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] trembles lest we shall do too much, and before these worse than feudal robbers we must seem to apologize and indicate the awe with which these colossal wrongs are approached and the great risk we are assuming, and disclaim our hearty disinclination to rend the spoiler of his prey. In the language of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]:

I do not stand here in any sense whatever as the advocate or champion of that cheap system of demagogy that appeals to public opinion against railroads. I would as much resist injustice to railroads as I would resist injustice to the humblest settler in the remotest dugout upon the frontier of the West. Railway corporations are the creatures of the law. They are entitled to the protection of the law.

The two men who each can purchase the States of Kansas and Nebraska certainly need no proffer of assistance. No possible danger of injustice can come to them. It is the dweller in the dugout who with raised hands is appealing to the protection of the law. The Senator never believed strong and arrogant slavery in the days of its control of Congress and the judiciary needed sympathy and proffers of assistance as did the slave manacled and cringing beneath the lash. Corporations behind four billions of stolen property, for years controlling State Legislatures, the national Congress, the judiciary as remorselessly as did slavery, need not the sympathy or active support of Senators. It is the toiler seeking labor in the furnace heat, in the underground labyrinth, the settler in the dugout on the frontier of Kansas and Nebraska, whose wives and children are drawing warmth from corn because great corporations refuse to reduce the rates of freight so the coal of Pennsylvania may be exchanged for the corn of the West.

This position is sustained by an authority which will not be questioned by any Senator. Charles Francis Adams, jr., now the president of the Union Paific Railroad, in his chapters on Erie years ago, spoke of the great State of New York as enslaved by two great corporations, the New York Central and Erie:

> Vanderbilt, embodying the autocratic power of Cæsarism, introduced into corporate life the Erie ring, representing the combination of a corporation and the hired proletariat of a great city. The system of corporate life as applied to industrial development is yet in its infancy. It always tends to development, always to consolidation. It is ever grasping new powers or insidiously exercising covert influences. Even now the system threatens the General Government.
> In a few years more we shall see corporations as much exceeding the Erie and the New York Central both in ability and will for corruption as they will exceed these roads in wealth and length of iron track. We shall see these great corporations spanning the continent from ocean to ocean. Now their power is in its infancy. In a very few years they will re-enact in a larger theater and on a grander scale, with every feature magnified, the scenes which were lately witnessed on the narrow scale of a single State.

His prophecy of fifteen years ago is history to-day. Does the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] believe that Mr. Adams at that time "stood as the advocate or champion of that cheap system of demagogy that appeals to public opinion against railroads?"

For twenty years these corporations have grown rich, strong, and defiant, in violation of law, and now let us see to it that the protection of the law shall be given to those who are the victims of their extortion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, line 14, after the word "class," it is proposed to insert:

> Or shall charge, or receive, any greater compensation for transporting a similar amount and kind of property a shorter distance than for a longer distance over the same line of road and in the same direction.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Before proceeding to discuss the amendment, which I shall do very briefly, I wish to state that I did not correctly understand or hear the references made by the Senator from Nebraska to the position I had taken upon this question. If there is anything for me to answer in what he has said, when I see his speech in print I will undertake to answer it then. But I should like to have the Senator from Oregon give me a little attention in order that I may vote intelligently on the amendment which he has offered.

It seems to me it can not be possible that the framers of the Constitution ever intended any such exercise of Congressional power as is embodied in the amendment he proposes. As there is no way of presenting a subject so forcibly as by illustration, if the Senator from Oregon will permit me to illustrate my argument, I will then wait for an answer. It is well known to the Senator that there are different stages of transportation. There is a line of railroad, say, starting from New York that runs to a certain great distributing point, as Buffalo or Pittsburgh, and there ends. There are other lines of railroad separate and distinct in their organization, yet perhaps composing in a measure parts of the eastern trunk lines reaching from Pittsburgh and Buffalo to Chicago. I name Chicago because it is the greatest distributing point in the West.

I will now mention two railroads whose tonnage is greater than that of any two other railroads in the world, the New York Central Railroad and the Pennsylvania Railroad. The New York Central is within the territory of a single State in which the laws of that State are supreme, and is entirely beyond the grasp of the amendment of the Senator from Oregon which he proposes to this bill. It runs for four hundred and fifty miles, or one-half the distance from New York to Chicago, in one State. The Pennsylvania Railroad, in like manner starting from the city of Philadelphia, is within the territory of a single State, subject not to this law but to the supreme control and power of that State, and it runs almost an equal distance toward Chicago, the great point of distribution, in one State. These two railroads, subject only to State control and beyond the reach or grasp of this bill, make such local rates as the State laws permit. As to the other lines starting from both Buffalo and Pittsburgh as objective points, these roads make such rates to Chicago as will best tend to destroy their adversaries. Who are the adversaries? Let me name them.

The West Shore Railroad is an interstate road under the provisions of this bill. It runs through the States of New York and New Jersey. The Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, another competing line, runs through the territory of three States, to wit, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. The New York and Erie Railroad, another great trunk line, runs through the territory of three States, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, yet it has both ends of its line in the State of New York. The Baltimore and Ohio Railway between Pittsburgh and Baltimore runs within the territory of three States, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Maryland. Two of the railroads I have named therefore as to every act and thing within the power or control of the corporation are within the territory of a single State; they make such rates as the State laws permit, while the other lines, the West Shore, the Delaware and Lackawanna, the New York and Erie, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Lehigh Valley, and such other lines as may connect with them, are interstate railroads within the meaning of this bill.

The New York Central may take freights at Buffalo low for the purpose of driving a rival out of the city of Buffalo, say at $10 a car for through freight between Buffalo and New York, and that will not interfere with or in any manner control the rates for local traffic on that road, while if the Erie, the West Shore, the Delaware and Lackawanna, and other competing lines reduce the through rate to $10 a car they will be required to reduce the rate on local traffic in the same proportion. Thus it is within the power of the two great corporations to absolutely bankrupt the others and to drive them out of the market entirely. Is not that plain? The others, being interstate railroads, would be forced to make their local rates proportionate to the through rates; while the two stronger corporations, located as I have named, would have the power to earn sufficient on local freights, added to the rates on the through business, to give them a reasonable compensation for the whole. So it is made the interest of both these great roads to drive off every rival, and when that is done they can make such rates as they please.

Mr. President, I do not believe it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to put in the power of any body by legislation here, however just and fair and equitable it may seem upon its face, to destroy capital in that way. The bonds of the Erie Railway, the West Shore, the Delaware and Lackawanna, and the Baltimore and Ohio are held by whom? Very largely by trust companies, fiduciary trusts, the property of the widow and the orphan in very many cases; and I believe it is as much the duty of Congress, if it can be done without violation of the great public interests of all the people, to refrain from legislation which absolutely, in effect, destroys the property of those unable to defend themselves. When you come to add together the vast amounts of money dependent upon fair and equitable rates of transportation which are held in investments by parties entirely unable to defend themselves, it certainly seems to me a proper subject for the Senate to consider that interest.

Now, sir, I can not myself subscribe to a doctrine which permits a condition of things to exist that absolutely prevents all competition entirely. The result of the pending amendment added to this bill will simply be to enable the New York Central and the Pennsylvania Railroads, happily located as they are with respect to the terms of the bill, to bankrupt every competing company and at the same time lay such rates as will enable themselves to profit. That is my objection to the amendment. I based my objection to it the other day principally upon the ground that I thought the Senator from Oregon should permit the two main propositions to stand as they appeared before the Senate. When he presents his substitute, as I understand he proposes to do, in the form substantially of the Reagan bill from the House of Representatives, then you will find a bill consistent in all its parts for a practical working machinery; but to ingraft this amendment upon the present Senate bill would be to destroy absolutely its effect and at the same time to destroy the Senate bill. I would rather vote upon the two distinct propositions separately than undertake to revise and reform this bill by the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon, and I submit to that Senator, if I am correct in my view, whether he himself would then vote for a proposition which is so damaging in its results. I should like to have the Senator from Oregon answer the case I have stated.

Mr. SLATER. The Senator's practice is like that of some individuals I have heard of. He imagines a case that suits the purposes of his argument, and then asks some one to meet it. However, I will endeavor to answer some of the points as I have gathered them from the Senator.

He has presented, as illustrations of his meaning, certain railroads having their centers on the east in New York and on the west in Buffalo, and another road in Pennsylvania, from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, as contrasted with roads that are interstate roads; but more particularly does he draw attention to the case of the New York and Erie as a competitor to other roads whose western terminus is Buffalo and eastern terminus New York, they passing through two or more States and being interstate roads, while the New York and Erie is a road entirely within the jurisdiction of a single State, as I understood him.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator will allow me to say that as a matter of fact the Erie road is not wholly within the State of New York, but passes through a small portion of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SLATER. I understand that to be correct; but the question was whether in moving freight from Buffalo to the city of New York the Erie road had not the advantage and could make the charge $10 per car-load.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The New York Central.

Mr. SLATER. The New York Central, I should have said. I understand the pith of the inquiry to be that the New York Central is a road entirely within the jurisdiction of New York, and the question is asked whether in hauling freight from Buffalo to New York by the Erie or by some of the interstate roads that pass portions of the way through other States with the same class of freight to New York city the New York Central would not have power under this amendment to destroy these other roads.

I do not undertake to say but that it might have some power to damage the other roads. But there is another question that would attach to the freight, and that is what we are trying to reach as controlling this matter. We are not reaching links of railroad, but endeavoring to reach streams of commerce. There are classes of commerce classified as State commerce within one State which are excluded from the operation of our bill. That which comes within its provisions is interstate commerce. The question would be whether a car-load of freight shipped from Buffalo to New York city, both being within the same State, over a line of road that might pass somewhere through some other State or part of some other State, would be interstate commerce or State commerce. My impression is that the place of its original starting and the place of its destination would determine its character as interstate or State commerce if it came from a point outside of New York, and although it might pass through other States in its transit, it would be interstate commerce. What constitutes interstate commerce is that it is commerce that passes from a starting-point in one State to a destination in another State; and in this instance the starting-point and the destination of the freight would be in the same State The fact that it passed through other States would be an immaterial matter.

Mr. MCPHERSON. According to the Senator's own statement, then, I suppose he admits that as to freight taken by the New York Central between New York and Buffalo as local freight it would have to pay local rates.

Mr. SLATER. Certainly; within the limits of one State.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator very well knows that more than 75 per cent. of the grain that leaves Chicago goes to Buffalo by lake. It goes into elevators there for a market, and either for consumption throughout the country or for shipment in this direction or any other direction as occasion may require; and the New York Central as to that freight is not hampered by this bill.

Still further, let me ask the Senator how will this bill reach this condition of things? The main line and the property of the New York Central Railway are within the State of New York. It is also the owner, so to speak, or we will say the lessee, of a line of railroad running to Chicago, or has intimate connection with some railroad running to Chicago. Grain is shipped from Chicago to Buffalo on a separate waybill, without any knowledge, we will assume, on the part of the shipper of what is to be done with it after it reaches Buffalo. It is then taken on another waybill by the New York Central Railroad to New York. It is the habit of the New York Central Railroad and of the Pennsylvania Railroad to make a separate waybill for all property over those distinctive lines of road. The first bill is from Chicago to Buffalo, the second from Buffalo to New York, and to avoid and evade the whole bill, if these railroads should so determine, they could provide that a shipper who shipped his goods from Chicago to Buffalo could then by telegraph order them further, and I wish to know under that condition of affairs if your bill could be made effective?

Mr. SLATER. It would be a matter of very extreme doubt whether that class of freight could be reached by any bill Congress might pass. That course would seem to so affect that class of freight as to make it State commerce and not interstate commerce. Therefore we need not worry ourselves about that class of freight; we need not bring up phantoms here of possible danger or doors of possible evasion to meet a plain proposition that is intended to correct the evils that the country is now suffering from.

Another point. The Senator, it seemed to me, asked if it would not be better that the direct question should come between the House bill and the amendment which is now pending as a subsittute, known as the Reagan bill, instead of this clause being interpolated into the Senate bill, it being, as he said, a different system or framed on a different line of policy. That is a point with me. As was stated by the Senator who preceded the Senator from New Jersey and myself, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK], I regard the Senate committee bill now under consideration as the nearest step to nothing in the form of legislation that a bill could be proposed in this body. I want to get something into it that will have some merit in the way of striking at some of the evils; and, unless we can get something of this character into it, it is but a shadow and it will prove to be worthless, so far as regards remedying any of the evils that are now complained of. It may turn out, and very likely it will turn out when the vote shall come between the Senate committee bill now under consideration and the House bill for which it is to be offered as a substitute, that a majority will sustain the present bill and make that the action of the Senate; and if that should be so, I desire in that contingency that we shall have so much at least of the Reagan bill as I have now offered in the bill that shall receive the sanction of the Senate.

I do not apprehend the difficulty that the Senator from New Jersey speaks of in destroying these railroads, or any of them. Suppose his position is correct, and suppose it should turn out when these cases come before the courts that freight shipped from Chicago to New York by a route of transportation that passes through more than one State should be held to be interstate commerce and not State commerce, and that the route of transportation shall determine the character of the freight, not the points of shipment and destination as I think. Suppose I am incorrect in my view, what then? The result is simply that it would devolve upon the State of New York and the State of Pennsylvania to see that injustice was not done within their States. Congress will have done its duty, and it will then devolve upon the State of New York and the State of Pennsylvania to meet Congress and correct the evils within those States and make the system harmonious.

I think I have now answered the Senator's question.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the peculiar wording and connection of this amendment with the fourth section of this bill. As I understand, if the amendment were to be adopted it would be an effort on the part of Congress to undertake to regulate not interstate commerce, but the commerce of the respective States, and I do not suppose the Senator will undertake to say that we have any such authority as that here. This amendment, taken in connection with the operative words of the section to which it relates, would read as follows:

That if any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce shall charge, or receive, any greater compensation for transporting a similar amount and kind of property a shorter distance than for a longer distance over the same line of road and in the same direction * * * it shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination.

The Senate will observe that in the fourth section of the bill as it stands the words "in its transaction of interstate commerce" occur in connection with what is declared to be prohibited or provided for in both instances; that is to say, it reads in respect to one of these clauses as follows:

That if any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce shall, directly or indirectly, by any rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person a greater compensation for any service it may render in its transaction of interstate commerce than it charges, &c.

And in the other case it says:

And if any such transportation company shall neglect or refuse to furnish the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of interstate commerce freights, &c.

So that the section of the bill now under consideration very carefully provides that the action here proposed shall relate only to interstate commerce, while, as I understand the effect of this amendment, it would relate not only to that, but to the commerce of every State of the Union. It would, therefore, as I have stated, be doing what I think we have clearly no power whatever to do; and, so far as my own State is concerned, if we had the power I could not consent to the doing of that thing, because the people of that State, by the adoption of the constitution of 1873, have regulated that subject for themselves. In the third section of the seventeenth article of that constitution I find the following:

Persons and property transported over any railroad shall be delivered at any station at charges not exceeding the charges for transportation of persons and property of the same class in the same direction to any more distant station; but excursion and commutation tickets may be issued at special rates.

Therefore I find myself compelled, if I am disposed to observe what the people of my own State have done upon this subject, to vote against the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

But I am not able to bring my judgment to favor this proposition even if it were properly worded. It will be observed, by careful attention to this provision of the constitution of Pennsylvania, that the State convention which framed that instrument employed words very carefully to guard against any possible misconstruction or trouble in relation to this subject.

It will be seen that the prohibition against charging more for a shorter than for a longer distance does not, according to the terms of the amendment now proposed, relate to every case of a shorter distance, but it only relates to cases of shorter hauls where the freights shall be taken up contemporaneously, in the same train of cars, if you please, at the same time and place. The reasons in the one case might be strongly in favor of such a proposition, while in the other, to my mind, they might be and in many instances would be strongly against it. It is entirely a different thing to say, as the Senator proposes by the amendment, that you shall stop at every way station along a great line of railroad to take up freight as well as to deliver it, and that you shall not consider the inconveniences and the increased expense which would attend the adoption of such a rule in regard to the transportation of freight over it.

But, Mr. President, I did not intend and do not intend to speak at any length upon this proposition. Possibly when the bill shall reach a further stage, and the measure which is so radical, known as the Reagan bill, is proposed to be substituted for this bill, I may avail myself of the opportunity to say something further. I take it that the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Oregon does not carefully guard and secure precisely what he endeavors to reach.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER].

Mr. SLATER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like the Senator from Oregon to state whether in his opinion it is right that the railroad corporations should receive the same compensation for transporting a similar amount and kind of property a shorter distance than for a longer distance over the same line of road and in the same direction?

Mr. SLATER. I think there are many instances in which that may be justified. I think I could state a good many instances where it is a very common practice, especially in transporting bulky freight for export and the purpose is to get it to a market where it may be exported, to make common points on the line of the road.

Mr. INGALLS. Suppose it were not more than half the distance? I can readily understand that if the difference was a mile or five miles in a haul of a thousand miles, it might perhaps be de minimis to say that the transporters should make a discrimination between nine hundred and niney-five miles and one thousand miles; but suppose the respective distances are five hundred miles and a thousand miles, does the Senator then think it would be right to charge the same amount for five hundred miles that is charged for a thousand miles?

Mr. SLATER. That would be perhaps an extreme case.

Mr. INGALLS. But a possible case.

Mr. SLATER. Under the law as it would be it might be a possible case.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it not a case that occurs every day?

Mr. SLATER. I do not think it is a case that we could properly deal with.

Mr. INGALLS. But now let us come down to the practical aspect of the case. Suppose a railroad company should do that, does the Senator think it would be justifiable; that is to say, if it should charge the same for five hundred miles that it would charge for a thousand miles on the same road, and for carrying similar property, and in the same direction?

Mr. SLATER. I must answer the Senator by making a statement of the case that will show his position to be that because we can not remedy in this provision all the possible evils, because we can not reach all we must not try to reach any. Take the case that I gave the other day, where $200 was asked for a car-load to Portland, Oreg., and $400 was asked for the same car-load to be carried one hundred miles short of Portland. Under the provisions of the amendment the company would have been entitled to charge $200 for the shorter haul. We propose by the amendment to say that it shall not in a case like that charge $400; but now the Senator supposes a case, for instance, five hundred miles farther east of Portland, where the company proposes to charge the same price that it does at Portland. As a matter of course there would be an apparent, at least, if not a real, discrimination, one that perhaps in time we may find some means of remedying or preventing, but they are doing precisely that on the Union and Central Pacific and on the Northern Pacific roads now. All the roads beyond a certain point, I do not now remember where, in the western part of Montana are charging these extortionate rates. Shippers must pay all the way to Portland and then back again, which makes the rate more than double; and because the amendment does not reach a possible danger—the logic of the Senator's question and argument is that—therefore we must do nothing at all. I admit that the amendment will not reach the case that the Senator supposes; I admit that the supposed case would be one of wrong; but the amendment does not propose to reach that class of wrong.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not the amendment justify and permit that wrong?

Mr. SLATER. Not at all. It is possible now.

Mr. INGALLS. Then there is no possible interpretation that can be put upon language. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. It says that the company shall not charge a greater amount, therefore it may charge the same amount, and you leave this whole subject open to the most odious and invidious discrimination about which complaint has existed. That is to say, take shipments of grain from Chicago to New York; if this provision shall be adopted, suppose it costs $100, for example, to ship a car-load of wheat from Chicago to New York city. The amendment, if adopted, will allow the railroad corporation to charge $100 for shipping a car-load of wheat to Fort Wayne, to Cleveland, to Buffalo, and to every intermediate point. That is exactly the evil that is complained of, and when the Senator puts in his amendment the declaration that they shall not charge a greater amount he simply gives away the whole principle.

The amendment is a Trojan horse. It introduces into legislation the worst elements that have ever been complained of in practice and gives them the sanction of law.

Mr. SLATER. The answer to all that is that the railroads practice these very extortions now; and because the amendment does not propose to extirpate all the extortions at once the argument is that we shall not extirpate any of them.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; you do not propose to correct any of them. That is where the Senator leaves this question by his amendment. By saying that they shall not charge a greater amount for a short haul than they do for a long haul he leaves it lawful for them to charge the same amount. Therefore the railroad corporation that charges a hundred dollars for a car from Chicago to New York is permitted by the amendment to charge a hundred dollars for a car to a point ten miles east of Chicago. If the Senator from Oregon regards that as an adequate correction of the evil which has existed by way of discrimination by railroad corporations I think he has been excessively unfortunate in his choice of terms.

Mr. SLATER. For years the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific have charged $700 per car for freight to Reno and other points east of the Cascade Mountains, while they only charge $300 per car to San Francisco. Under the provisions of the amendment they could not charge a greater price to Reno or to Virginia City or other points eastward of San Francisco than they charge to San Francisco; but because it does not go so far as to say that they shall prorate, and does not extirpate all the evils that come in there, the argument is that we must do nothing because we can not make a complete equitable arrangement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this is a very complex and difficult question, but it is perfectly apparent to my mind that there is no justice in the world in charging more for a short haul than for a long one. It can not be justified upon any principle of right or justice.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it right to charge the same for a short haul as for a long one?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; it is not right to do that. The amendment allows that to be done, but forbids charging any more.

It has been in proof before a committee of the other House that from Omaha city to San Francisco a railroad company would charge $300 for a through trip, and to Virginia City, or a point upon the same road, $800 would be charged. Before the same committee it appeared that from Cincinnati to New York, by a road running through Pittsburgh, nearly twice as much was charged upon a car-load of wheat and flour to Pittsburgh as to New York from Cincinnati. Will any man say that is just or right? Will any man say that the intermediate shippers are to be taxed, that they are to contribute to make up the losses which the railroads may sustain at terminal points by being compelled by competition with other roads to carry at a less rate than will pay a fair and just compensation?

All the railroads do not practice this extortion, let me say. There is a railroad running through my State which does not practice it. The Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad runs from Louisville through Richmond, Va., to Newport News, and has running connections to New York and to Baltimore. The rate from Louisville through for a car-load of cattle, or tobacco, or freight of any kind, is one price, and then they make divisions. At Lexington it is another price, at Mount Sterling it is another price, at Big Sandy it is another price, and so on through; and I have never heard any man complain of any injustice or discrimination on the part of that road. The freights are high, it is true, but nobody complains and everybody is friendly to the road, because its management is conducted upon principles of equity and justice to the people along the whole line.

But we hear complaints on other lines, and what is the occasion? You start a car-load of wheat from Cincinnati or Chicago to New York. The roads pass through Clarksville, Wheeling, and Pittsburgh. If the shipper of flour at one of these points on the road is compelled to pay twice as much as the shipper at Chicago what does it amount to? It amounts to a contribution by the way-shipper of so much money to save the Chicago merchant from any loss that he might sustain by shipping over the longer route. Is there any justice in taxing the man for that purpose at Columbus, Ohio, at Pittsburgh, at Clarksville, or anywhere along the road? These people send their commodities to the same market, and if the shipper living at an intermediate point is compelled to pay a larger amount of freight on his grain or his flour, when he gets to New York he comes in competition there with the merchant who has shipped his grain or flour from Chicago, and as that man gets it carried for half the freight, he must reduce the price or be undersold by the other man, or he can not sell at all.

Mr. ALLISON. Does it not amount to still another thing, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him? It amounts to enabling the producer of the flour or the wheat, or whatever, at Chicago or beyond Chicago to receive the same price that is allowed to the producer at Pittsburgh.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, and the intermediate man is taxed in order to give him that price which he is not justly entitled to. It is unjust, it is inequitable, it is wrong. His wheat and his flour, and my wheat and my flour, at an intermediate point go to the same market, and if you charge me more freight than he is charged, I help to pay the railroads their losses, and I help to make up to him in the New York market the price of his wheat or his flour.

Sir, railroads are great things for the country. They are great institutions. They have aided in the development of the country more than any other material cause. I am a friend of the railroads. I look upon them as the great instrumentality in the development of our country. I think the Gospel, the common school, and the railroad have been the three great agencies under Almighty God in the progress and the civilization of the world. The railroads have equalized things everywhere. They have afforded means of transportation and of distribution of the fruits of the earth, so that the humble, the poor, the laborer in every civilized country is enabled to enjoy not only the necessaries but the comforts and many of the luxuries of life by their means. I would do nothing to discourage them, but I would have them do justice. I would have all roads do the same justice that some I know of do. The railroads have rendered a famine throughout the civilized world an impossibility in modern times by providing ready means for the distribution of the fruits of the earth from one part to another. The people are not disposed to be hostile to the railroads, and should be their friends; and if the railroads were justly and properly managed they would be the most popular institutions in the whole country.

One thing I know. The cause of complaint is not on account of high freights, because everybody knows that from year to year freights are coming down and down all the time, but it is because of the unjust discriminations, such as have been mentioned in this discussion, which have rendered the railroads odious to the people. We all know that where there is no railroad everybody is anxious to have one. Individual men, counties, towns, and States contribute liberally of their means to encourage the building of railroads, but the moment they are constructed they become odious and hateful to the people. Why is it? It is because they are not managed upon the principles of justice and right.

The railroads have rights as well as the people. They are entitled to a fair and just compensation, a fair and reasonable profit upon the capital invested in them, and they ought to have it. Everybody will agree to that. But they should by law be restrained from improper discriminations and unjust extortions upon the country. Every man will agree to that. I do not know how that is to be done. I confess there are so many difficulties and complications about the question that I do not see my way clear to do it. We need more light. We need more special and technical information on this subject before we shall be prepared to legislate and fix the rates of freight and passage-money for the railroads.

I think the law settles the fact that railroads are common highways; that the companies are common carriers, and as such are subject to law, the same as turnpikes and toll-bridges and ferries are; but when you come to fix all these things there comes the difficulty. I do not know how to do it. We can not say what the rates on the railroads ought to be for freight or for passage-money. We can not pass a general law. We can not appoint a commission and give them power to regulate it, because that would be delegating to the commission legislative power, which Congress has no right to confer. We can not do that ourselves.

If the pending amendment does not go far enough it certainly meets some of the grievances of which the country complains. The great grievance is unjust discrimination in favor of particular cities and towns and particular individuals at terminal points and against way-freight stations. That is the trouble in the country. The present system is an admirable one, I admit, to build up great cities and populous and powerful towns at the terminal points, but what is the effect upon the intermediate towns? You see hundreds of little villages all along the line of a railroad, but you do not see a great town anywhere. The effect is to throw into the terminal points from all the country about everything that is to be transported out of a State.

I saw an authentic statement recently of the amount of interstate commerce and the proportion it bore to all the internal trade of this country. It was more than 75 per cent. More than 75 per cent. of all the trade of the American States is interstate commerce, and when you consider that much of the State commerce consists in sending to terminal points their own productions to be shipped into other States, I think it will amount to 95 per cent. Hence you see that interstate commerce is far more important than State commerce. There is very little shipped from one town in my State to another town in the State. Every county raises around about the towns everything that the towns want; and the surplus is shipped elsewhere to be distributed over the broad land and to be sent to foreign markets.

I am unwilling to hamper the railroads. I want them built in my State. We have not half enough. We have immense wealth in my State. We have far more iron, coal, and timber undeveloped than has yet appeared upon the surface, and we must look to railroads to develop them. I would not hamper or cripple them, but I would make them deal justly with the people. I would make all railroads do as some of them do now. Why do the railroads claim these privileges to build up great cities at the termini of the roads and gut the whole country between? It is unjust, it is unfair, it is not right; and with all my friendly disposition toward railroads as the great instrumentality in developing the wealth and resources of our country I am unwilling to give them absolute power over the taxation of the people of this land. We have to-day 125,000 miles of completed railroad, estimated at the value of $7,000,000,000, carrying freight of the people annually to the amount of $1,700,000,000 of their property. This is a tremendous power. The railroads have a revenue to-day larger than that of the Government of the United States. The question is whether we shall take control of them or not.

I confess that the inclinations of my own mind are in favor of a commission. We had a commission in my own State partly through my instrumentality. The roads had all sorts of rates and extortionate charges. A commission was appointed merely with a supervisory power, and the very first year of its existence the roads all came to terms, not by any coercion, but they got together and settled their fares and freights upon such terms of equity and justice that the people were satisfied. They reduced the maximum charges upon all the roads to 3 cents a mile for passenger travel, and some of them carried for much less, and upon coal and other heavy commodities the charge was reduced so as to divide traffic in grain and open coal mines through the State everywhere along the line of the roads. Now why can not that be done? But after the first year the roads got over their scare and nothing else has been done, and the commission is not now worth a cent.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The position seems to me a strange one that the amendment does not go far enough and therefore ought to be opposed. I understood the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to propound an inquiry to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER], desiring to know whether it was right to charge as much for carrying freight 500 miles as for carrying it 1,000 miles. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he thinks it is right to charge as much for transporting a car from Leavenworth or Kansas City to Topeka or Lawrence as to the city of Denver? Does the Senator from Kansas think it is right to charge as much for transporting a car from Kansas City or Leavenworth to Lawrence or Topeka as to Denver? The Senator may not understand and I will repeat the question. I should like the Senator to answer whether there should be as much charged for transporting a car from Kansas City or Leavenworth to Topeka or Lawrence as to Denver. That is the point embraced in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Some one suggests the Senator is thinking. Then while the Senator from Kansas is thinking upon that question I will propound one to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. Does he think it is right for a railroad to charge for transporting a car from Chicago to Des Moines as much as for transporting a car from Chicago to Council Bluffs? I will repeat the question. If he thinks it right to charge more for transporting a car from Chicago to Des Moines than for transporting a car from Chicago to Council Bluffs? Does the Senator think that is just?

Mr. ALLISON. Which Senator from Iowa is asked?

Mr. VAN WYCK. The one before me.

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the question put by the Senator from Nebraska by propounding one to him. I will ask him if he thinks it is right to charge as much for a car from Chicago to Des Moines as to Council Bluffs?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, sir. Now answer me, please.

Mr. ALLISON. That is what your amendment authorizes to be done.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator seeks to get behind another question to evade an answer to mine. I have answered his question. I say I do not believe it is right. Now, will he answer mine, whether he believes it is right for a railroad company to charge as much for transporting a car-load from Chicago to Des Moines as from Chicago to Council Bluffs? Will you answer?

Mr. ALLISON. That would depend, of course, upon the circumstances. Ordinarily it would not be right.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Under what circumstances would it be justified? Ordinarily it would not be right, he says. Now, what circumstances would justify it? Will the Senator explain?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not want to get into a colloquy with my friend.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, I should think not.

Mr. ALLISON. The rate from Chicago to Des Moines ought to be a reasonable rate. The rate from Chicago to Council Bluffs ought to be a reasonable one. If they are both reasonable and on the same line and in the same direction the rate from Chicago to Council Bluffs should be greater than that from Chicago to Des Moines. I do not know that it would, but it might occur that at Council Bluffs some time the pool which my friend from Nebraska spoke of this morning, which he says operates so injuriously to Council Bluffs and Omaha, would be broken, and in that case severe competition might arise at Council Bluffs between the railroads, and they would charge between those points less than cost. In that event, to use it as an illustration, I will ask the Senator if he thinks it would be right to charge less than cost also from Chicago to Des Moines?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I should not think it right to charge less than the cost to Des Moines; neither would I think it by any means right to charge less than the cost to Council Bluffs. We are dealing with facts as they are furnished by the experience of years past. There have been the same railroads running across the Senator's State from ten to fifteen years from Chicago to Council Bluffs. There has not been during these fifteen years a single state of facts that has occurred since those roads have been running that would justify the thing that the Senator says would be justified by these peculiar circumstances. It has not happened in fifteen years, nor would it happen in fifty years to come. Is not that a remarkable attitude? The Senator has finally admitted that ordinarily he does not think it right, neither does he think it right that the railroad company should charge as much, and he is right about that. Ought it not really to charge less from Chicago to Des Moines than from Chicago to Council Bluffs? What I desire in propounding these questions is to see upon what ground certain Senators who are finding fault with and antagonizing the amendment put their opposition, with a view of showing really that they want to do nothing. They step forward and oppose the amendment; they say the amendment does not go far enough; and yet there is an extreme unwillingness on the part of Senators to explain just what they do think upon a given state of facts.

My friend from Iowa did finally assent to the proposition that this thing is wrong.

Let there be no misunderstanding about this matter. Here are two admitted evils. The Senator from Iowa admits that there are two evils, one where a railroad charges the same amount for a shorter haul that is charged for a longer haul, and the other where it charges actually more. The attitude of Senators is that the amendment does not go far enough, that while it seeks to strike down one evil it refuses to put its hand upon the other; yet when they are asked for an explanation they are unwilling to admit that either is wrong. When they are desirous to be understood by their people they will seem to be out-Heroding Herod. They say that they want more, and they can not go for this proposition because it does not go the length they desire, when they do not desire to go any length at all.

Here are two acknowledged evils. One is that a railroad charges more for a short haul than a long one, and the other is that it also charges as much for a short haul as for a long one, both of which are wrong. Now, what are we to do? We are here seeking to accomplish something. The Senator says these evils have been existing for years. So they have. No serious attempt has been made by the American Congress to right them, and now we start, and what are we to do? We seek to get the most we can in this measure. If it be the Reagan bill, we will take the Reagan bill. If it be only the little commission bill of the Senator from Illinois, then we will take that. We will take what we can get; but when we stand here asking for this amendment which strikes at an acknowledged evil, an acknowledged wrong, I apprehend the people will not recognize it as a good excuse for voting against the amendment that it does not go far enough and strike at another evil which they also desire to have remedied.

It is not true that forbidding the charge of more for a short than long haul is impliedly legalizing a charge of the same amount for a short as long haul. If Congress says this state of facts shall not be tolerated, it by no means goes the length of saying that the railroads may do other things. One Senator [Mr. INGALLS] says it is giving the whole thing away if we pass this amendment striking at this acknowledged wrong. Oh, no! The judiciary power will be as operative the day after the passage of the amendment as it was before. The law never has taken hold of this wrong. The law never has struck at it. The railroad companies claim that they are right in making these discriminations, and some of their friends upon this floor claim that they are right also. There is no excuse to be found in a refusal to vote for the amendment by saying that there is another state of facts which ought to be included. Let the Senators who believe that insist on amending the amendment. I will follow, and I think the Senator from Oregon will go as far as they will lead in that direction. If these Senators think the amendment does not cover all the cases, we shall be most happy to have them introduce amendments which will cover them.

Mr. INGALLS. Compensation should always be equivalent to service. If it were possible to establish railroad rates for freight transportation and passenger traffic so that the pay should be pro rata in accordance with the distance of the carriage, that would meet my approbation.

There are two evils, both of which are admitted, and one is just as much an evil as the other. I am opposed to both. I believe it is wrong to charge a larger amount for a short haul than for a long haul. I believe it is wrong to charge the same amount for a short haul that is charged for a long haul. I desire if possible to obtain some legislation that will prevent both, so that competition in each case shall be as nearly as possible exactly equal to the service.

The fault that I find with the amendment is not that it goes too far, and not that it does not go far enough, but that in denying the right of the corporations to charge more for a short haul than they do for a long haul, it legalizes the wrong of charging as much for a short haul as for a long haul.

I am unwilling to adopt any legislation that shall legalize an admitted wrong. I am not in charge of this measure; I am not proposing any amendments; it is a subject with which I am not familiar; but so far as these wrongs are concerned I want to right all of them, and I do not propose by my vote to legalize any of them.

Mr. PLATT. I think I must vote against the amendment, and I wish in a few words to state the reasons why I shall do so.

I think a great deal of abuse has been perpetrated by railroads by charging more for a short haul than for a long haul, or by charging more at points along the line to which freight was carried than at the terminus of the railroad beyond those points. But the subject is full of difficulties, and I doubt myself very much whether any rule which may be established by legislation to cover all cases can work justice. It may remedy injustice in some particular cases, but I think it will scarcely work justice in all cases.

My hope is that the commission which the bill provides for, to which such subjects are to be committed and by which all such topics must be passed upon, will result in at least partially remedying the abuses which I know have prevailed. I am, therefore, disposed to take the commission as a tentative measure, hoping that justice will result from that, and waiting a little to see what its effect shall be.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon is liable justly to the criticism that it legalizes and authorizes an equal charge for a short haul as for a long haul; but some Senators on this floor for whose judgment I have respect seem to think that that is the proper construction of the amendment. In order to obviate an objection which I do not think justly lies, but to remove all doubt upon that subject, I move to add to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon the following:

But this provision shall not be construed to authorize the charging as much for a shorter as for a longer distance in any case where such charge would be unlawful prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. INGALLS. If it is "unlawful prior to the passage of this act" how could it be enforced in any event?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. INGALLS. If it is unlawful now before the passage of the act, how could it be made effective in any event?

Mr. GEORGE. I assume that the objection is that this provision would legalize the charging of as much for a shorter as for a longer haul, and that that could not now be done, because if it could not now be done then the effect charged to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon could not follow. I may not have been fortunate in the language which I have used in my amendment, though I submitted it to several Senators around me. I propose simply to obviate the objection which has been urged, neither more nor less. I will change the amendment verbally so as to meet the objection of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi modifies his amendment to the amendment. It will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment:

But this provision shall not be construed to legalize the charging as much for a shorter as for a longer distance in any case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 14, after the word "class," it is proposed to insert:

Or shall charge or receive any greater compensation for transporting a similar amount and kind of property a shorter distance than for a longer distance over the same line of road and in the same direction; but this provision shall not be construed to legalize the charging as much for a shorter as for a longer distance in any case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment, but I confess that I do not expect it to remedy the evil which it is intended to meet. The provision of the amendment is that the railroad companies shall charge no more for the same quantity for a short haul than a long one. It is intended to provide against that; but it is well known that the companies can alter the number of pounds to be carried from one point to another, and under the amendment the freight would have to be the same quantity and over the same road precisely. However, the amendment is in the right direction.

While I am on my feet I will say that I do not suppose we can enact any law which will entirely remedy the evils that are complained of. There are great complaints in the country about the exorbitant charges made by transportation and railroad companies, but I do not know how we can remedy them. In my opinion the provisions of the bill which propose a commission will utterly fail to correct the evils complained of, and I doubt exceedingly whether anything we can do will take from the companies the power to evade our legislation and carry out their own purposes. A commission, in my opinion, is about the only thing that can correct the evil.

The amendment is in the right direction. It proposes to curtail one of the evils complained of, and that is that for a shorter haul greater charges are made than for a longer haul. That is so evidently unjust that it strikes me the amendment ought to meet the approbation of every Senator.

Objection was made to the amendment by the Senator from Kansas because, as he alleged, it authorizes taking as much for a short haul as for a long one. It will be seen by the construction of the language of the amendment that it does not authorize anything, but only prohibits a certain wrong. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has obviated that supposed defect in the amendment. I shall vote for the amendment, but in doing so I confess I have very little hope that it will accomplish the object in view.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care to occupy the attention of the Senate for more than a few moments. I think the discussion which has been had upon this question has proved the proposition that the Congress of the United States is not prepared with that sort of definite information which would justify it in passing a law and making it apply to every possible supposed condition of affairs connected with railroad operations. The purpose I had in view was not to legislate in favor of long hauls as against short hauls, or upon any of the questions that were controverted among the people, about which the public differed, but to leave these questions so that the commission which might be created by the bill, after thorough and deliberate investigation, would report to us what should be done upon those controverted points.

I do not stand here to insist upon the proposition that a railroad should charge as much for a short haul as for a long one, or more. My judgment is that in nine cases out of ten a railroad or transportation company does wrong when it charges as much for a short haul as for a long one; but I am not prepared to say that we ought to put that sort of provision in the bill, so that under no circumstances that might arise in the operation of a transportation company could the company charge as much for a short haul as for a long haul.

I hold in my hand a volume of Illinois Reports, in which there is a case decided by the supreme court of that State where the Legislature of our State had passed a law declaring that there should not be as great a charge for a short haul as for a long one. The supreme court decided in an able opinion that under the constitution of the State such a law against unjust discrimination and extortion could not stand in the courts of the country. The law was decided to be unconstitutional. The court said that the Legislature under that provision of the constitution might have the power to declare that such an act was prima facie evidence of unjust discrimination where they charged as much for a short haul as for a long one, but that the Legislature could not go further in legislating upon the question than simply to declare that it would be prima facie evidence in the courts of the country that the corporation was extorting or unjustly discriminating.

I think that it is our duty if we are going to get anything done by Congress on this question to pass a bill that will avoid an explicit declaration upon all these controverted questions, so that we may be able to take the first step and get a commission to investigate these questions about which we are in doubt and about which we differ, and then at a future Congress we shall be better able to meet the questions and determine what sort of law we can pass consistently with the interests of the people of this country.

I do not stand here to advocate the cause of the corporations of the country. The bill was drawn in part by me with the sole purpose of protecting the interests of the people against the transportation companies; but while I was doing that I did not desire to come into Congress with a bill simply to run a raid against the corporations without a reason. On the contrary, I want to do that which is fair between the people and the transportation companies; and if we are going to get a bill passed in this Congress, which I hope we shall be able to do, we must go forward in the consideration of this bill and get something through the Senate of the United States.

While I am on the floor I wish to say that I intend to insist upon the consideration of the bill, and I shall resist an adjournment over to-morrow until Monday unless we progress and conclude the consideration of the bill to-day. I give notice to the Senate now that if the consideration of the bill is not completed to-day and a motion shall be made for an adjournment over until Monday I shall resist it as strongly as I may be able to do and shall call for the yeas and nays upon it, because, while I realize that the consideration of the bill is obstructing other important legislation, I realize at the same time that the consideration of the bill is important to the people of this country, and I do not propose to let go of it until I am voted down by the Senate, before we accomplish something in the direction of legislation in behalf of the people and in the control of the corporations of the country.

I hope that the amendment will be voted down, and that the Senate will proceed with the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. SLATER. If I understand the Senator correctly and understand the decision of the supreme court of his State, it does not properly meet the case here. Although the supreme court of Illinois decided that under the peculiar constitution of that State the Legislature could not provide that no greater price could be charged for a short haul than is charged for a long haul by its railroads, that decision does not meet the case here, because there is in the constitution of the State of Illinois a direct provision that there shall be no discrimination (I do not quote the language but the purport) in the rates charged among railroads, and that the Legislature shall provide against those discriminations. In allowing possible discriminations within certain limits, under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, we are not limited in the way that the Legislature of the State of Illinois is limited by its constitution. Hence the decision of that court does not apply here in any manner.

Mr. INGALLS. Before voting on the amendment as subsequently amended by the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi I will venture to call the attention of the Senate to the way in which the section will read in case the Senate should vote affirmatively:

SEC. 4. That if any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce shall, &c.; and if any such transportation company shall neglect or refuse to furnish the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of interstate-commerce freights to one person that is at the same time furnished to any other person for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of such freights of the same class, or shall charge, or receive, any greater compensation for transporting a similar amount and kind of property a shorter distance than for a longer distance over the same line of road and in the same direction, but this provision shall not be construed to legalize the charging as much for a shorter as for a longer distance in any case, such transportation company shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination.

If any Senator thinks that the Senate can afford to place itself in the attitude that will be occupied by the adoption of such provisions in that connection he ought to vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CULLOM. If there is to be no further debate I shall not make the motion, but I rose to move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BROWN. I beg the Senator from Illinois to withhold the motion.

Mr. CULLOM. I will do so, if the Senator desires to address the Senate upon the pending question.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to make some remarks on this question before the vote is taken, and they will be of some length, perhaps. I prefer to say what I have to say in this connection, because I shall devote a portion of my speech to the subject-matter of the pending amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw the motion, as the Senator gives notice that he desires to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. BROWN proceeded to address the Senate. Having spoken for some time,

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Georgia will yield to me for a moment, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I make that motion.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that motion will not prevail. I hope there will be a session to-morrow for the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to Monday next. The question is on that motion.

Mr. CULLOM. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 31, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its amendments to the bill (S. 729) for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. W. L. WILSON of West Virginia, Mr. J. T. SPRIGGS of New York, and Mr. ELZA JEFFORDS of Mississippi managers at the conference on the part of the House.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I desire to submit some remarks on the general subject of railroads, and on the enormous loss which has been sustained by those who put their capital into the roads, while the capital invested in that manner has immensely increased the wealth and power of the whole country.

I shall also have something to say about the effect of unlimited competition between railroad companies which results in consolidation. I shall also discuss briefly the pooling system, and the provision of the bill which proposes to prohibit any railroad company from carrying through freight of the same quantity and quality a longer distance for less money than the same quantity and quality of freight is carried a shorter distance as local freight.

The first railroad that was completed and made an excursion trip upon the face of the earth was the road between Liverpool and Manchester, in England; and that trial trip was made in September, 1830, a little over half a century ago.

Mr. Charles Francis Adams, in his book, says there is some reason for saying that South Carolina was the first State in the world that commenced to put into operation a portion of a railroad to be run successfully by steam or by engine power. He disclaims the honor for the Quincy road of his own State, Massachusetts, which is generally claimed for Quincy, as it seems it was but little more than a tramway.

Probably next to South Carolina come the States of New York and Maryland, so that South Carolina, England, New York, and Maryland may be said to be the first four states on earth that ran trains of cars propelled or carried by engines with steam power, and that as late as the year 1829, when the first experiments were made, and in 1830 when the first grand trial excursion was run. To warn men of the danger of railroading, an accident occurred during the excursion between Liverpool and Manchester by which a man lost his life. The Duke of Wellington, then premier and very unpopular, attended and gave his sanction on the occasion of the trial trip. What has been the result of these experiments? It is wonderful! Within half a century the whole world has been revolutionized—its cities, its transportation, its commerce. Formerly the cities were built only at the mouths of rivers which penetrated the country. Now they are built where the greatest concentration of railroad power happens to be.

Take our own country. What has been the result? There are now in round numbers about 125,000 miles of railroad in the United States in operation. Counting all that as having cost $25,000 per mile, and counting the equipment and all, it has cost more than that, no doubt largely more, and we have as the result $3,125,000,000 invested in railroads in the United States. That investment has doubled and in many cases trebled the value of real estate and other property, and especially the real estate of the sections traversed by the railroads, while a very large proportion of this enormous sum has been lost by those who invested it in railroads for the benefit of the public. Take my own State as an illustration. I have been informed that since the year 1830, since the first railroad train ran on earth, a lot of two hundred and two and one-half acres of land in the very center of Atlanta sold for a horse, bridle, and saddle. Railroads have made Atlanta what she is. There are probably more than $15,000,000 worth of property now upon that lot of land besides the large improvements on adjoining lots. Had it not been for the railroads there would probably have been none of that property there, and that lot of two hundred and two and one-half acres would still have sold for a few hundred dollars. This is no isolated case. There are numerous cases like it all over the country. Railroads, then, I say, have revolutionized the country, built cities, great commercial centers, where formerly none existed, nor could exist under the old system, vastly added to the value of real estate and property of every character, and given new life and new energy to everything, not only upon this continent, but upon all the continents of the world, for they now have railroads in Europe, Asia, and Africa as well as in America.

That is not all. The invention of the telegraph seems to have been either directed by Providence or to have happened just when it was needed in connection with the railroads. And while the trains now sweep over the face of the earth with a velocity of from twenty to fifty miles an hour, men converse with each other from one side of the continent to the other, and flash their thoughts across the ocean instantaneously. A wonderful age this we live in. The system that has produced this great result is worthy of human consideration. It is worthy of the consideration of the ablest statesman, as well as the profoundest political economist. It is a gigantic system, however, and while it has made this country what it never could have been without it, I do not think it should be left entirely unbridled, without regulation, which should be done wisely and constitutionally if done at all. But I do say that those who seek to control it should not do gross injustice to a system that does so much for our whole people.

A few years ago they burned corn in the West for fuel. Why? The lands were exceedingly fertile, and the people made vast quantities of corn. They had no means of transportation. They could use only what they fed to their stock and their families, and the rest was left in that prairie country as the cheapest fuel they had. Before railroads penetrated the great West 10 cents a bushel was high for corn; many times it would not command that. In that day your exchanges were conducted mainly upon our cotton crop. What has happened since the days of railroads? These long steel-rail lines that so much has been said against have penetrated the great West, and by thousands of miles go upon the plains and prairies; and by combining and placing long lines under one management have been able to carry productions rapidly to the Eastern cities, and then, by the aid of steamships, speedily to land them on the other side of the ocean, to fill any vacuum there, so as to make the teeming productions of the West a great auxiliary to those of the South in conducting commerce and the exchanges of the Government and people of this country.

Look at the statistics, and you will see that the meat and the flour and other productions of the West figure very largely now in the account.

We have had commercial depression and periods of inflation, and we shall continue to have them. Whether at as regular intervals as in the past I can not say, but we shall have them. How has it been, however, for the last few years? The balance of trade has run in our favor as high as $260,000,000 in round numbers in one year. In other words, in trading with foreign powers we have shipped to them of our productions and manufactures $260,000,000 in a year more than we have received of their productions in return, and they have had to pay us that large balance in gold and silver. This poured in the lap of our country an immense amount of the precious metals, creating what is called "the great business boom." Would it have been but for these railroad facilities? Clearly not. Why, we have even pressed England to the point where some of her people held meetings and demanded a protective tariff to keep the productions of the United States at such low prices out of their markets, as the English farmer can not compete with us raising grain on the free-trade basis.

Well, now, I say any great interest or development that men have put their money into that has produced such a result as this is entitled to the consideration and protection of statesmen everywhere. I know how easy it is to excite popular prejudice against corporations and monopolies, as they are called. It is an easy task to excite the people, as it would be easy to influence many of them by the doctrines of agrarianism, and make them believe it would be better every ten years to divide out the property equally among everybody. Many of them would shout and throw up their caps at such a doctrine; and it is easy enough to have followers when you say, "Let other people build railroads and let us take charge of them and run them for our own benefit without having cost us anything." But is it just? I address cool-headed, sensible men, grave Senators, who were sent here to represent the people. I ask for no privileges for the railroads that are unreasonable, but I do ask that you do something like justice by them, and deal with them upon principles of fair play.

So much for the history of railroads and the results that have been produced by them. But this new state of things, this great revolutionizing element that has come into existence, that has revolutionized commerce and changed the basis of your exchanges and the balance of trade, has brought about a grave problem for the economist and the statesman. How are these great interests to be managed so as to do justice to the people and at the same time do no injustice to those who have invested their means in constructing them, thereby building up society and commerce? That is a problem that every civilized nation has had more or less to do with. It has been found a very difficult one to deal with. It is claimed that the great law of trade is "encourage competition—the more competition the better for the people." And yet the experience of the world has already shown most conclusively that that system applied to railroads ends inevitably in consolidation, and does the greatest injustice while it is working out that result. The competitive system has been virtually abandoned in England. It was never tolerated to any great extent in France. In Belgium the government owns interest enough in the railroads to keep, as Mr. Adams says, the thumb upon the regulator all the time and regulate the competition. In Germany the government is taking hold of it, so as to control the competition.

It is worth while to inquire into the system England has adopted. There was the first successful railroad on earth, and there are statesmen there competent to deal with the problem. Indeed, I may justly say that the statesmanship of England towers like a vast pyramid upon the plain of time. This question has there been agitated more, I think, than anywhere else; it has received a fuller investigation, and they have finally reached a solution. And that solution is that in railroading consolidation is the rule, and not competition. They tried various experiments, but have finally settled down upon a railroad commission, whose powers are mainly judicial, and in most cases their decision is final and conclusive. This commission is one of the high courts of the realm, possessing great ability and great dignity; and it is said that they have to a great extent so regulated matters by the commission taking judicial cognizance that there is now but little trouble in working the railroad system in England.

But it is said there are abuses in the railroad system which can not be justified. That is doubtless so; abuses will creep into every great system where great interests are at stake, and it is the duty of wise legislators as far as it lies in their power to correct such abuses.

It is said the railroads have oppressed the people. There may be instances of this character, but the people in turn have often oppressed the railroads. The whole tenor of our legislation looks to establishing rules in reference to railroads that are more onerous to them than the rules applied to people generally. Legislation often discriminates against them; courts and juries do them injustice. A jury of citizens acting under the solemnity of an oath frequently gives five or ten times as much damage to a citizen against a railroad company as they would give in a case between citizen and citizen where the injury was the same.

The people are always ready to encourage bankers, merchants, or anybody else who has capital to put into railroads. Let a new railroad enterprise be started, and public meetings are held and patriotic speeches are made, the men applaud and the ladies throw up their handkerchiefs when heavy subscriptions are made, and every possible inducement is held out to the company to put its money in and build the road; but no sooner is it completed and in condition to conduct the business of transportation than the whole tone of popular sentiment is changed, and those who put not a dollar into its construction are often foremost in the crusade for its confiscation—not by an act of the Legislature, not by a decree of a court, but by putting down freights and passenger fares to a point where the capital invested can never be remunerative, and with a view to giving the people who invested nothing in the road the almost free use of the road and its rolling-stock for their accommodation. Railroad commissions or any one having control over the railroads are expected to favor constant reduction in rates and in fares, until the company is driven to bankruptcy and the road sold to pay its indebtedness. And in this manner the money put into the road by the original stockholders is entirely lost, their property having been virtually confiscated by the popular clamor for low rates, which drove them into bankruptcy and resulted in their ruin.

Take my own State as an illustration. There are two great rival corporations whose interests are now consolidated—the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company and the Central Railroad and Banking Company. They have not gone into bankruptcy, and during a very considerable proportion of the time since they have been built they have paid reasonable dividends to the stockholders; but not so with most other companies. Go to the northern part of the State, and there is the road formerly known as the Alabama and Chattanooga. A large amount of its stock was paid in by citizens of Georgia, and every dollar of it was lost, and the company went into bankruptcy and the road has been sold a time or two since.

Next is the Selma, Rome and Dalton, running from Dalton into Alabama. The part of this road that lies in Georgia was sold under a decree of the superior court of Floyd County and purchased by a company, and the stockholders lost every dollar. I believe the part in Alabama shared about the same fate. The road did not even pay all the bonds which had been issued.

Next comes the Cherokee road. That, too, has gone into bankruptcy and has been sold and the stock lost to the original holders. Then take the Air Line, from Atlanta through the Carolinas, which cost some $13,000,000, which sold under the marshal's hammer for about one-third of the amount, and the original stock and a large percentage on the bonds were entirely lost.

Then comes the road from Griffin to Carrollton, which has shared the same fate. The road from Macon to Augusta has also gone through the insolvent court and been sold for the benefit of the bondholders. Go to Columbus, and there you will find that the North and South road shared the same fate, and the stockholders lost all they had put into it. Then take the Macon and Brunswick; that, too, has been sold, and all the stock put into it by citizens lost. And the road from Brunswick to Albany has been treated in like manner.

Again we have the great line from Savannah into Florida and Alabama, known as the Savannah, Florida and Western. This, too, passed through the court of bankruptcy, and the original stockholders lost their capital.

Of the sixty-odd millions of dollars invested in railroads in my own State much the larger half of the capital has been absolutely lost to the stockholders, and in many cases the bondholders received only a percentage upon the amount invested, and much of this has been the result of the popular clamor for reduced rates.

I know some patriotic citizens and officials who do not practically understand this question are of opinion that all railroad companies should be put under about the same iron rule as to freights and passage; each should only be permitted to charge the same that another charges.

Now, it is very obvious that this rule is grossly unjust and oppressive to weaker companies, where they have but little business as compared with the stronger companies that have large business. Let me illustrate what I mean. The great line controlled by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company between the two great cities of New York and Philadelphia runs trains at very short intervals between these great cities well loaded with freights or passengers. They can afford to carry at a very low rate, on account of the vast quantity of freight and the vast number of passengers, and still make money. Take a place in the rural districts where there are not freight and passengers enough to load one train each way per day, and if they are compelled to carry at the same rate that the Pennsylvania road carries they can not pay fixed expenses. They can not keep the road in repair or in safe running order; and still the citizens who are served by the road through the rural districts expect their freights and passage as low as railroads in any section of the Union can carry like freight and passengers.

Whenever a road is run through a section that has little business to do, the people of that section must expect to pay a higher freight than those who live along the line of a road where there is much to do and where there are long through connections which serve as feeders. Let me again illustrate:

There is a vast quantity of valuable pine timber in my State between Savannah and Montgomery County that is worth large fortunes if there was any way to get it to market. The people there are too poor to build railroads. Suppose a company of capitalists were to say, "We propose to build you a railroad from Savannah into Montgomery County, say a hundred miles, and give you an outlet for your timber;" what would be the increase in the value of lands and property in that section? Would not the property be worth four times as much as it now is? The tract covered by the pine timber would be worth a large sum that is now not worth a dollar an acre in the market. In such cases it would be simply absurd for the people of that section to say you must charge as low a rate as the Central charges, which does a heavy business.

Rather than do without a railroad the people of Montgomery County could well afford to pay three times as much as the freights on the Central, which does a heavy business. No company of capitalists, with the present lights before them, and with the railroad commission over them, would think of building such a road without some guarantee that the freights would be kept constantly up to a point where the capital invested might pay dividends. What man of sense will put his money into a railroad between Savannah and Montgomery County for the accommodation of the people there without some such guarantee? But if the capitalists could be induced to make such an investment there would be a clamor all along the line for lower rates, rates as low as the Central.

Of course such a reduction in rates would soon drive the company into bankruptcy, but after the railroad is built what do the people care for that? True, the stockholders would lose their capital, but the people along the line would have the benefit of a railroad for the development of their section, which would cost them nothing and would enable them to make fortunes by the increased value of their lands and the sale of their timber.

This character of legislation, if persisted in, will soon stop the building of railroads.

In the North and West you may have enough of railroads; the people may have game enough in the trap that they can afford to pull the trigger and be content to rob those that now have capital invested. This is not our condition in the South. We have great need of other railroads, and until we get more capitalists to put their money in the construction of our railroads I think we had better wait and let more game go in the trap before we pull it down upon them.

The constant cry is that the railroads are oppressing the people—that they are great monopolies, growing rich by their oppression. The fact is that a very large proportion of them have gone and are going into bankruptcy, and those who are weak enough to put their capital in them are losing the amount invested on account of the clamor of the populace for the control and use of the railroads without anything like just compensation to the owners.

But great stress is put by the advocates of stronger measures of reform upon the fact that railroad companies often carry through freights longer distances for less money than they carry local freights for shorter distances. That practice is vehemently condemned by the advocates of virtual confiscation of railroad property. If we should pass the interstate-commerce bill and should prevent that practice the people, when they saw the workings of it, would very soon be clamorous for the repeal of the obnoxious law. You must permit through freights to be carried longer distances for less money than local freights are carried shorter distances, or you exclude through freights from your lines of road entirely, and then the railroad companies must fall back upon their home productions, and make their money, if they make any, out of local freights. The same rate of freight per mile will not do.

Let me again illustrate. Suppose a farmer brings ten tons of corn to the railroad depot at Marietta, twenty miles from Atlanta, which he desires transported to Atlanta. The railroad company takes charge of it, receives the corn into the depot, the employés take the trucks, roll it to the car, and load it in at Marietta; then the company hauls it to Atlanta, takes the trucks, runs it out, unloads it, and delivers it to the consignees. What would be a reasonable charge for the transportation? Would any reasonable man object to $5 for carrying the ten tons of corn twenty miles and $2 for loading and unloading? I presume not. It would be less than a cent and a half a bushel. It would be 2½ cents per ton per mile. None can question that the freight for so short a distance is reasonable.

Now, suppose another farmer brings ten tons of corn and delivers it at the depot of the same road at Dalton, one hundred miles from Atlanta. It must be carried at the same rate per mile from Dalton to Atlanta at which it was carried from Marietta to Atlanta, which is 2½ cents per ton per mile. This would make a car-load of ten tons cost the shipper $25 between Dalton and Atlanta.

Now, suppose another farmer in Kansas City, Mo., delivers ten tons of corn to the railroad to be shipped to Atlanta. The same rate per ton per mile must be charged for the longer distance which is charged for the shorter distance. What would be the freight between Kansas City and Atlanta, which is in round numbers a thousand miles? It would be $250 on a car-load of ten tons or three hundred and fifty bushels. This would be a fraction over 71 cents per bushel freight from Kansas City, Mo., to Atlanta. What say the Western planters to this rule as applied to the transportation of their produce to market, and what say the cotton-planters of Georgia to the application of the rule as applied to the productions of the West which they purchase for home consumption? No one will complain that the rate charged between Marietta and Atlanta in the case supposed is unreasonable, and yet if we apply the same rule to freights for longer distances it soon reaches a point where it amounts to a prohibition to carry it at all. In the case supposed the freight on a bushel of corn between Kansas City, Mo., and Atlanta, Ga., would be more than the corn would bring in either market. The rule which produces this sort of inconvenience, this sort of absurdity and injustice, can not be a wholesome or wise rule.

But other patriotic persons engaged in the regulation of interstate commerce will disavow this rule, and will declare that it is not their purpose to require the same rate of freight per mile on local and through shipments, but that they only intend to prevent the carrying of the same quantity and quality of through freight a longer distance for less money than is charged on the same line for a like quantity and quality of local freights for a shorter distance. On first presentation the reasonableness and equity of this rule seem to be apparent, but when we apply to it the test of practical experience it will not bear examination, and its absurdity becomes obvious.

As already stated, a large majority of the railroad companies who have built the railroads in this country have gone into bankruptcy, and the railroads when sold have been purcharsed at prices greatly below the cost of construction by companies which have consolidated them into a few long trunk lines, which now run in competition with each other, and which have become necessary in conducting the business of transportation. And many of them purchased at prices far below cost do not pay dividends on the purchase-price.

As long as competition can be maintained without ending in consolidation, which point I will discuss further on, competition seems to be conducive to public prosperity, but if you apply the rule that railroads shall in no case carry freights of like quantity and quality a longer distance for less money than they carry similar freights a shorter distance, you will soon check and destroy a great deal of the competition which now exists.

The position amounts to this: that a car-load of corn when conveyed as through freight shall not be carried twenty-five miles for less money than a like car-load of corn conveyed as local freight is required to pay for twenty miles. Now, if you will fix a reasonable rate of local freight for twenty miles, such as will enable any railroad company to pay even the fixed expense of keeping its road in repair and running it, and you will then fix a through rate for the same car-load for twenty-five miles at the same rate charged for twenty miles of local transportation and extend that rate of 1,000 miles, you will find in every instance that the rate of freight will amount to a prohibition and you can not transport the goods and pay the rate. To maintain the rule you must either fix the local rate below the point absolutely necessary to pay the running expenses or you must fix the through rate so high it will prohibit the transportation of the commodity.

Take the case already supposed of a car-load of corn shipped from Marietta to Atlanta, charging a local rate of $5 per car-load for twenty miles. Then suppose a through shipment over the same road at a rate that would carry the car-load of corn twenty-five miles for $4. This would be a violation of the proposed legislation, as it would be a case where a like commodity is shipped a longer distance for less money. Or if you discriminate even more than this between local and through freight, carrying the through freight a still greater distance for less money than you carry the local, unless you extend it very materially it will amount to a prohibition and you can not ship through freight at all.

In the case supposed we carry a car-load of local freight for twenty miles for $5 and a car-load of through freight twenty-five miles for $4. For a hundred miles this would be $16, and from Kansas City, Mo., to Atlanta, a thousand miles, it would be $160 for transporting a car-load of three hundred and fifty bushels of corn. This would be about 45 cents a bushel on the corn for freight. What say the farmers of Missouri and Kansas? Would their corn bear this freight? Clearly not. A great deal of corn is now shipped from Kansas City into Georgia. Such a law would at once prohibit further shipments of corn for so long a distance.

But to meet the objection of the hypercritical as to rates, let us suppose the case that the local rate on a car-load of corn from Marietta to Atlanta, twenty miles, is only two dollars and a half—and no railroad can keep long out of the insolvent court which carries its local freights as low as that; then suppose the rate on a car-load of through freight between Kansas City and Atlanta should be $2 for every twenty-five miles. This again would violate the law if the proposed legislation should be enacted. The car-load of corn carried as local freight from Marietta to Atlanta being charged two dollars and a half for twenty miles, and the car-load of through freight being charged only $2 for twenty-five miles, we would be carrying the same commodity a longer distance for less money, but even the low rate of two dollars and a half per car-load for twenty miles of local freight would, when we apply the rule to through freight, be prohibitory. If we charge $2 for twenty-five miles on a car of through freight this would be $8 per hundred miles and $80 for a thousand miles. This would be a fraction over 22 cents a bushel freight on corn from Kansas City, Mo., to Atlanta.

Now, if we may credit the newspapers, I believe a bushel of corn is worth but little more than that in Kansas City at the present time. Even at this ruinously low rate of local freight (which no railroad company can afford to charge and continue to do business) the rule applied to through freight makes it prohibitory before it reaches a thousand miles distance. It would probably be prohibitory in the case supposed at five hundred miles distance.

If you enact such a law as this you will derange the whole transportation of the country, and you will either drive the railroads generally into bankruptcy on account of the low rate you permit them to charge for their local freights, upon which they rely mainly for their support, or you will prohibit the interchange of commodities at a greater distance than five or six hundred miles. As the figures plainly show it could not possibly stand the rate for a thousand miles.

Under such a rate of freight how would the farmers of the teeming West ever reach European markets with their productions? It would be simply an impossibility.

Such a law would destroy not only the interstate commerce of the country, but utterly ruin our foreign commerce, by prohibiting the exportation of our productions to foreign markets. I take it that wise men will not be guilty of enacting into a law a proposition so manifestly absurd.

Some of the Southern lines of railroad and steamships are trying to build up competition with the Northern roads for the Western business.

For a long time the Northern roads have had a monopoly of that business. They run four trunk lines, as you are aware, from the Eastern cities into the great West—the Baltimore and Ohio, the Pennsylvania, the Erie, and the New York Central. These are the four great trunk lines that penetrate the West in every direction, going to Chicago, Saint Louis, and other central points in that section, and they do the business between the East and the West.

They frequently, while at war with each other, carry freights for almost nominal prices from the West through to New York and thence by steamer to Charleston and Savannah. Then they load their steamers with cotton and other productions back to New York, and load their cars in New York with Western-bound freights. Now that freight landed in Savannah by the steamers from New York can be taken and carried to Louisville, Ky., at a very low rate, and the railroads still make money on it.

This shows the feasibility of opening another great trunk line between New York and the other Eastern cities and the great West. In prorating freights railroad men count one mile of rail equal to three miles of water. Why so? The company has to secure the right of way, grade the road, lay down the track and prepare it for the cars, which is a heavy expense for each mile.

God has prepared the ocean, and it is ready to receive the burden of transportation without the construction of a track, and all man has to do is to put on the rolling-stock. In other words, build the ship, and the road is already prepared for use.

It is very evident, therefore, that freight can be transported three miles by water as cheaply as it can be carried one mile by rail. Now we have a splendid line of steamers running between New York and Savannah, which make their trips with great regularity and carry passengers and cargoes of freight. Then we have a line of railroad from Savannah through to Louisville, Ky., connecting at different points with other roads penetrating the West and reaching Saint Louis, Chicago, and Kansas City, and other commercial centers. Now apply the prorating rule to the portion of the distance which includes conveyance by water, and counting three miles of water for one of rail, and the line from New York to Louisville is shorter by way of Savannah than any one of the four great Western trunk lines from New York to Louisville. The same is true as to Memphis, Saint Louis, Kansas City, and in fact to all cities of any importance west of Cincinnati and Chicago.

There is an immense section of the West which should have the benefit of a competing line between that section and the Eastern cities which is the shortest of the five competitors. Then it has this additional advantage so far as the transportation of freight from the East to the West is concerned: Of the immense number of trains which run from the West into Georgia and the South Atlantic States to supply the cotton planters with Western productions, seven out of every ten of the cars go back empty when they return to the West for another load. Now, a cargo of goods in New York intended for Saint Louis has the advantage of the shortest line by Savannah; it has the advantage of transportation by ocean from New York to Savannah, and of transportation from Savannah to Saint Louis in cars that would otherwise go back empty.

There are four links, composed of different companies, in the line of rail between Savannah and Saint Louis. Now, suppose each of these receives but $5 on a car-load of goods going from New York to Saint Louis; it makes money on the shipment, because the car would go empty if it were not permitted to carry the goods.

It is nearly three hundred miles from Savannah to Atlanta Suppose the Central road receives but $5 for the car-load for that distance. As the car was going back empty, it is $5 made. But if you lay down the rule that the Central shall charge $5 a car only for carrying the local freights three hundred miles, it ceases to be able to pay fixed expenses and goes into bankruptcy in a single year.

Therefore you can not reduce the rate of local freight on the Central to $5 a car; but if the Central undertakes to carry a car-load of goods in transit between New York and Saint Louis from Savannah to Atlanta for $5 when the car would otherwise go empty, you prohibit it by establishing the rule that no company shall carry on its own road the same freight for a longer distance for less money than like freight is carried for a shorter distance, and the Central is excluded from carrying this freight at all. The people of the West are deprived of the competition while it lasts of a fifth great line between them and the Eastern cities, and deprived of a cheaper rate of freight which they could secure by the shipment over the line referred to.

Now, what good, let me ask, does it do any one, except the great trunk lines, to prohibit the opening and operating of a fifth great line between the East and the West?

And what good does it do any one but the trunk lines to drive this freight around upon the trunk lines by establishing the rule that you can not carry the like freight a longer distance for less money? In this case you must carry this great through business a longer distance for less money than you carry local freights a shorter distance, or you must prohibit the use of the line for the purpose of carrying through freights.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Georgia will yield to me, as I see he has still considerable material before him, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to that motion?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me before the motion is put to make a statement?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I propose when this interstate-commerce bill comes up for consideration to-morrow to ask the Senate to remain here until the discussion and consideration of it shall be concluded. I give that notice now, so that Senators may understand that it is my purpose to press the bill to a conclusion to-morrow, if possible.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Illinois state what he means by the conclusion of the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir. My purpose is and has been all the time, as I have stated once or twice before, to have the bill under consideration considered and amended as the Senate sees proper to amend it, and when we get through with amendments I propose to ask the Senate to take up the House bill, and then I shall offer the bill that is now under consideration as an amendment to that bill, proposing to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert this as a substitute.

Mr. BECK. All that is proposed now therefore is to finish the amendments of this bill. Is that all?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir; I want to finish the whole subject.

Mr. BECK. Oh, Mr. President, I shall object to that, and for this reason, if I may be allowed——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has merely given a notice.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course it will be in the power of the Senate to take its own course.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to make a statement. I have regarded the discussion of this bill, the Senate bill which has been under discussion for two or three weeks, after the avowal made that there was no expectation of sending it to the House to be passed there, as simply a waste of time. If we are to pass any bill at all it must be the House bill amended as the Senate shall see fit to amend it. There will be, there can be, no serious, earnest discussion of any practical measure on this subject until the House bill is taken up. When the House bill is once taken up and proper amendments suggested then there will be some discussion looking to the accomplishment of something; to tell us that we are to close all that to-morrow is not reasonable. By taking up the House bill there will be some chance of securing concurrent action on a measure that may become a law; but for us to go on talking upon a bill that nobody supposes means anything, and then to close the whole subject up to-morrow, seems to me to be a proposition that can hardly be seriously thought of. I hope this bill will be finished and finished now.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky whether, in his judgment, it is not the best way, as we have gone so far with this bill, which has been the basis of discussion and amendment and is the draught of the Senate committee to whom the subject was referred, to perfect this bill, which will be then the opinion of the Senate, and when we have done that to take up the House bill and make this perfected bill a substitute for it? That will put it in the position of an amendment to the House bill, and a committee of conference will have jurisdiction.

Mr. BECK. When the proposition was made to send the House bill and this bill to the Committee on Railroads, and that committee refused to take it, I regarded that as a confession on the part of that committee that they had nothing to offer us or to enlighten the Senate about. I may be mistaken as to what was the meaning of their objection, but that was the way I construed it, and I was waiting for the House bill to come up so that we could look at something that meant something.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I think that the bill which is now under consideration means something, so far as that is concerned; but, as I have said over and over again, the Committee on Railroads reported the bill which is now under consideration as their deliberate judgment of what ought to be done upon this question, and it has been before the Senate for its consideration. I have been anxious to have the Senate discuss it and amend it in the line of the theory of the bill under consideration as it thought it best to do, and I have said all the time, and say now, that when that is concluded I shall make the motion to take up the House bill, and then move to strike out all after the enacting clause of that bill and insert the bill which is now before the Senate under consideration as perfected by the Senate.

I have felt and believe that in that way we would accomplish the work that the Senate desires to do in the passage of a bill quicker than by referring the subject back to the committee and then having the committee report the whole thing again, because inevitably the discussion will come up upon the two lines of thought and the two policies, whether it comes from the committee by being referred to it again or whether it remains here in the Senate. My idea has been that if we could perfect the bill now before the Senate, then the substitution of it for the House bill would enable those who were in favor of the House bill to give their views upon it, if they wanted to do so, and then to vote upon the question of which measure or line of legislation they were in favor of, and that we should get the two Houses together eventually, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, either by a concurrence on the part of the House in the bill as perfected by the Senate or by a conference committee that the two Houses could finally agree upon. The only object I have had is to accomplish some legislation upon the question as quickly as possible.

Mr. MORGAN. I renew my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 16, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENTRY AND WITHDRAWAL OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting draught and recommending the passage of a bill to amend the laws relating to the entry of distilled spirits in distillery and special bonded warehouses and the withdrawal of the same therefrom; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PURCHASE OF PAINTINGS BY THE GOVERNMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a protest of the board of directors of the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts against the purchase of a portrait of General George H. Thomas by Miss Ransom and a picture of the Electoral Commission by Mrs. Fassett; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

ARRANGEMENT OF THE HALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HARDY. I rise to make a privileged report from the Select Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, having had under consideration the subject of improving the acoustics of the Hall of the House of Representatives, have come to the conclusion that the proper transaction of the business of the House will be greatly facilitated by the removal of such parts of the railing and screen in the rear of the members' desks as are not required for the comfort and convenience of the members, and accordingly recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol be authorized and directed to remove such parts of the railing and screen in the rear of the members' desks as may not be required for the comfort and convenience of the members, under the direction of the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE OVER MISSISSIPPI AT MEMPHIS.

Mr. YOUNG. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the House Calendar and put on its passage now the bill (H. R. 2799) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Tennessee and Arkansas Bridge Company, a corporation organized and created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Arkansas, and the Tennessee Construction and Contracting Company, a corporation organized and created under and by virtue of the laws of Tennessee, be, and the same are hereby, jointly authorized and empowered to erect, construct, and maintain a bridge over the Mississippi River from or near Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, to or near the town of Hopefield, in the State of Arkansas. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and, at the option of the corporations by which it may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot passengers, for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, or for passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroad or public highways leading to the said bridge; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States.

SEC. 3. That said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans; two spans thereof shall not be less than five hundred and fifty feet in length in the clear, and no span shall be less than three hundred feet in the clear. The lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least sixty-five feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, and the bridge shall be at right angles to and its piers parallel with the current of the river. No bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river; and if any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, obstruct such navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridge. And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the district court of the United States in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers, or to exempt this bridge from the operation of the same.

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War, upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties: Provided, That the provisions of section 2 in regard to charges for passengers and freight across said bridge shall not govern the Secretary of War in determining any question arising as to the sum or sums to be paid to the owners of said bridge by said railroad companies for the use of said bridge.

SEC. 5. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said companies or corporations shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of two miles above and two miles below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at extreme high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structure, or its entire removal, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide the public interests require it, is also expressly reserved.

SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, on satisfactory proof that a necessity exists therefor, to require the companies or persons owning said bridge to cause such aids to the passage of said bridge to be constructed, placed, and maintained, at their own cost and expense, in the form of booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for the guiding of rafts, steamboats, and other water craft safely through the passage-way, as shall be specified in his order in that behalf; and on failure of the company or persons aforesaid to make and establish such additional structures within a reasonable time, the said Secretary shall proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense of the United States, and shall refer the matter without delay to the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it shall be to institute, in the name of the United States, proceedings in any district court of the United States in which such bridge, or any part thereof, is located, for the recovery of the cost thereof; and all moneys accruing from such proceedings shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WELLER. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] will, subject to the right to object, make a brief explanation in regard to having the free navigation of the Mississippi at the point where this bridge is contemplated protected by proper sheer-booms, dikes, &c.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it understood that the right to object is reserved?

The SPEAKER. That right is reserved.

Mr. YOUNG. In drafting this bill, Mr. Speaker, I undertook to guard against every possible danger to the free navigation of the river, and I endeavored also to avoid every objection that could be suggested to its passage by any one. If there is anything in it that ought not to be there I am willing that it should be stricken out, or if there is anything omitted that ought to be in it I am willing it should be so amended.

It is an important measure, one I have been trying to get considered by the House for several years, but have never been able to reach on the Calendar. There are seven railroads now centering in Memphis, and all the trains have to connect from east to west and vice versa by crossing the Mississippi River. Three transfer boats are now used to cross these trains, and not unfrequently there is great delay in transporting freight and passengers from one side of the river to the other. I know of no crossing of the Mississippi River where a bridge is more urgently demanded in the interest of commerce and travel than at the city of Memphis. If there is any objection to it I am willing to have it amended so as to conform to the views of any gentleman who thinks any part is objectionable.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. YOUNG. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was impossible to hear the reading of the bill on account of the confusion in the House. Inasmuch as up to this time no bridge has been allowed on the Mississippi River below Cairo, of course the importance of this measure is apparent. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether this bill has been reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG. It has been reported from the Committee on Commerce, and I have the report of that committee now in my hand.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is to be the number of the spans, and what is to be the length of the span?

Mr. YOUNG. I do not remember now, but the bill was drafted after consultation with the best-informed men and two or three officers of the Government, and I think it is free from any reasonable objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. It provides for the same length of the main spans.

Mr. YOUNG. It does. I consulted one of the supervising inspectors of steamboats in reference to that matter, and followed his suggestions.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is to be necessarily a drawbridge?

Mr. YOUNG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. One or more?

Mr. REED. I can not hear the discussion.

The SPEAKER. There are a great many discussions going on.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WELLER. The gentleman from Tennessee is willing to entertain the amendment which I offered. In line 5, section 7, after the word "maintained," insert "at the time of erection of said bridge."

Mr. YOUNG. I am willing to let it go in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the consideration of the bill, and the question will first be on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WELLER'S amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YOUNG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC LAND GRANT.

Mr. MILLIKEN rose.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. COBB. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COBB. I desire to submit a conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast and to restore the same to settlement, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

THOMAS R. COBB,
BARCLAY HENLEY,
L. E. PAYSON,
Conferees on the part of the House.

JOHN T. MORGAN,
H. W. BLAIR,
P. B. PLUMB,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. COBB. I desire to call the attention of the House specially to the conference report. I do not care to discuss it myself. But I trust if there are any members on the floor who desire to discuss it they will do so. This is a report coming from the committee of conference having in charge the Atlantic and Pacific land-grant bill. The committee of conference have failed to agree, the difference growing out of the amendment which was placed on the bill by the Senate, commonly known as the Morgan amendment.

The reason why I call the attention of the House to it is that we want a full and fair expression of the opinion of the House with reference to that amendment. I may say this: that I believe that the committee will be able to agree in the future; that the committee of conference on the part of the House will be able to sustain the views your committee have already expressed; that the Senate, in other words, will recede from its amendment. The Senate has done so to the extent of rejecting this amendment, when offered by the Senator from Alabama, to the Oregon Central land-grant bill. They refused to place that amendment upon that bill; and for greater reasons the amendment ought not to be placed upon the Atlantic and Pacific land-grant bill. There are no good reasons to my mind which ought to cause the Senate to insist on this amendment to the Atlantic and Pacific land-grant bill. There are no intervening rights known to your committee which would warrant us, in my judgment, concurring in the Morgan amendment.

What we do desire is to have as full an expression of the opinion of the House as possible upon this report, whether or not we will insist upon our position and stand by it, whether the House will sustain us in that or not. I do not care to discuss the question myself as it was pretty fully discussed by members of the Committee on Public Lands when the bill was before the House before. The facts were then stated fully in detail, and the law in the case was generally discussed. I do not care, therefore, to go over that ground again unless it is desired by some gentleman to have a fuller discussion of the subject; or if any gentleman has any suggestion to make in regard to these amendments of the Senate I shall be glad to hear him, and the committee of which I am a member will be pleased to hear any suggestions which are calculated to throw light upon the subject. We think we are in possession of all the facts and all the laws governing the case, but we are ready and anxious to hear any one who may have anything to say upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman from Indiana submit?

Mr. COBB. To insist upon the disagreement, and ask a further conference.

Mr. HISCOCK. Has the Senate amendment been read?

Mr. COBB. It has been read; not this morning, however.

Mr. HISCOCK. I think the Senate amendment ought to be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to have the amendments of the Senate read, for the motion is to insist upon the disagreement and ask a further conference.

Mr. COBB. I have not the bill before me, but I have the amendments as printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The bill itself ought to be in the possession of the conferees when they make their report.

The Chair will ask the gentleman from Indiana whether the House conferees disagree as to all of the Senate amendments to that bill, or only to one of them?

Mr. COBB. We disagree to all of them.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendments of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the word "forfeited," in line 17, down to and including line 24, as follows:

"And the title thereto resumed by the United States, and said lands restored to the public domain, and made subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States as though said grant had never been made; but nothing in this act shall be construed to recognize the right of said company to any land in the Indian Territory, or claim thereto, on condition or otherwise, except the right of way and land for stations."

And insert:

"And the title thereto resumed by the United States, and said lands declared to be part of the public domain, but not subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States until after the termination of the legal proceedings prescribed by this act: Provided, That the price of the lands so forfeited and restored shall be the same as heretofore fixed for the even-numbered sections within said grant.

"SEC. 2. That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Missouri to hear and determine all questions and controversies concerning the rights and equities in said forfeited land that are claimed or asserted by the United States, or by any person or corporation claiming the same under or in consequence of any law of the United States, or any act of its lawfully authorized agents, and to enforce any judgment or decree, either interlocutory or final, that said court shall render in respect of said lands or any interest therein.

"SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States for the western district of Missouri, under the direction of the Department of Justice, immediately to proceed in the circuit court of the United States for the said district, by bill in equity, in the name of the United States of America as plaintiff, against any corporations or persons that claim any interest in the lands hereby declared forfeited, arising under said act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, or under this act, so as to bring before said court for its determination the validity of such claim, whether the same be legal or equitable.

"SEC. 4. That any person or corporation not made a party defendant in said proceeding, but claiming any interest under the laws of the United States in the lands, or any part thereof, which are declared forfeited by this act, may present such claim by petition in said cause, duly verified by oath; and if the court, upon consideration thereof, shall decide that the adjudication and settlement of such claim are necessary to do complete justice in said cause, the court shall direct that such further proceedings be had upon such petition as that the same may be fully heard and determined, and shall proceed to decree upon the same as fully as if such petitioner had been made a party defendant in said suit: Provided, That no such petition shall be filed after twelve months from the date of the filing of the bill in said cause.

"SEC. 5. That the court, if it shall see fit, may tax all the costs of the suit under the third section of this act against the United States, and shall apportion the costs of any proceeding under the fourth section of this act between the parties according to justice and equity. Any party to the suit instituted under this act shall have the right of appeal from any final decree thereon to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same conditions as are prescribed by law and the rules of said court for appeals in equity cases; and the Supreme Court shall cause said appeal to be advanced on the docket so that the same shall be speedily determined; but no right of appeal shall exist after six months from the time when said final decree is entered on the records of the circuit court of the United States.

"SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be construed to recognize the right of said company to any land in the Indian Territory, or claim thereto, on condition or otherwise, except the right of way and land for stations."

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana as to the purport of these amendments of the Senate. From the reading of the amendments, as I understand them, it would seem that they hold in abeyance the disposition of these lands, and provide for a judicial determination of the rights of the parties—that is to say, it opens the courts for all parties, and in the mean time it holds in abeyance the title, as far as any disposition may be made of the lands.

Mr. COBB. That is the effect of the amendment. It provides further that the Attorney-General shall commence suit and have the matter judicially determined by the courts, making the United States the plaintiff, and requiring the institution of these suits by the Attorney-General for the purpose of settling the question of forfeiture, as well as such other questions as may intervene with reference to the lands covered by this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to inquire whether there is any objection to providing a way in which the rights of these parties may be promptly determined, getting the matter before the courts at once.

Mr. COBB. We think so.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like that the House should be advised upon that subject as to what objection there can be to providing some speedy way for the determination of the rights of parties to this land. Of course I assume that the Senate, from its amendments, has grave doubts as to what these rights are; or at least that there is serious doubt with reference to the matter; and that it is wise to reach a conclusion speedily. I would like therefore to have the ground of the objection fully stated.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, the first part of the first amendment, relating to the forfeiture in this case, is perhaps an improvement of the verbiage of the bill, and the second portion of the first part of the amendment is only to make that part of the bill in accordance with the Senate amendment.

The second amendment not only sends any controversy that may arise to the courts of the United States, but compels the district attorney of the United States in the district named to commence proceedings, and in that way makes the Government the actor, whether it desires to enter into the controversy or whether there be just cause to enter into the controversy or not. I therefore concur with my colleague from Indiana [Mr. COBB] in the opinion that this amendment is improper; and while I would favor any provision that would give either party in interest the right, if they have it not under the general law, to go into the courts of the United States for the purpose of adjusting their rights, I do not and would not favor the second amendment, which compels the Government to go into the courts.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me for a question, as I wish the House to be fully informed upon this subject? Would the gentleman do this: would he open these lands to entry under the homestead or pre-emption law with this question of title undetermined? I desire to make this suggestion, whether it is wise for the Government to turn this land back into the public domain subject to entry under these laws, the homestead and pre-emption laws, leaving the question of legal ownership undetermined?

Now, then, is it not wise to provide the Government shall go ahead and have this question determined, to the end that a period may be soon fixed and the rights settled of these parties in these lands with reference to their going back into the public domain?

Mr. OATES. I think the bill settles the question of law, subject, of course, to the adjudication of the court. But I would not compel the Government to inaugurate proceedings for the purpose of adjusting any claims of other parties.

Mr. HISCOCK. Suppose this land is turned over immediately and becomes a part of the public domain under this act, it is made subject to entry under the homestead law. Now suppose you do go to the court and the court should perchance hold this railroad company had some right or title to this land, then of course claimants to this land, parties that have entered upon it, will come here with their claims for indemnity. Now the point on which I wish information is whether it is not best to have that question settled with reference to the future before this land becomes a part of the public domain, and if that is wise whether the Government should not proceed promptly to have it settled.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman from New York certainly knows it has been frequently adjudicated by the highest courts that he who purchases land from the Government takes it under the maxim caveat emptor.

Mr. HISCOCK. I concede that to be true. But since I have been here I believe I know of instances where the parties making entries went upon the land and made improvements upon it and we gave compensation. I believe, notwithstanding that technical rule, when by an act of Congress we have turned over land and invited people to enter on it they are entitled to the sympathy of Congress.

Mr. OATES. The measure of relief to which such parties are entitled, having entered upon the land under the maxim I have alluded to, is the amount of money they paid for it. And sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. I think we can wait until the exigency arises.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] moves that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment and ask for a further conference.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recede has preference over the other.

The question being taken on Mr. HISCOCK'S motion, there were—ayes 45, noes 85.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB].

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as managers of the conference on the part of the House the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. COBB, the gentleman from California, Mr. HENLEY, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. PAYSON.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 729) for the protection of children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, desiring to move that the House insist on its amendments to the bill disagreed to by the Senate and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendments be read.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 20, page 1, strike out the words "within their view" and insert the words "in the presence."

In line 27, page 2, strike out "twenty-one" and insert "sixteen."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] moves that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as managers of the conference on the part of the House the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. WILSON, the gentleman from New York, Mr. SPRIGGS, and the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. JEFFORDS.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 79, noes 45.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LAND GRANT IN OREGON.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 181) to declare the forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon be taken from the Speaker's table for non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and the House proceeded to consider the same.

Mr. COBB. I move that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, and ask a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce hereafter the conferees on the part of the House.

MARY A. GRENNON.

Mr. PARKER. I ask unanimous consent that a bill reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and laid on the table may be placed on the Private Calendar. It is the bill (H. R. 3735) for the relief of Mary A. Grennon.

The SPEAKER. Was the bill reported this morning?

Mr. PARKER. No, sir; it was reported heretofore, when I was not present, so that I did not know of its being reported adversely.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct that the bill be placed on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House. Any gentleman has the right to have placed on the Calendar a bill reported adversely. Such bills are laid on the table only by unanimous consent.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I wish to know whether I can raise the question of consideration as between the Mexican pension bill and the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] can oppose the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee to go into Committee of the Whole House; but there can be no question of consideration raised against such a motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I hope the motion will be voted down, in order that we may take up the Mexican pension bill to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that this is private bill day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But a majority vote, as I understand, will enable us to take up the Mexican pension bill.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MCMILLIN, there were—ayes 107, nays 15.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope the gentleman will not press that point. This day is assigned by the rules to private business; and if any business of that sort is to be done this session, it must be done now.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I know that, Mr. Speaker, but believed the House would indulge me to make this statement.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If we can have a vote upon this question by yea and nay, I will withdraw the point as to a quorum. I want gentlemen to go on record as to whether they are in favor of the Mexican pension bill or not.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the proposition that we have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. No one has demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. We would have no objection to going on record upon the Mexican pension bill; but the bill to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] refers is not the Mexican pension bill, but the Senate's amendments, which are against the Mexican pensions.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. MCMILLIN and Mr. TOWNSHEND.

[The tellers proceeded to take their places, but some disagreement arose between them as to the places they should respectively occupy.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that tellers have been appointed; but members who desire to vote can not find them. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have taken the position usually assigned to those appointed to act as tellers, and am ready to act as teller.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And so have I.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the tellers can not agree upon their respective places——

Mr. KELLEY. I ask that, as tellers have been ordered, the gentlemen may take their places, so that the vote may be counted. If they cannot find their positions, I ask——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am occupying the accustomed position for the tellers. I insist that the gentleman from Illinois ought not to undertake to change the method that has been adopted here for nearly a century.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the Speaker appoint some other member to take my place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as a teller the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand them?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will demand the yeas and nays if I can do so at this time without waiving the right of insisting on the point that there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's proposition can not be entertained, as the tellers have not yet reported.

The tellers reported—ayes 137, noes 34.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demand the yeas and nays. I have made an effort to see how many friends there are of the Mexican pension bill, and I see only thirteen on the other side.

On the demand for the yeas and nays there were—ayes 23.

Mr. HOLMAN. Count the other side.

The other side was counted; and there were—noes 122.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. No quorum is required for the yeas and nays and one-fifth of those present have not voted for them, and they are therefore not ordered. On the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] there were ayes 127, noes 34. So the ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

HIRAM JOHNSON.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business on the Private Calendar is the bill (H. R. 1477) to pay Hiram Johnson and other persons herein named the several sums of money herein specified, being the surplus of a military assessment paid by them and accounted for to the United States in excess of the amount required for the indemnity for which it was levied and collected.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move that all the bills upon the Private Calendar be set aside or informally passed over until we reach the bill (H. R. 2158) for the benefit of John C. Herndon.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GEDDES. I object. In reference to the Hiram Johnson bill, I think it is improperly on the Calendar. It was disposed of at the last session of the House by a reference of it to the Committee on War Claims, where it is now pending.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think the gentleman from Ohio on examination of the RECORD will find there was an agreement that this bill should retain its place on the Calendar, and that is how it came to be here, so that when it was reported back it should not go to the heel of the Calendar.

Mr. GEDDES. That may be the case.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am not sure, as I speak from a memory six months old. I ask that the bill be passed over informally.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 130) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HALSELL] who has reported this bill has requested me to move that it be passed over informally, and I make that motion.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ELLIS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 7970) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for the fulfillment of treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELLIS. I give notice that I shall ask for its consideration tomorrow.

WILLIAM H. DAVIS.

The committee resumed its session.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4382) for the relief of William H. Davis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $3,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to indemnify William H. Davis for the destruction of his wharf and warehouse at San Diego, in the State of California, by the United States troops, during the winter of 1861 and 1862. That the sum hereby appropriated is made immediately available.

The report (by Mr. GEDDES) was read, as follows:

The claimant in this case asks to be allowed and paid the sum of $60,000 to indemnify him for the destruction of his wharf and warehouse at San Diego, in the State of California, by United States troops, during the winter of 1861 and 1862. He avers that in the year of 1861 and 1862 he was the lawful owner and in the actual peaceable possession of said property, in what was then known as the New San Diego. The wharf was constructed of wood, 550 feet in length and 50 feet in width, with an addition adjoining the same at right angles 225 feet in length, the whole being constructed of piles of redwood of from 30 to 75 feet in length, and from 15 to 28 inches in diameter, driven into the soil six feet apart, and braced together with plank, and covered with imported spruce plank. The warehouse stood contiguous to and was used in connection with the said wharf for the storage of goods. It was constructed of heavy timbers and planks, and being 50 feet in length by 32 feet in width, and two stories high. The alleged cost of the construction of said property was the sum of $60,000; that at the time the same was destroyed by the United States troops it was in a good state of preservation, as he claims, and worth the sum of $60,000.

It is further claimed that said property was appropriated and rendered useless by the United States troops in active service, under the command of Maj. G. O. Haller and other officers; that the material of said wharf was used for fuel, building, and for other purposes by said soldiers.

It is further claimed that it was the only wharf then existing at said town of San Diego; that from the time of its construction in 1851 until its destruction in 1861 the claimant had received wharfage affording a net average profit of $150 per month.

This claim was first presented to Congress in 1872, where it has been upon the files of the committees of the two Houses without action until the Forty-fifth Congress, when it was reported favorably by the Claims Committee of the Senate and the Committee on War Claims of the House. It was not reached on the Calendar of Private Business, and was again re-referred in the Forty-sixth Congress, when an act was passed approved March 3, 1881, as follows:

"An act for the relief of William H. Davis.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army the alleged taking by the United States authorities, for the use of the United States troops, during the years 1861 and 1862, of a certain wharf and warehouse property, formerly situated in San Diego, Cal., alleged to have been the property of William H. Davis, of Oakland, Cal., and to have been used by troops of the United States for fuel; such investigation to extend to the title of the property and the incumbrances thereon the status of the owner, whether loyal or not, the value of the property destroyed, the circumstances of the destruction, and by whose direction, authority, or permission it was destroyed, and the reasons for the neglect to give notice to the War Department at or soon after the destruction occurred; and when such investigation shall be completed the Secretary of War shall report the result thereof, with his recommendation thereon, to Congress for action in the premises.

"Approved March 3, 1881."

In pursuance of the above act the Secretary of War authorized and directed an investigation of said claim by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, and report the conclusions to which the Quartermaster-General would arrive after consideration of the evidence upon the questions submitted. The case was referred by the War Department to the Quartermaster-General's Department, April 5, 1881, and immediately re-referred to Colonel Saxton for investigation. A thorough investigation followed and was returned by him to the Quartermaster's Department November 12, 1881, as follows:

"PHILADELPHIA, PA., November 12, 1881.

"GENERAL: I have the honor to return herewith your reference of the 8th of April, 1881, directing me to investigate, in compliance with private act No. 106 [chap. 200], approved March 3, 1881, the claim of William H. Davis, of Oakland, Cal., vs. The United States, for use of certain wharf and warehouse property at San Diego, Cal., alleged to have been used by troops of the United States in 1861–'62.

"No papers connected with the claim were referred to me, but putting myself in communication with Mr. Davis, he placed at my disposal copies of his original petition to Congress and affidavits before Congress, and also presented new evidence in the case, as well as other papers bearing upon the subject.

"Learning from some articles published in the San Francisco Chronicle early in 1880 that the claim had been denounced a fraud, I called upon the editor of that journal, and obtained from him a list of persons whose evidence he advised taking. He also gave me the address of the writer of the articles in his paper against the claim, Mr. B. F. Catlin, a clerk in the San Francisco naval office. Messrs. Catlin and Davis also furnished me the names of a number of persons who were supposed to have knowledge of the facts in the case, and on May 18, 1881, I sent to each of these parties, whom I could not see personally, a letter (copy inclosed, marked 1), requesting their testimony in the form of an affidavit as to their knowledge of the matter. I received but very few responses to this letter.

"Desiring to verify the testimony of as many of the witnesses who had already testified as possible, and to place the evidence I could gather bearing upon the case in a convenient form for reference, I constituted myself a committee of investigation, employing one of my clerks as recorder. I held sessions at San Francisco, on May 2, 7, 8, and 9; at San Diego, June 7, 8, and 9; and again at San Francisco July 21, August 25, September 1, 17, and 28, 1881.

"In the case of all the previous witnesses who were yet alive, whose presence could be obtained, they verified their previous testimony, except in a few unimportant instances, where slight corrections were made.

"There came also before the commission other witnesses, testifying both for and against the claim.

"The fact that the witnesses were so widely scattered has made the investigation occupy a period of several months, but it was at last concluded on the 28th of September, 1881. At this time Surgeon Baily, U. S. A., having ordered a change of climate as necessary to my recovery from a severe attack of rheumatism, I went on leave of absence, and this has delayed my final report until the present time.

"I inclose herewith a full report of the proceedings of the commission (see inclosure marked 2), together with affidavits pro and con (marked Exhibits A to W, inclusive). I inclose also a tracing made in my office of a map of San Diego, on file in the engineer's office, headquarters Military Division of the Pacific. This map shows the location of Davis's wharf and warehouse, as well as the location of the block now occupied by the United States military barracks and the Government wharf site, which were given by Mr. Davis to the United States. It does not, however, show the location of another block given by Mr. Davis to the United States, and which is now used as a quartermaster's corral and stables. (See inclosure marked 3.)

"In addition to my report of the proceedings of the commission of investigation, I submit the following as replies to the questions embraced in the act of relief, answering them seriatim:

"1. The title to the property and the incumbrances thereon?

"The title is not questioned. It is partially proved by the testimony taken, and the records of the assessor's office at San Diego, which I saw, showed the property to have been assessed in Mr. Davis's name for taxes for several years past before 1861.

"2. The status of the owner, whether loyal or not?

"The testimony is full and explicit on this point, and I have not heard Mr. Davis's loyalty questioned.

"3. The value of the property destroyed?

"The testimony shows the property to have been worth from sixty to eighty thousand dollars when built, and for some time thereafter, but it is greatly at variance as to its value in the winter of 1861–'62.

"4. The circumstances of the destruction and by whose direction or permission it was destroyed?

"The evidence on this point is voluminous and is very contradictory. A large number of witnesses, including several ex-Army officials, testify to the destruction of the property; while others, also including ex-officers and soldiers, testify to the reverse. A charitable explanation of this discrepancy in the evidence is that men's memories are not always to be relied upon after a lapse of eighteen years.

"5. The reasons for the neglect to give notice to the War Department at the time or soon after the destruction occurred?

"This point is fully answered by the testimony taken.

"The sessions of the commission of investigation were open, and the most of the testimony was given orally, and recorded by my clerk. Mr. Davis did not employ a clerk or stenographer, and shortly before the labors of the commission closed, his attorney, Mr. Metcalfe, asked me to furnish him, at his expense, a copy of the testimony taken and of all the affidavits printed, in order that he might make up his argument in the case. I was not certain that I had the authority to grant his request, and advised him to apply to the War Department for permission, which he did. In the mean time I allowed him to read my record and complete his argument in my office, and to have the paper printed under the supervision of my chief clerk, no copies to be delivered until the Secretary of War should give the necessary authority. This has since been given, and printed copies similar to the one inclosed have been furnished the claimant's attorney, to which he has appended his own argument. I inclose this in addition as convenient for reference in making up your report on the case. In conducting this examination it has been my earnest endeavor to collect all the evidence possible bearing on the case, and to put it in such a form as to enable the Department to come to a correct judgment.

"In the hope that I have been in a measure successful,

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"RUFUS SAXTON,

"Deputy Quartermaster-General,
Chief Quartermaster Military Division of the Pacific.

"The QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL, U. S. A."

On the above report of Col. Rufus Saxton, as above given, the Quartermaster-General made a report December 5, 1881, in which, among other things, he says:

"As a result of the investigation, I am of opinion that—

"First. The title of the property is in W. H. Davis, the claimant. No incumbrances thereon have been discovered.

"Second. The owner was loyal.

"Third. The value of the lumber taken for fuel did not exceed $3,000 as material.

"Fourth. There was an unusual rainfall in December, 1861, and January, 1862, which probably rendered it difficult to haul fuel for the garrison, and this led the garrison to use a portion of the material on the wharf for fuel. The wharf being thus injured, they may have used a small quantity also for fencing, and one or two shallow wells may have been supplied with wooden curbs from the same source.

"Fifth. The commanding officers, Capts. Thomas E. Roberts and W. F. French, California Volunteers, were present, and as the wharf material could not have been taken up and burned in the barracks and quarters without their knowledge, they must be held accountable for whatever depredation was actually committed by the troops.

"Sixth. The reasons for not notifying the War Department at or soon after the injury was done are to be found in the impoverished condition of the claimant; his absence at a long distance from San Diego, the slow communication by mail between San Diego and that part of California in which he then resided, and also in the fact that the War Department when the mischief was done had no power to relieve him by payment of damages."

Thereupon the Secretary of War reported to Congress as follows:

"WAR DEPARTMENT,
"Washington City, December 13, 1881.

"SIR: In pursuance of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1881, entitled "An act for the relief of William H. Davis," I have the honor to report that the investigation thereby directed to be made has been completed, and that the result thereof is embodied in a report of the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army, a copy of which is herewith transmitted, together with copies of the papers on which it is based.

"In further pursuance of the above-mentioned act, I have the honor to recommend that the authority of Congress be given for the payment to said William H. Davis of the sum of $3,000, with interest thereon from the 1st day of February, 1862, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, in full satisfaction of his claim arising out of the matters referred to in the said act.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
"Secretary of War.

"The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives."

The principal and most difficult question involved in this case from the beginning has been the measure of compensation to which the claimant was entitled. The unsatisfactory character of the testimony submitted prior to the act of March 3, 1881, led the Committee on War Claims to submit to this House a report which induced said legislation. In that report, Mr. Colwell, among other things, says:

"Other proof as to their value is wanting, and your committee is of opinion that even if affidavits of experts were presented it would not be entirely fair to the Government to have this point left entirely to ex parte testimony. They have thought better to let the damages be assessed by a sworn officer of the Government; and as the facilities at the command of the Secretary of War for determining this point are better and can be applied more readily than perhaps those of any of the officers of the Government, they report in favor of leaving this task to him."

Congress having submitted to the War Department for investigation and to report on all the questions involved in this case, your committee, after a careful examination of the evidence taken and the reports made thereon, see no reason for overruling the findings submitted. Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for the bill (H. R. 107) filed herein.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I move a substitute for the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out and insert as follows:

"SECTION 1. That the claim of William H. Davis, of Oakland, Cal., for the alleged destruction of his wharf and warehouse at San Diego, in said State, during the winter of 1861–'62, by Union troops, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication, with jurisdiction to ascertain and render judgment for the actual value only of the aforesaid property so destroyed, without interest: Provided, That the testimony taken pursuant to an act of Congress entitled 'An act for the relief of William H. Davis,' approved March 3, 1881, or filed before the commissioner, Col. Rufus Saxton, designated to make the investigation directed by said act, or true copies of said testimony, may be used on trial before the Court of Claims by either party, together with such competent evidence as may be introduced by either party: And provided further, That the said Davis shall begin his action to recover said claim within one year from the passage of this act."

Mr. GLASCOCK. Mr. Chairman, as the report of the committee, read at the Clerk's desk, has been so full in this statement pertaining to the history of this matter, I have no desire to detain the House by making any unnecessary or tedious relation of the facts involved. However, as these reports as read by the Clerk are rarely listened to by members I desire to make a brief statement, after which I am satisfied the merits of this case will become so apparent to the House that the modest measure we ask will be adopted—that is, reference to the Court of Claims, so it may be determined by a competent tribunal.

In 1850–'51 a wharf was constructed at the town of San Deigo, in California, by the claimant, William H. Davis. In 1861–'62 the testimony taken, to which I will subsequently refer, shows that that wharf was in good condition. The testimony is conflicting, I will admit, but the finding of Col. Rufus Saxton was that the wharf was in good condition at that time, not having suffered at that time from the toredo or other destroying insect. In 1861–'62 we had in California an unexampled bad winter. Rains fell. San Diego was practically cut off from the surrounding country. No teams could be run over the roads, as the horses would mire. No fuel could be obtained for the United States military post established at that place, and they were compelled to rely, I will state in passing, upon wood hauled a distance of twenty or thirty miles to afford fuel for the post. In that condition of affairs, fuel being needed, the soldiers, under and by, I submit, the instructions of their superior officers, acting upon a military necessity, I admit, took a portion of this wharf and consumed it for fuel, besides that which went into the making of fences and other Government improvements required about the post. I will admit also that the testimony is conflicting as to the amount of this wharf taken, and the warehouse, for there is a warehouse as well as a wharf embraced in the claim; but the evidence of Col. Rufus Saxton shows the work of demolition was commenced by the United States troops, and the testimony further shows that one hundred feet at least of that wharf were removed during the time when one officer was in charge of that post.

Now it is a well-known fact that when a work of demolition of this kind is commenced as a military necessity—I will admit under and by the advice and with the consent of those in charge of that post—I say as soon as this work is once begun it does not take very long for the ordinary people of the town, the laymen, to find some authority for the further demolition of the structure. Be this as it may, I submit that the Government has determined its liability in the findings adopted by the Secretary of War, and by the report rendered by him. The Secretary of War finds in his report that $3,000 worth of damage has been done to the property of this claimant, and he reports that as the extent of the liability of the United States, as admitted damages for the work of demolition. It makes no difference to us whether or not the wharf had been entirely demolished or the warehouse torn down by the authority of the United States. When its authority is once admitted, then we say this House can not refuse at least to go behind that admission on the part of the United States and ascertain the full extent of the damages.

That this was a valuable improvement is shown conclusively by the testimony of all the witnesses in the case. That it cost from sixty to eighty thousand dollars to construct it is admitted. It was bringing in a yearly revenue of $1,800 to its owner, which at a 6 per cent. rate would represent a capitalized value of $30,000 at least.

When this large and valuable improvement was attached, when the first work of demolition was begun by the authority of the soldiers of the United States, when that is admitted, we say that this House can not go behind that evidence, can not claim that the United States was not liable, or that that evidence is so conflicting that the citizen whose property has been so destroyed should be allowed only the smallest or minimum damages. We submit, sir, if the testimony is gone through with by every member of this House, if gentlemen will sit down and read it carefully, there is not a well-minded man on the floor of the House who will not come to the conclusion that Mr. Davis should have the full amount of his claim, $60,000 at least.

The committee of the Forty-seventh Congress, by whom the matter was passed upon, rendered a report through Mr. HOUK, the chairman of that committee, and advocated the payment of $20,000 as an act of partial justice at least. If this committee had presented a report giving $15,000 or $20,000 there would have been no opposition on our part, for though we believe the full amount would be just, we know how tedious matters are of this sort before this and its kindred body. But, sir, this matter being in this condition, this report having been rendered by Mr. HOUK in the Forty-seventh Congress, and having been rendered in the present case by the present Committee on War Claims, and the House, seeing the difference, on the statement of facts, between the conclusions arrived at by the present committee and that of the last House, is as well prepared to pass upon it as we ourselves who have examined it so carefully. We submit that the Secretary of War, in rendering his report advocating the payment of $3,000 as an adequate measure of damages for the destruction of this property, is entirely wrong in the basis upon which he founds his opinion. They have taken the claim and assessed the property as a claim for so much cord-wood; and valuable property, which cost from $60,000 to $80,000, which was bringing in a yearly rental of $1,800, has been destroyed by the instrumentality of the United States Government, and the damages in the case are fixed on the same basis as if it had been so much cord-wood consumed by the United States post at that time. If they had taken into consideration the value of the franchise, the value of the property, of the investment, and then arrived at a conclusion, there would have been some justice in the matter. But evidently that has not been done; and in support of that I desire to read a few words from the report of the Quartermaster-General, M. C. Meigs, rendered to the Secretary of War. He says:

The wharf was so important to the town, being apparently at the time and for many years the only wharf in its harbor, that any injury done to it by tearing up its roadway and using it for fuel or for any other purpose would make a great impression upon the town's people, and they would be liable to exaggerate the injury done.

The testimony shows that the wharf was entirely dismantled in course of time, the greater part of the injury having been done in December and January:

As the quantity of fuel needed for a month's supply appears to have been about twenty-two cords, which is equal to 33,792 feet, board measure, of timber, it appears that if the troops depended entirely upon this source of supply for their fuel during the month of December and one-half the month of January, they would have used 46,688 feet of timber, board measure.

Of 3-inch plank covering the wharf, I found that there were in place, if the covering was all there, 204,500 feet, board measure, and therefore taking up one-fifth of this covering would have furnished all the fuel that was probably needed in that time.

Soldiers do not undertake severe labor for purposes of wanton destruction, and the least laborious method of getting fuel from the wharf was to take up the planking. I do not, therefore, think it probable that any great injury was done by them to the capping, bracing, and piles, all of heavy timber, and more securely fastened than the plank covering and more difficult to take away.

The testimony shows that the piles were sawn off even with the water.

The removal of one-fifth of the plank covering would have made a part of the wharf impassable for carts and horses. But it would not have destroyed the wharf.

At $30 per M, 46,688 feet of plank cost only $1,400. Its cost laid on the wharf at a place where skilled labor was scarce and costly may have been $2,800, and I think that the value of the material taken from the wharf by the troops for fuel can not have exceeded this sum. The wharf has disappeared, except some piles.

"I think," he says, "the value can not have exceeded this sum arrived at in this manner." I submit that no court or competent tribunal could base a conclusion of that sort upon competent evidence. There is no conclusion arrived at. There is a mere hypothesis, a guess, that the same may reach $2,800, and therefore $3,000 is given as being a large and munificent sum for this Government to tender for a total damage and destruction done to a building that cost from $60,000 to $80,000, and which was bringing in $1,800 a year revenue.

It can not be seen, Mr. Chairman, that this report is based as he has stated it. The measure of damages is board measure for a valuable franchise, so many dollars per thousand feet for a valuable wharf and warehouse. Why, sir, suppose a piano had been destroyed and used for fuel under those circumstances, the honorable Secretary would have given so many dollars for board measure for that valuable instrument. I submit it is all wrong and that this House should not countenance anything of that sort.

In conclusion, I want to state that we do not ask this House to give any $60,000 now. We do not ask this House to give any $20,000, as was advocated by the last Committee on War Claims in the Forty-seventh Congress. All we ask this House to do in justice to this man is to send the case to the Court of Claims and let it be adjudicated by a competent tribunal upon competent evidence introduced before that tribunal. That is the full extent of our claim. We say let the Court of Claims take the claim; let the testimony already collected under the law of Congress under which Colonel Saxton acted as commissioner and before whom this evidence was collected, let that evidence be considered as legal evidence before this court, and let the parties have the additional privilege of introducing any other competent testimony that they may require. And further we place a limitation upon this; we say that unless Mr. Davis prosecutes his claim before that tribunal within one year from the time of the passage of this act he shall be barred from all further claim for relief.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GEDDES. In submitting a few words in vindication of the action of the Committee on War Claims in this case, I think it proper to advert briefly in the first place to the order of proceeding in the case before I make any reference to its merits.

The damages alleged to have been sustained by this claimant are said to have occurred in the winter of 1861–'62. No claim was made by him to any department of the Government; and no appeal was ever made by him to Congress for remuneration until, perhaps, the Forty-sixth Congress, or it may have been a little earlier, certainly not until 1872, ten years after the damage is said to have accrued to him.

He then laid his claim before Congress, and on investigation of it in the War Claims Committee I find that committee concluded that the case was imperfectly prepared; that there was no such evidence, either ex parte or otherwise, before them as to warrant any finding of the committee. And the Committee on War Claims of this House in the Forty-sixth Congress, appreciating manifestly that the case was thus imperfectly prepared, made a report. I desire to read a single paragraph from that report as indicating the considerations that induced a reference of the case to the War Department for investigation. In that report they say:

They have thought better to let the damages be assessed by a sworn officer of the Government; and as the facilities at the command of the Secretary of War for determining this point are better, and can be applied more readily than perhaps those of any other officers of the Government, they report in favor of leaving this task to him.

Thereupon an act was passed based upon that report, approved March 3, 1881, referring the subject-matter of this claim to the War Department for investigation. That investigation followed, and was full, complete, and thorough. The officers of the Government, visiting San Francisco and San Diego and the homes of the witnesses, took a large amount of testimony, such proof as the parties representing the Government and representing the claimant had within their power and saw proper to submit.

I will read a single paragraph from the report based on that thorough investigation, and which indicates the thoroughness of the investigation:

In conducting this examination it has been my earnest endeavor to collect all the evidence possible bearing on the case, and to put it in such a form as to enable the Department to come to a correct judgment.

That certainly was done. There will be found here a mass of testimony exceedingly voluminous. It would be unjustifiable to undertake to repeat it here, or any portion of it. But upon that this report of the War Department was made.

Now, we come to the report itself based upon the investigation of Colonel Saxton, who represented the War Department in the case. The War Department recommend, as has already been stated, the payment of $3,000. I am not going to stop now to discuss whether they overrate or underrate the damages sustained by this party. I am not here to discuss the question of damages, or to controvert the claim made by those representing this claimant on the floor of the House.

I only say that a reinvestigation of this case, although by a judicial tribunal, will not perhaps afford any more thorough opportunity to get at the facts than has already been had. I will submit one or two statements in regard to the merits of this case in order to justify the resistance which our committee is now making to a reference of the case to the Court of Claims. A proposition to refer a claim of this kind always impresses me favorably. I always feel that this House as a body does not constitute the safest tribunal for the investigation of judicial questions or the ascertainment of matters of fact upon which the law is to be applied. I know the difficulty of obtaining the attention of gentlemen representing other sections of the country and overburdened with other matters of importance to each individual claim as it comes up, and therefore I always feel willing to refer these cases to the Court of Claims wherever it can be safely done. I ought to say at this point that, under the Bowman act, committees can refer cases to the Court of Claims; this House may refer cases to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act; and so far as my observation and experience go our committees are very liberal in that respect. Many cases have been referred from the Committee on War Claims, and some of them are now being decided by the Court of Claims and being reported back to the committee. So that, so far as regards a reference of these cases to the Court of Claims, there is abundant opportunity for it and great liberality in that direction; but the Committee on War Claims did not consider this to be a proper case for reference at this stage.

In justification of the action of the committee, let me read from the report of Colonel Saxton to the War Department. Under the fourth proposition he says:

The evidence on this point as to the destruction of the property is very voluminous and very unsatisfactory. A large number of witnesses, including several ex-Army officers, testify to the destruction of the property, while others, also including ex-officers and soldiers, testify to the reverse. A charitable explanation of this discrepancy in the evidence is that men's memories are not always to be relied upon after a lapse of eighteen years.

I think he might very pertinently have added there that the weight of testimony often turns upon the opportunity that the witnesses have had to obtain knowledge of the facts to which they testify. The testimony of an Army officer who was in charge at the time, who occupied these grounds in the winter of 1861–'62, and who had abundant opportunity to know the extent of the damage done, if any damage was done, would be entitled to more weight as a witness in any tribunal than the testimony of a mere casual observer, having a more imperfect opportunity to know the facts. To illustrate this view, let me read a statement which appears in a report in regard to the testimony: November 28, 1881, Colonel Saxton forwards for filing with his report two affidavits made by Pascal Margry and John Baker, dated, respectively, October 28 and November 1, 1881. In these affidavits the affiants substantially testify that in January, 1862, they were members of Company D, Fifth California Infantry; that they went with their company to San Diego and were stationed there about ten months from January, 1862—covering the very period within which it is claimed this damage occurred.

They further state that when they arrived at that place there was an old wharf, in a dilapidated condition, near the buildings occupied by the troops, and that while they were there part of it fell down from natural decay and was carried out to sea by the tide. They further state that neither the wharf nor any part of it was destroyed by United States troops; that a quantity of wood was on hand, corded up and in the quartermaster's charge, when they came to the post, which wood was used by the troops as fuel, and that, moreover, a quantity of wood for the use of the garrison was cut on the island near San Diego and boated over by the troops for their use.

Now that is an illustration of the character of the testimony in this case, which abundantly justifies the statement of Colonel Saxton that, after full and liberal investigation as regards the rights of this claimant, it was found that there was a serious and irreconcilable conflict in the testimony in the case. Acting, doubtless, upon the well-known legal rule that a claim like this need not be established beyond a reasonable doubt, but that a mere preponderance of evidence in favor of the claim ought to prevail, not merely gave this claimant the benefit of the doubt, but found, upon the preponderance of evidence, that some damage had been sustained, and recommended $3,000 as the proper amount of compensation, and that amount is allowed by the Quartermaster and by the Secretary of War. I beg the attention of the committee to the fact that it is proposed that this case shall be heard in the Court of Claims on this same testimony. The claimant would hardly desire a reinvestigation of the case and the taking of the testimony in chief and on cross-examination according to the rules of the court to which it is to be sent. Doubtless, also, many of the witnesses are dead, some of them beyond the reach of the Government, many of them probably beyond the reach of this claimant; so that to get this case to the Court of Claims it is necessary to override the ordinary practice in referring cases to that court, and to ask that this case shall be heard there upon this same testimony, with all its uncertainties, with all its doubts, with all its indistinctness, that was before the War Department and before the Committee on War Claims.

Now, I submit that that may be an exceedingly dangerous thing to the Government, or possibly it may be exceedingly dangerous to this claimant. It is a question of the thoroughness of the investigation. If our committee, or if this House, should, under the Bowman act, refer a case to the Court of Claims, that court will not consider the ex parte testimony that is to be found in the case; the court will not take up the case and base its decision upon an ex parte showing; but the case will be thoroughly prepared by the examination and cross-examination of witnesses in the way which has been found to be most effective in eliciting truth, in the interest of claimants as well as for the protection of the Government.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] yield for a question?

Mr. GEDDES. I do.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Was this property in charge of any person? Was there anybody in possession of it and caring for it at the time?

Mr. GEDDES. No, sir; I believe not—though I am not certain, and I desire to be very careful in any statement that I make here. My friend from California [Mr. GLASCOCK], representing the claimant, will not state, I think, that the property was in possession of any one. It had been abandoned.

Mr. GLASCOCK. We deny that it had been abandoned.

Mr. GEDDES. They deny that; but the property was not in actual use, I believe, during the winter of 1861–'62.

Mr. GLASCOCK. It was in actual use.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Is the franchise of any value?

Mr. GLASCOCK. Mr. Davis, the owner of the property, was not there at the time; he was somewhere in the northern part of the State, and all this transaction occurred in his absence. The franchise was still in Mr. Davis.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. My question was whether the franchise was of any value.

Mr. GLASCOCK. It was, as a matter of course. The testimony in the case shows that.

Mr. GEDDES. Let me say, as bearing upon the point raised by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR], that, judging from what I have learned in regard to this case, at a particular time the franchise was perhaps of value to the claimant, but after the wharf went into decay and was no longer used, other parties built a wharf adjacent to it and this became comparatively worthless. And the claimant gives that as an additional reason why he did not return to his property and guard it.

I believe that I have said all that I feel called upon to say in vindication of the action of the Committee on War Claims. It is not asserted that there is any newly discovered evidence in the case or that any evidence not within the reach of the party when this matter was investigated has since been found and can be produced.

I am not compelled, therefore, to say that it would not be such evidence even then as would warrant opening up the case, for I have not heard that there is any claim of that kind. I have supposed that it is sought to readjudicate this case in the Court of Claims substantially upon the testimony taken by Colonel Saxton and submitted to the War Department, and if we assent to a reference of the case to the Court of Claims, it must certainly be because we conclude it is safer that such a tribunal should pass upon this claim than that it should be finally determined by us or by the War Department, or by such other tribunals as have had connection with it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask whether the War Department has approved this claim.

Mr. GEDDES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GLASCOCK. The War Department has approved it to the extent of allowing $3,000 and interest.

Mr. GEDDES. Perhaps the earlier statements in this debate were not heard by the gentleman from New York; and I will say that this is a favorable report from the committee based upon the investigation of the War Department, and allowing the amount allowed by that Department.

Mr. GLASCOCK. But without the interest allowed by the Department.

Mr. GEDDES. Yes, sir; we allow no interest; that is never done here in any claim. Now, from the report of the committee, the gentlemen representing the interests of this claimant dissent, thinking that a larger amount should be allowed; and they now ask action on the substitute proposing to refer the case to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to ask a single question. In sending this case to the Court of Claims do you propose to send it there upon a different rule as to the measure of damage from that adopted by the War Department, or do you limit the Court of Claims to the amount found due by the War Department?

Mr. GLASCOCK. We propose that the court shall allow an amount corresponding with the injury actually done, if any.

Mr. HISCOCK. But a certain measure of damages was adopted in this case by the War Department in determining the amount which should be allowed.

Mr. GLASCOCK. We do not endeavor to put any limitation upon that court. Assuming it to be a competent tribunal, we simply say to the court——

Mr. GEDDES. I do not understand that the substitute proposes any new measure of damages. It simply refers the case to the Court of Claims that the amount of the damage may be ascertained.

Mr. HISCOCK. But there is a question in this case as to the measure of damages.

Mr. STORM. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEDDES. That is the sole question.

Mr. STORM. The War Department has adopted the rule that where lumber has been taken and used for fuel, the Department will not allow for it on the basis of lumber, but will only make compensation upon the basis of fuel. Of course this basis of estimation is admittedly incorrect and unjust. If the case were in the Court of Claims, I take it the court would not be bound by this practice of the Quartermaster's Department of only allowing for lumber as cordwood if it was consumed by the Army as fuel. If the case were in the Court of Claims, the court would have to do justice between the parties and allow the actual amount of damage.

Mr. HISCOCK. What would probably be the difference in the amount?

Mr. STORM. The gentleman can imagine what would be the difference between allowing for red cedar, as cord-wood at $4 a cord, and allowing the value as lumber sawed into planks.

Mr. HISCOCK. Has there been an investigation, so that this House can be apprised——

Mr. GEDDES. Oh, yes; but only in this way: it must be borne in mind that there is a serious conflict in the evidence, first, as to whether the Government did any damage——

Mr. GLASCOCK. That is admitted.

Mr. GEDDES. That is found by the report, based upon the preponderance of evidence, I admit. It does not appear in the testimony or in the report that the War Department made its estimate of damages on the theory suggested by my colleague on the committee [Mr. STORM]. Our understanding in the committee was that the Department adopted in this case the ordinary method of making their estimates for damages. I think that if gentlemen had an opportunity to examine the evidence in this case they would find that the War Department had no special rule upon which to make that estimate; that it made in this case a kind of liberal allowance based upon all the evidence in favor of a citizen against the Government, finding, first, that there was some damage, and then guessing as to the amount upon the basis of the proof, and saying, "We will give the claimant $3,000." That is all there is of it.

Mr. GLASCOCK rose.

Mr. SPRIGGS. What is the amount claimed?

Mr. GEDDES. The amount reported by the committee is $3,000, but I understand the gentleman representing it would take $20.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I know the gentleman from Ohio does not desire to misstate, and I therefore now ask to correct an error into which he has fallen. The wharf referred to by the gentleman from Ohio was not constructed, nor indeed the construction commenced, until after the work of demolition was begun on this wharf and it was entirely dismantled.

Mr. GEDDES. That is so.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I understood the gentleman to say, at that time they were taking in the lumber from the wharf and that there was not a wharf in good condition in San Diego.

Mr. GEDDES. I do not wish to be so understood.

Mr. GLASCOCK. The report of Colonel Saxton shows that the wharf at that time was in a good, serviceable condition.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be no question that something should be paid to the claimant in this case. In the first place, the Secretary of War recommends that he be paid the sum of $3,000 with interest from the 1st day of February, 1862. Now, if we follow the recommendation of the Secretary of War the sum to be allowed the claimant is about $7,000 instead of the amount reported. In the Forty-seventh Congress a unanimous report from the War Claims Committee recommended the allowance of $20,000, and that only as a partial measure of relief. For some reason or other the present War Claims Committee go back not only upon the former report, but also upon the recommendation of Mr. Lincoln, the Secretary of War, allowing the interest, and recommend that only $3,000 be allowed as full compensation for the destruction of a large warehouse and wharf at San Diego, Cal., which more than thirty citizens in the vicinity, testifying under oath, have estimated to have been worth $60,000 and upward at or near the time they were destroyed.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it not true that the expectation of the builders when they constructed this wharf was not realized and this wharf therefore was only valuable for the lumber that was in it?

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. Yet; it was valuable as a wharf.

Mr. HISCOCK. This city was laid out. There was no commerce there, no use for a wharf, and was only valuable for the lumber in it for fire-wood or to be transported somewhere else.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. Not so. The property may have depreciated somewhat from decay.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it not true that the wharf had gone into decay from non-use?

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. I do not undertake to represent that it may not have decayed to some extent, but the weight of the evidence makes it quite clear the property was worth much more than $3,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. It was not kept in repair because of the decay of the commerce of the town.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. Probably the property had decayed somewhat. It was not in perfect repair, but that it had become of no value, that it had been abandoned as a piece of worthless property, no one pretends.

Now, then, I wish to call the attention of the committee, in reply to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], to the finding made by the chief quartermaster, Colonel Saxton, detailed by the War Department to make the investigation under the act of March 3, 1881. He says that the testimony shows the property to have been worth from sixty to eighty thousand dollars when built and for some time thereafter, but that its value was less in 1861 and 1862 when destroyed. The difficulty with this case, like every other where the damages are unliquidated, is that no one can tell precisely how much ought to be allowed. It appears by an overwhelming weight of evidence that this property was at one time worth from sixty to eighty thousand dollars. Undoubtedly it was well worth the amount reported by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on War Claims in the Forty-seventh Congress [Mr. HOUK], namely, $20,000. Indeed, he may not have set the value of the property at the time of its destruction high enough. I can not tell. I do not believe any member of the House can tell.

Now the substitute proposed by my friend from California [Mr. GLASCOCK] is—what? To send the whole thing with the evidence, not the unsatisfactory evidence alluded to in the report made by Mr. Caldwell, of the Committee on War Claims in a former Congress, but the testimony since taken pursuant to the act of Congress passed March 3, 1881, already alluded to, whereby the War Department was authorized to take the testimony on both sides, to examine and cross-examine the witnesses, and under which Colonel Saxton acted. That testimony is of value now because it was taken in a quasi-judicial proceeding, and the record shows that some seventy-five or one hundred witnesses have given evidence bearing on this question. The findings of Colonel Saxton are all in favor of the claimant, that his title to the property was perfect, that he was a loyal citizen during the war.

But I wish to call the attention of the House, and particularly of my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], to a most singular finding of the Chief Quartermaster in reference to the rule of damages adopted by him in estimating the value of the property when destroyed. The Secretary of War and the present Committee on War Claims seem to have fallen into the same error:

As a result of the investigation—

Colonel Saxton says—

I am of the opinion that the value of the lumber taken for fuel did not exceed $3,000 as material.

Now I think that is a most remarkable principle to adopt in determining the value of a man's warehouse or similar property taken by the Government. He simply appraised its value for a particular purpose only, namely, as so much wood or fuel, and not its value as a wharf and warehouse. Let me illustrate: The coat that I have on, although it may not be very good or very valuable, costing possibly not more than $2 a yard, answers my purpose very well. Still, I do not want anybody to take eight inches square out of the back of it and then propose to settle the damages by paying me at the rate of $2 a yard for the size of the hole. [Laughter.] That would not satisfy me at all. The trouble is, it spoils the coat. I think, therefore, that the chairman of the Committee on War Claims failed to realize the absurd principle involved in the recommendation made by the War Department and adopted by his committee in this case. The quartermaster who made the investigation tells us that the warehouse and wharf, as such, are destroyed, but for the purpose of fuel the material of which they were made is worth only $3,000, and therefore he recommends the payment of that sum only.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Let me ask the gentleman if that wharf was standing there to-day reconstructed, as it then stood, whether it would be worth any more than the mere material of which it is built?

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. I do not know what it would be worth. I can not tell anything about it. That is exactly the trouble we all have in cases of this character. Therefore, my friend from California proposes by his substitute to send the matter to the Court of Claims for a final adjudication. We have six judges there whose business it is to investigate and decide upon just such a question as has arisen here. The Court of Claims can do this far more carefully and intelligently than Congress can. Look at this substitute bill for a moment. The Committee on War Claims fixes the amount of compensation for the damage done at $3,000. They ignore altogether the recommendation of the Secretary of War that interest should be allowed, which, if done, would just about double the amount.

I do not know what the claimant ought to have for the destruction of his property, but it is apparent to me he should receive something substantial, and by reason of the erroneous rule of damages recommended by Quartermaster Saxton and by the Committee on War Claims I am inclined to the opinion that the House ought to adopt the substitute as a more just and equitable measure than the committee's bill. The substitute provides that the claim shall be referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication. Jurisdiction is given to that court to ascertain the facts and render judgment for the actual value of the property which was destroyed, without interest. I recognize the doctrine that we can not pay interest ordinarily on these claims; but if we are to give this man only the fuel or firewood value of his buildings I think he should certainly have interest.

The substitute bill contains a provision that the court shall have the benefit of all the testimony taken under the act of March 3, 1881; that the same may be used by either party, together with such additional competent evidence as may be offered by either party, and further provides that the claimant shall begin suit within a year from the passage of the act. Now, sir, if the Court of Claims is to be of any value to Congress, it would seem to be in a matter of unliquidated damages, like the present case. How can any man justly say that Mr. Davis ought not to have more than $3,000? Perhaps he ought not to have even that sum; but from my examination of the case, from the fact that three committees of Congress have reported that something is due him, and from the further fact that the Secretary of War recommends the payment of $3,000 with interest from February 1, 1862, I assume that something is really and honestly due, and I would be much better satisfied to have the decision of a tribunal appointed to sit in judgment, between the citizen on the one hand and the Government on the other, and whose especial business it is to do equal and exact justice to both. It is almost impossible to investigate a claim of this character with that care and attention it ought to receive, and hence I hope the substitute will be adopted.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope this House will not forget how this bill comes here for our consideration. The Forty-seventh Congress by enactment provided a forum in which this claim should be tried. They provided that the Secretary of War should investigate the facts connected with the claim of Mr. Davis, and report them to Congress. He did investigate the facts by his quartermaster; evidence was taken in accordance with rules in judicial proceedings; witnesses were examined; a large body of testimony was taken, and a report made in accordance therewith. The War Claims Committee have made a report confirming the action of the Secretary of War, and have provided in this bill the payment to this claimant of the amount found due by the Secretary of War.

The real question is whether we shall provide a forum, have that forum, the court we provide, determine the facts, and then ignore that determination and seek another forum.

The facts in this case, out of which this claim grows, are these: In 1851 Mr. Davis built a wharf at San Diego, in California, at a cost of some $60,000 or $80,000. Eleven years thereafter United States troops occupied that town. Mr. Davis in the mean time had become financially in trouble. He was not then staying in San Diego. He had left a custodian in possession of that wharf, and that custodian, as I recollect, had afterward died, so that at the time of the occupancy of this town by troops there was nobody in custody. Now, the question determined by the quartermaster was whether or not the troops had destroyed a wharf worth $60,000 or $80,000, or whether they had simply taken for wood the lumber of that wharf, which had already been substantially destroyed. One of the questions at issue was whether or not the worms which destroy the piles of wharfing on the Pacific coast had entered the harbor of San Diego. If they had, then by all the testimony the piling in ten years' time would have been utterly destroyed, eaten off; so that the wharf would have ceased to be of any value except for the lumber that was in it. Some witnesses insisted that these worms had not entered that harbor, and that the timber out of which the piles were made was of that kind of cedar that the worms would not work in, and that, therefore, ten years after the construction of the wharf it was just as good as when constructed. Other witnesses, and large numbers of them, testified that these worms had entered the harbor, that the piles had been eaten off and numbers of them had dropped into the water, and a portion of the wharf had fallen away, so that at the time the troops occupied San Diego one portion of it had been entirely swept away, and the other portion was simply standing there, not strong enough to be safe for wagons to go out upon it.

This was the conflict of the testimony, and this claimant claims on the one hand that a good wharf worth $60,000 had been destroyed by the troops. The report of the Quartermaster-General finds upon the other hand that no such destruction had taken place. Now, while I am not satisfied with the method of ascertaining the value of the property taken by the quartermaster—that is to say, reducing lumber or planking to firewood—yet because the tribunal to which Congress referred this claim so determined, I am in favor of sustaining that determination. In my judgment, upon all the evidence I believe that this wharf had become substantially destroyed; that the life of a wharf in that harbor was not over ten years; that one portion of it previous to 1861 had been washed away by a wave of the sea; that another portion of it had been destroyed when a vessel approached the dock, and that it was no longer serviceable for a wharf except that as it was the only one there such vessels as entered San Diego had to make use of it. In my judgment, under this evidence all the Government could be responsible for would be the value of the material taken, because I do not think that taking the planking off the wharf and taking such piles as had been eaten away for fuel would have caused the destruction of any other portion of the wharf.

I am opposed to having an act passed by this Congress providing a forum, and then when we have the decision of that court passing another act providing another forum. That is giving a claimant before Congress larger rights than claimants get in private life.

And I think there ought to be an end to this claim. The Secretary of War having ascertained upon all this evidence that $3,000 ought to be paid, I think we ought to confirm that decision, thereby carrying out the act passed by the Forty-seventh Congress.

It is very hard to ascertain whether there was that amount of lumber taken. Some of the officers stationed at that point insist upon it that there was not any lumber taken. They insist upon it and show details that the wood used for that post was obtained on an island near by. They insist that the lumber taken from that wharf was taken by citizens, and not by soldiers; and one witness at least testifies that he, by consent of the custodian of the wharf, took a large amount of the planking away for his own purposes for building and making fences before the occupancy by the United States troops. The surgeon in charge testifies that by his order these planks were taken for use in the hospital for walling up wells, &c. It appears, therefore, from the testimony that some lumber was taken. The Secretary of War estimates the value at $3,000. The committee report a bill to pay the claimant $3,000; and, to make an end of this claim, I am in favor of carrying out the recommendation of the Secretary of War.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Does not the Secretary of War recommend the payment of interest from a certain date?

Mr. ROWELL. He does.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. GLASCOCK].

The question being taken, there were—ayes 35, noes 57.

So (further count not being called for) the substitute was not agreed to.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I offer an amendment which I send to the desk, and which I understand the committee will not oppose.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$3,000" and insert "$6,000;" so that it will read: "That the sum of $6,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN C. HERNDON.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have been requested to ask the committee to pass over informally a number of bills in order to take up House bill 2158, which was reached on last Friday. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2158) for the benefit of John C. Herndon.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to John C. Herndon, late of Mason County, now of Louisville, Ky., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,785, in full compensation for 105,000 pounds of hay furnished, under verbal contract, to Capt. D. W. McClung, assistant quartermaster, United States volunteers, for the use of the Government of the United States, in March, 1865, and which was swept away by a flood in the Ohio River and lost in consequence of the failure of the Government to remove said hay after due notice had been given to its authorized agents so to do.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. O'HARA. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. FERRELL) was read, as follows:

This is a claim for 105,000 pounds of hay sold to Capt. D. W. McClung, assistant quartermaster, United States volunteers, for the use of the United States Government, in March, 1865, at an agreed price of $1.70 per hundred, amounting to $1,785.

It was sold under a verbal contract, to be delivered on the banks of the Ohio River, at any point between Cincinnati, Ohio, and Maysville, Ky., and the same was delivered about March 3, accordingly, near Moscow, Ohio, on the banks of the river, in order for shipment, and the Government officers were duly notified thereof. Captain McClung gave written orders for boats to take it away on the part of the Government, but it was not done because no boats came except those which were already too full, and none others could be got by the officers of the Army.

When the river opened and the thaw begun the river was rising, and Mr. Herndon, fearing that it might rise so high as to reach the hay, proposed to Captain McClung that he would remove it from the banks, but was not permitted to do so, the captain saying that he had made arrangements for its removal with the captain of the boat, and that it would be removed at once: that by reason of this statement the hay was allowed to remain on the bank of the river where it had been placed in delivery. The captain of the boat failed to stop, and a rapid rise of the river occurred during the nights of March 14 and 15, 1865, and the hay was swept away and entirely lost. Mr. Herndon claimed the agreed price of the hay, to wit, $1,785.

The claim was duly presented to the proper department, fully investigated, and disallowed. The facts, as above stated, are proved beyond doubt, and appear conceded in official documents, and are proven to the satisfaction of the Government and the committee; and the disallowance of the claim was based on two grounds: First, that the hay not having been inspected by the Government, as was usual and according to an invariable rule, it could not be said to have been accepted and the title to have passed; second, that the purchase by the quartermaster in an emergency (in case of which it would be authorized by law) should have been filed with the accounts of the disbursement, and the order of the commanding officer directing the purchase, or a certified copy thereof, and also a statement of the particular facts and circumstances constituting the emergency; and it not appearing that any such order was made, or that the statement required was filed, or that any such emergency existed, the purchase and sale were null and void.

It is, however, said by Henry C. Hodges, assistant quartermaster United States Army, that there may be a case in equity. It seems to me that there was either a manifest error in this decision or that it is a case where the Government on every principle of justice should pay this claim.

It was the duty of the Government officers to have the hay inspected within a reasonable time after the delivery and notice of the same, and either to accept or reject it; that if this was not done it was the fault of the Government, and they would be bound by the purchase; that the purchasing officer being duly notified, and not having rejected it, and besides, having told the vendor not to remove it when he proposed to do it in anticipation of the threatened rise of the river, saying that he had made arrangements for its being taken by the boats that night, was an acceptance, and either passed the title, or the Government became responsible, and took the risk of its remaining, and must bear the loss.

As to the second objection, it appears that Captain McClung did propose to do what was required, but concluded not to do it, lest he should render himself personally liable. He was the proper purchasing officer. His papers were destroyed, and he did not furnish items. His failure to do his duty in rendering proper accounts, &c., can not operate to the prejudice of the vendor and throw the loss on him, for Mr. Herndon had no power to compel the officer to do his duty, and was not responsible for his failure to do subsequently what he was required to do. It were not a thing to be done before the hay was accepted and taken as essential to the completion and the sale. It does not appear that there were no proper orders, and if it must be assumed or presumed, that the assistant quartermaster was acting rightfully. But in any event the committee are of the opinion that the Government should pay for this hay as a matter of justice, if not that of law; and they accordingly recommend that the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. One important element in this case is the question of the delivery of this property, and I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. GEDDES] whether this property was delivered at the place where under the contract it was required to be delivered.

Mr. GEDDES. It was. There is no question about that. The only point made in regard to the delivery is that the hay had not been accepted by the officers of the Government. Although it was delivered at the point at which it was agreed to be delivered, and was there ready for inspection, the claim of the Department, when payment was demanded, was that the hay had not been inspected and therefore had not been technically delivered.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In that case the inspection, of course, was the duty of the officers of the Government, and if there was any fault in the matter it was the fault of the Government.

Mr. GEDDES. Yes. I ought to state further in that connection that this claimant did all he possibly could in the matter. He was there insisting that the hay should be removed; he was there guarding it even after it had reached its destination; and when he saw that there was to be a rise of the river, and that this property would be in danger, he insisted that he should be allowed to move it out of danger at his own expense; but the Government officer refused to allow him to do so, saying that a boat would be along and that the hay would be removed. The consequence was that the boat did not come until after the water had come; the water came first and took off the property.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then the fault was on the part of the Government?

Mr. GEDDES. Yes.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT TALLY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4685) for the relief of Robert Tally, colored.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Robert Tally, colored, of Memphis, Tenn., the sum of $325, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for two horses taken from him by the Army of the United States during the late war.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ELIZA E. HEBERT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 684) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza E. Hebert.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an adverse report from the Committee on War Claims upon this bill.

Mr. ELLIS. There is also a minority report, and if the matter were to be determined by numbers that would be the majority report, because in point of fact it has the support of the majority of the members who actually considered the case in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. STORM. I move that the bill reported by the minority be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of both reports.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] calls for the reading of both reports. The majority report will be read first.

The report (by Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin) was read, as follows:

This claim grows out of this alleged taking of property by the United States troops in Louisiana, under command of General Halbert E. Paine, in 1863. The amount now demanded is $21,090. The claim has been before each Congress since the Forty-third, and has generally been favorably reported, although there has been one or two adverse reports. It is now unnecessary to recite at length the facts and proofs as they may be found in the numerous printed reports. (See Senate report 527, Forty-third Congress; report No. 309, Forty-fourth Congress; report No. 216, Forty-fifth Congress; report No. 936, Forty-sixth Congress; report No. 1683, Forty-seventh Congress.

Your committee have examined the various reports and have carefully examined all of the testimony in the case. The claimant has supplemented her proofs from time to time by adding new affidavits to meet the objections which have arisen, and there is now a large amount of evidence bearing upon the alleged taking of the property and the loyalty of the claimant. If it were not for the features in the case alluded to further on in the report, your committee might feel bound to say that the preponderance of evidence is with the claimant on these issues. But in the view which we take it becomes unnecessary to decide whether the witnesses for the claimant or those for the Government are the more credible. The claimant is herself a witness in her own behalf, and on numerous occasions has given in writing her sworn statements as to the grounds of her claim.

In claims of this character your committee understand it to be their duty to scrutinize very carefully the statements of claimants made under oath, and that in cases where those statements are evidently fraudulent or probably incorrect, the entire claim should be regarded with great suspicion. The reasons for applying such a rule are obvious. The testimony is usually ex parte. No opportunity is given those passing upon the weight of the testimony to see the witnesses or to cross-examine them. Again these claims are often ancient before they make their appearance in public. In this instance the claimant rested about ten years before she made it known to the authorities that she claimed the Government was indebted to her in the sum of many thousands of dollars. After such a lapse of time it is necessarily very difficult for the Government to obtain proofs, and it is no injustice to hold such dilatory claimants to the rule of stating, at least with reasonable accuracy, the facts constituting their claims.

Your committee now call attention to the two accounts which claimant has filed, as showing the items of her claim. The first was filed before the Southern Claims Commission January 24, 1873, and was as follows:

8,000 barrels corn, at $1.50	$12,000
500 cords wood, at $6	3,000
100 chickens, at $1	100
200 turkeys, $2	400
30 hogs, $10	300
5 milch cows, $100	500
8 oxen, $50	400
5 horses, $160	800
4 mules, $125	500
Unknown quantity of lumber, consisting of hogsheads, staves, pickets, and posts, estimated	5,000
Total	23,000

The other was the claim subsequently filed before Congress, and is as follows:

8,000 barrels corn, at $2.50	$20,000
1,500 cords wood, at $4.46⅔	7,000
1 lot lumber, consisting of staves, headings, pickets, &c.	10,000
1 pair carriage horses	1,000
3 riding horses	900
4 mules, at $300	1,200
30 hogs, at $30	900
5 choice milch cows	375
20 head beeves	500
1 lot poultry	100
Fencing on plantation	6,000
	47,975

We do not overlook the fact that it is now argued that, in making the first claim, Mrs. Hebert was only seeking one-half of the property taken, on the theory that the other half belonged to her husband, and that before making the second statement she had obtained an assignment from her husband, from whom she had been divorced.

If it should be conceded that the assignment from Jules Hebert to the claimant was made at the time she now alleges, and that she has never made any misstatements or fraudulent concealment respecting it (a matter about which there have been differences of opinion in former committees), still the fact remains that the two statements are so utterly unlike that they can not possibly be reconciled to each other.

The corn is alleged to be worth $1.50 per barrel in the first statement and $2.50 in the second. In the first, 500 cords of wood are charged for, and alleged to be worth $6 per cord; in the second statement we are told there were 1,500 cords of wood, worth $4.66⅔ per cord. In the second statement is a charge for fencing of $6,000, which seems to have been forgotten in the first. It is unnecessary to call attention in greater detail to the remarkable discrepancies which appear throughout the accounts. The discrepancies are too glaring to be explained by the mere statements that claimant had forgotten, or that she was unaccustomed to business transactions.

It is, perhaps, not necessary to place our judgment against the validity of the claim upon the ground that the claimant has made fraudulent statements, within the meaning of that statute which forbids the payment of any claim wherein the claimant has knowingly made a false statement thereof. It is enough to say that we find those statements upon which the whole claim rests so utterly unreliable that we can not make them the basis of a favorable decision.

But there is another objection to the allowance of this demand to claimant, which seems to your committee insuperable. The legal title to the land and to the personal property was in Jules Hebert, and not in the claimant. It appears from the evidence that she had no separate estate. Your committee can not adopt the theory of Mrs. Hebert that one-half of the property in question belonged to her as the wife of Jules Hebert.

It appears, from recitals in claimant's brief, that judgment of divorce was entered November 10, 1871, between the said parties, but that no alimony was given, and the judgment did not decree any division of the estate or property of Jules Hebert, but this subject was left open for the future determination of the court.

Your committee are of the opinion that the claimant had no authority or right to prosecute this claim, except such as might have been conferred by the assignment made in 1874 by Jules Hebert to herself. But assignments of this character are clearly and expressly made null and void by section 3477 of the Revised Statutes. We are asked to hold that this statute only applies to assignments made to claim agents. But that would be ingrafting an exception upon the statute which is not mentioned therein. It is to be presumed, so long as this section remains upon the statute-books, that there is good reason for its existence, and your committee have no inclination to treat the statute as of no effect.

The committee, therefore, report adversely and recommend that the petition do lie on the table.

The Clerk also read the minority report, as follows:

Mr. TULLY, from the Committee on War Claims, submitted the following as the views of the minority:

The adverse report of this committee upon this claim is based not upon the demerits of the claim, but on the following grounds:

First. That the statements, made by the claimant in her petition, presented to the Southern Claims Commission, and the statement of the account presented to Congress are irreconcilable and so conflicting that they can not be made the basis of a favorable decision.

Second. That the legal title to the land and the personal property was in Jules J. Hebert, her husband, and not in the claimant, and that she had no separate estate, and the committee refuse to adopt the theory that one-half of the personal property belonged to her as the wife of Jules J. Hebert.

As to the first objection, we can not adopt the views of the committee as expressed in the adverse report.

We do not think that the discrepancies in the two accounts, namely, the one presented to the Southern Claims Commission and the one presented to Congress after she had procured the assignment from her husband, are such as to convict this claimant of an intention to commit or perpetrate a fraud upon the Government, and therefore to discredit her. On the contrary, we think that they are such as might have occurred, under the circumstances of this case, with persons far more conversant with the business affairs of life than this claimant can be supposed to have been.

But it is not necessary to rely upon the statement of the claimant in this case. The taking of the property and its use by the Army are conclusively proved by the officers in command of troops, who ordered the seizure, and the quantity, kind, and value are all satisfactorily proven by parties who had personal knowledge of the same.

The loyalty of the claimant and her husband is also proven beyond controversy, and we are clearly of opinion that upon the merits of the case the claimant ought to be paid for the property which the Government has had the benefit of.

As to the second ground of objection named in the adverse report, we have to say that we do not think this case comes within the spirit of section 3477 of the Revised Statutes. That act was evidently passed to prevent persons who were well advised as to the status of a claim from taking advantage of the ignorance of the claimant and purchasing it for much less than the real value, as known to the would-be purchaser, and this is not only our view, but it has been so held by Congress in several instances; in fact, this same question has been passed upon in this case at six different times by different committees in the House and Senate, and the bill passed the House once after a full discussion of this question.

Again, in the case of the claim of Dodd, Brown & Co., assignees, reported by Mr. HOAR, of the Committee on Claims in the Senate, in the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, report No. 714, the question was directly made, and the assignment was allowed, and the claim paid to the assignees, amounting to some $40,000. But it is not necessary to get rid of this statute to establish the right of this claimant to prosecute this claim before Congress or elsewhere; and to show that we are right and that the grounds taken in the adverse report are wrong upon this question, we quote substantially from the laws of Louisiana bearing directly upon this question, as follows:

"Every marriage contracted in the State of Louisiana superinduces a right of partnership, or community of acquets or gains, if there be no stipulation to the contrary. (See Voorhies, Rev. Civil Code, page 440, art. 2399.)

"This partnership or community consists of the profits of all the effects of which the husband has the administration and enjoyment, either of right or in fact, of the produce of the reciprocal industry and labor of both husband and wife, and of the estates which they acquire during the marriage, either by donation made jointly to them both or by purchase, or in any other similar way, even though the purchase be only in the name of one of the two, and not of both." (See Voorhies, Rev. Civil Code, page 441, art. 2402.)

Again:

"The effects which compose the partnership or community of gains are divided into two equal portions between the husband and the wife, or between their heirs, at the dissolution of the marriage; and it is the same with respect to profits arising from the effects which both husband and wife brought reciprocally in marriage, and which are administered by the husband or by husband and wife conjointly, although what has been brought in marriage by either the husband or the wife be more considerable than what has been brought by the other, or even although one of the two did not bring anything at all." (See same authority as above, page 442, art. 2406.)

And further:

"The fruits hanging by the roots on the land belonging separately to either the husband or the wife at the time of the dissolution of the marriage are equally divided between the husband and the wife or their heirs; it 'is the same with respect to the young of cattle yet in gestation.'" (See same authority, article 2407, same page as above.)

Again:

"The woman separated from bed and board, or absolutely divorced, has no need in any case of the authorization of her husband, as this separation or dissolution of the marriage carries with it not only a separation of property, but a disolution of acquets and gains." (See same code, page 65, article 123, and page 72, article 159.

Under these laws it is difficult to see how it can properly be said that the claimant had no authority or right to prosecute this claim except such as might have been conferred by the assignment made in 1874, and that that assignment was void.

It seems to us that she clearly had the absolute right to half of this property when she presented her petition to the Southern Claims Commission in 1873, by the laws of her State, and that she subsequently acquired the right to the other half by the assignment from her husband, from whom she was divorced in 1871, and had the clerk of the Southern Claims Commission understood the laws of the State of Louisiana on this subject he would not have sent her away to procure an assignment from her husband, telling her that she had no right to prosecute the claim without it, even for one-half.

Under his direction, however, she returned home, and not until a year had elapsed did she succeed in procuring the assignment, and then the time for filing claims before the Southern Claims Commission had expired, and she came to Congress, and, of course, asked for the whole amount of the claim.

Since that time there has been no less than six favorable reports from committees of both Houses of Congress upon this claim, varying in amounts from $21,090 to $31,700.

It seems to us, from the evidence before us, that there can be no question about the merits of this claim or the loyalty of the claimant, the only question being as to the amount, and that asked for in the bill is the least amount for which the case was ever reported by the several committees that have personally examined the claim, to wit, the sum of $21,090, and that sum we think she ought to be paid.

P. B. TULLY.
L. H. WELLER.
WM. P. KELLOGG.

From facts and information acquired since the majority report was made, I agree to the above report.

JNO. B. STORM.

I concur in the above.

WM. F. ROGERS.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Speaker, I feel no personal interest in this case, and am conscious of no feeling whatever growing out of my connection with the minority report. The claimant is to me an entire stranger. In the first consideration of this case I agreed with the majority of the committee in the report that was first read, but after that report was printed I discovered that we had made a mistake, and subsequently I was led to join the minority of the committee in making the report last read.

There was not much difference in the committee, I think, as to the fact that the Government took the property as claimed in this case; but there was a question about the legal capacity of the claimant, Mrs. Hebert, to prosecute this claim, in view of her disability under the married woman's law of the State of Louisiana. But learning subsequently that we were clearly mistaken with regard to the law of that State upon this subject, a number of us reconsidered our assent to the majority report and joined in making the minority report.

Permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, that although this is styled the report of the minority, yet it has the support of a majority of the members who considered the case. There were nine members of the committee present during the consideration, and five of them have now signed the minority report.

Mr. Chairman, the report of the majority is based largely upon the fact that there is a discrepancy between the statement made by this claimant when her claim was originally presented to the Southern Claims Commission and her claim as she subsequently made it to Congress. This discrepancy is relied upon as evidence of fraud; and the majority of the committee say it ought to work the defeat of the entire claim. But when we consider the unfortunate condition of the claimant in this case, living at the time the property was taken far away from the place where it was taken—living in the city of Saint Louis while this property was taken from a plantation in a parish in Louisiana—and when we consider also that these claims are usually made through the assistance of attorneys or claim agents, it would certainly seem to be unjust to scrutinize the claim presented by this woman under the circumstances of this case by the same rules which we would apply to cases where the parties were in a situation to know all the circumstances surrounding their claim and had the means of obtaining all the information necessary upon which to base a full and complete claim.

This lady when she made her claim before the Southern Claims Commission did not know the whole amount of the property which had been taken by the Government; and afterward, when she made her claim to Congress, this subsequent claim embraced property which had been omitted in the former claim, because the fact that such property was taken had not come to her knowledge when the first claim was presented.

It is a rule of law that a plaintiff may recover a smaller sum than that claimed in his declaration, but not a larger sum; and we do not propose now to pay this claim to the extent of the amount set forth in the second claim. Indeed the amount which the minority of the committee have recommended to be paid—and the amount proposed to be paid by the bill which the minority ask the House to adopt—is smaller than the amount named by this lady either in her claim before the Southern Claims Commission or her claim as presented to Congress. It is less by several thousand dollars than the smaller claim, and much less than one-half of the larger claim. I am sure no gentleman of this House will say that if this claimant did lose property to the amount of $21,900 she ought to be deprived of all compensation because she at one time filed a statement claiming a much larger sum.

The Government of the United States, having taken this property and rendered no vouchers for it, having taken it when the claimant was a thousand miles away from the place where the property was taken, ought not now to say that because the claimant is obliged to rely upon the testimony of some colored people who lived upon the plantation and such Army officers as may recollect the transactions and give their statements or affidavits in support of the claim therefore this testimony ought to be regarded with great suspicion. Colonel Allcot, who was present, testifies to the taking of the property, says that some 4,000 Government troops were in the immediate neighborhood of this plantation, and states that it was his intention to issue the proper vouchers for the property taken, but owing to a sudden order for the troops to move from that neighborhood there was not time to make out the vouchers.

This claimant, now some twenty or twenty-three years after the occurrence of the facts, presents the best testimony she can, and all that she can. Some twenty or twenty-five witnesses have testified to their recollection of the quantity of property—the corn, the wood, the poultry, the fencing, &c., that were taken and used by the Army. I take it that it ought to be considered conclusive of the fact that the Government did take her property and use it to the extent of $21,900; and indeed I understand the majority goes to that length. It states:

Your committee have examined the various reports and have carefully examined all of the testimony in the case. The claimant has supplemented her proofs from time to time by adding new affidavits to meet the objections which have arisen, and there is now a large amount of evidence bearing upon the alleged taking of the property and the loyalty of the claimant.

And further on in the report it is stated that—

If it were not for the features alluded to further on in the report your committee might feel bound to say that the preponderance of evidence is with the claimant on these issues.

I may say there is no evidence here against this claim. There is not a counter-statement or affidavit anywhere in the case contradicting this testimony. It is only that general way of carping over it, of picking at it, because the statements are more or less indefinite—not specific, gathered some time after the property was taken, and not satisfactory; that it is ex parte, and so on. I believe the evidence which comes into this House to support claims, as a rule, is ex parte, and, of necessity, must be such.

Then what is the ground by which the majority of the committee seek to avoid paying this claim for the amount of property they admit in their report was really taken?

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the gentleman answers the question which he now asks, I would like to inquire of him whether or not this claim was presented to the Southern Claims Commission, and, if so, what explanation is given of that matter, if any.

Mr. STORM. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that this claim was presented to the Southern Claims Commission. It is in the testimony that the clerk of the Southern Claims Commission stated that the claimant, Mrs. Hebert, being at that time a married woman, had no standing in that court and could not make the claim herself; that she must go and get an assignment of the interest or right of her husband before she could have any standing in that court. She testifies that she proceeded to do so, but before she was able to get that assignment from her husband that commission itself expired by limitation of time and was no longer in existence as a tribunal before which she could present her claim. But I will discuss that subject further on, because the question involves further discussion under the second head of this case.

I think at the time when Mrs. Hebert presented this claim to the Southern Claims Commission her husband was living. Whether she was at that time divorced from him or not by decree of the court of Louisiana I am not sure. I believe the decree of divorce had been issued from the court in Louisiana, but that no decree of alimony had been made in the case. Believing the clerk of the Court of Claims was properly advising her, she went to get that which I will argue it was not necessary at all for her to have. For we claim under the law of Louisiana such authorization or assignment from the husband was unnecessary. In fact, as I understand the report of the majority, they say they are of the opinion that the claimant had no authority or right to prosecute this claim, except on the ground of the assignment in 1874 by Jules J. Hebert to herself. He was her husband.

It is upon that mistaken assumption of the law that the majority of the committee have reached the conclusion they have. I desire now to call the attention of the committee to what the law of Louisiana is on that subject. It was read by the Clerk, but I desire again to call the attention of the committee to it, because upon the proper understanding of that law you will have to decide the case. The law of Louisiana differs from the laws of many States, and especially from the laws of my own State, where the right of a married woman to acquire an estate in the joint earnings of husband and wife during coverture is very limited. Indeed, married women are not permitted under the laws of Pennsylvania to have any estate in their earnings; but that is not the law in Louisiana:

Every marriage contracted in the State of Louisiana superinduces a right of partnership, or community of acquets or gains, if there be no stipulation to the contrary. (See Voorhies, Rev. Civil Code, page 440, art. 2399.)

This partnership or community consists of the profits of all the effects of which the husband has the administration and enjoyment, either of right or in fact, of the produce of the reciprocal industry and labor of both husband and wife and of the estates which they acquire during the marriage, either by donation made jointly to them both or by purchase, or in any other similar way, even though the purchase be only in the name of one of the two and not of both. (See Voorhies, Rev. Civil Code, page 441, art. 2402.)

Again:

The woman separated from bed and board, or absolutely divorced, has no need in any case of the authorization of her husband, as this separation or dissolution of the marriage carries with it not only a separation of property, but a dissolution of acquets and gains. (See same Code, page 65, art. 123, and page 72, art. 159.)

So in this case there was no necessity for the authorization; there was no necessity for the assignment to her, because the divorce ipso facto restored her to all the rights of what I would call in my State a feme sole trader.

That being the case, and discovering with many others that I was mistaken as to the laws of Louisiana governing the right of the claimant in this case, we have done what we could to prevent any wrong to this claimant by submitting a minority report, putting ourselves right not only upon the facts, but the law applicable to those facts.

Since then the husband of this claimant has died, and all possible claims against the estate, as I am informed by gentlemen learned in the law in that State who sit on either side of me, would be barred. There can be no one to question the right of this claimant in this case not only to have a standing in court, were such a tribunal in existence before which she could appear to assert her right to one-half of the property, but she has the right to claim the whole because of the good and valid assignment of her husband either before or subsequent to the divorce, and by virtue of the laws of the State of Louisiana, by which she acquires a good title to all of the property claimed in the bill. So that she has a complete legal right in the case, and no one, except it be the creditors of the estate of the husband—who do not appear, and who have no standing here as I understand it, for they would be barred by the statute of limitation—would have any right as against her in the premises. She is here the sole claimant and owner of this claim and is the only person entitled to full compensation for the property taken or destroyed.

As far as the loyalty of this claimant is concerned it is fully proved by competent testimony and will not be questioned in the debate, whatever else may be said about her. And I submit that after some twenty-two years' waiting, having all the personal property on a large plantation utterly destroyed and she reduced to want and penury—when she has been before this Congress these many years seeking a hearing and redress, it is our duty to listen patiently to her appeal and give full consideration to the facts presented. She has had already two favorable reports from the Claims Committee of the Senate. She has had two favorable reports from committees of this House as against one adverse report—I think in one case made by General Bragg, of Wisconsin; but five times out of six the reports have been favorable to the allowance of this claim, and this bill once passed the House.

Mr. ELLIS. Twice.

Mr. STORM. Yes, I recollect, twice passed the House; and I do think, therefore, that there ought to be an end to this contest and delay, and that this woman who has been dancing attendance in the halls of this House for twenty years ought now to receive a just compensation, which I assert here is equitably due her. I hope the relief will be granted.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, it is only fair to the Government of the United States that there should be some short presentation of the other side of this case. In the Committee on War Claims this case was referred to me as a subcommittee. I gave it as careful and as attentive consideration as I could, and it seems to me, after a full investigation, that there are various grounds on which it ought not to be allowed.

I call the attention of the committee in the first place to the fact that ten years slipped away before the claimant found out that she had any claim whatever, of either $20,000 or $40,000, against the Government, and before it was presented to any court or to any Congress, in fact before it was heard of in any shape. Where her husband was I know not. It is only fair to presume that if he had a claim of $20,000 or $47,000 against the Government he would have presented his claim at an earlier period. But finally in 1873 the claim was first heard of. It was then presented to the Southern Claims Commission. Not succeeding in that court, the claimant comes to this last resort of claimants, the Congress of the United States, and presents her claim here, and we are called on to examine the testimony and pass judgment upon it. Ten years had passed away. The Government had had no opportunity to gather testimony to defend against this claim. Under such circumstances it is only fair to the Government of the United States that we should look with careful scrutiny upon the ex parte evidence thus produced.

It seemed only fair that the plaintiff should have presented a statement of the facts on which she bases her claim such as would bear upon its face at least a semblance of accuracy and truthfulness. But instead of that the claimant has presented statements of so remarkable a character that I wish to call them to your attention. I may say, briefly, that the testimony she presents is highly contradictory. There are witnesses swearing that this claimant lost a considerable amount of property. But General Halbert E. Paine, then in command of the troops at that point, and who ought to know something of the merits of the claim, has a statement in the papers on file in the case in which he says that it was his custom to give vouchers for all goods and supplies used for the troops at that time. He states that he has no recollection whatever of any such dealings as are claimed in this particular case. The claimant in this case, instead of being a thousand miles away, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM], testifies herself to having several times had communication with General Paine. She claims that he knew the facts concerning the amount of the claim and the character of the property taken. He says that he did not.

He says that there were ample supplies for his troops and that there was not any reason why this large amount of property should have been taken under these circumstances. And not only that, but the Government of the United States appointed a special agent to go and examine into the facts and merits of the claim. That special agent went down there and examined witnesses, looked carefully over the ground, and gave as his opinion that the whole plantation, if in cultivation, could not have produced or supported the amount of property the claimant said had been taken. He states further that in the year in question only a very small portion of the plantation was in cultivation. His statement is to the effect that the cribs on the plantation would not have contained half the corn claimed to have been taken. In fact, I should infer from his statement that her claim is one tissue of exaggeration, if not of absolute falsehood. I should infer from it that she charges as much for fencing, for example, as the whole plantation was worth.

Now we come to the testimony of the claimant herself in support of her claim. She has made two or three sworn statements. She came first to the Southern Claims Commission and made her statement, stating her claim in the first instance against the Government at $23,000. Years afterward she makes another sworn statement before Congress. She doubtless then assumed that the old statement was forgotten. I say she assumed that, for she must have known that the two statements could not have looked each other in the face. That each would have straightway stared the other out of countenance. There are the most glaring misstatements, discrepancies, and differences between them; such discrepancies as can not possibly be reconciled.

In the first statement, for example, she swears that she lost five hundred cords of wood, and puts a price upon it; in the second statement these five hundred cords of wood had grown to 1,500. Both statements were sworn to by the claimant. Which will you accept?

In the one statement she charges for poultry to the amount of $500; in the other statement she had forgotten her long-lost chickens and turkeys or the most of them; at least she charges only $100. In one statement she charges for eight oxen; in the next statement those eight oxen had propagated their kind with such success that they had become twenty beeves. [Laughter.] In one statement she charges lumber to the amount of $5,000 against the Government; in the other she thinks the Government can afford to double the amount, and she swears that it was worth $10,000. Then we come to another item, a trifling item, a mere bagatelle, which she had forgotten entirely in the first statement—only $6,000 for fencing. In one statement she omits this; in the other she claims it.

When our committee came to look over those statements and pass upon them they seemed to us such statements as no jury in Christendom ought to be asked to accept. It seemed to us that those statements must be reckless, and, to put it mildly, utterly unreliable, and we had to disregard them. The specious pretext is now made that in the first claim she was simply demanding the value of one-half of the property taken, and that before the second claim an assignment had been made. These two statements quarrel too bitterly to be reconciled by any such theory. In the one the claim for lumber is three times what it is in the other; not one-half. The claim for mules, in one statement, is $1,200; in the other, $500; not one-half. In the one statement hogs are worth $30 each; in the other, $10; ten is not one-half of thirty. In the one statement she charges for twenty beeves and in the other for eight oxen. There is no arithmetic or process of logic which can make eight oxen the half of twenty beeves or $100 worth of poultry the half of $600. The two statements are utterly inconsistent. They can not be reconciled with each other.

We do not need therefore to discuss the law of the State of Louisiana. I say, with all deference however, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] is mistaken as to that law. I do not profess to be learned in the civil law of Louisiana, but my impression is that the civil law of Louisiana does not give to a wife on her marriage one-half of all her husband's estate.

Mr. HUNT rose.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I will tell you what I think it does do. I think it gives the wife one-half of the gains, one-half of the accumulations subsequent to marriage. The gentleman from Louisiana takes his seat. I think he will not dissent from that proposition. He concedes that I am right in that view. Now, search this evidence and you will find no evidence whatever which shows that this property was accumulated after the marriage of these parties.

Mr. HUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him there? He is not exactly right. The law of Louisiana presupposes a partnership in the absence of a contract between husband and wife, which they call a community of acquets and gains.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Do you claim that on a marriage the real estate belonging to the husband at once becomes in half the property of the wife?

Mr. HUNT. No, sir; nobody ever claimed that.

Mr. ELLIS. But the presumption is that in the absence of a contract this community exists.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. As to property subsequently acquired?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes; and this property was acquired long after the marriage.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. As to that you are mistaken.

Mr. ELLIS. I am not mistaken.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. If I remember rightly this property belonged to Hebert before the marriage.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman from Wisconsin claims these rights apply only to acquisitions subsequent to the marriage. How does he explain this in the code?

The effects which compose the partnership or community of gains are divided into two equal portions between the husband and the wife, or between their heirs, at the dissolution of the marriage; and it is the same with respect to profits arising from the effects which both husband and wife brought reciprocally in marriage—and which are administered by the husband, or by husband and wife conjointly, although what has been brought in marriage by either the husband or the wife be more considerable than what has been brought by the other, or even although one of the two did not bring anything at all.

That must refer to property acquired before they were married.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I have before me Kent's Commentaries, and I think it will bear out my statement. I have not time to stop to discuss this question at length. I do not regard it as a material question in this case. And the gentlemen from Louisiana do not seem to materially differ from me on this subject.

I leave these two statements of the claimant to any man who will weigh evidence, and let him say if he could with any degree of certainty find what property was taken by this Government from this woman. The statements are so utterly contradictory, it is so impossible to reconcile them, that it is useless to quibble about the laws of Louisiana on that subject. I discredit these statements, or, to be more accurate, they discredit themselves.

Mr. HUNT. The gentleman will not question that property which is the separate property of one of the spouses may post marriage produce fruits, which fruits by virtue of contract will form part of the community of acquets and gains?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I do not dispute that. I think the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] and myself more nearly agree than I do with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM]. I think the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] is right in his view of the law of his State. My claim is that the evidence shows this property not to have been the accumulations made after marriage, but the separate property of Jules Hebert. This farm belonged to him before marriage. What right had the wife to compensation for this fencing, for instance?

Now, let me refer for a moment to this assignment. The gentlemen who are advocating this claim assert that a plain statute of our Government ought to be disregarded. They argue in their report that when our statute prescribes that certain assignments are null and void, Congress should exercise its discretion and treat them as valid. If these assignments are invalid under the statute of the United States, then this Congress has no right to disregard the law. If we disregard it in this case we will be asked to ignore it in others. We should repeal it or respect it.

I have tried, Mr. Chairman, to be brief in presenting the objections to this claim. I will say also that neither in my report nor in my remarks have I been severe upon this claimant. There has been another report filed previously in another Congress which was far more severe in its strictures upon these two remarkable statements which have been made by this claimant.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 5639) extending the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in Wyoming Territory.

Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 2470) providing for the establishment of a port of entry at Mount Desert ferry, in the town of Hancock, in the State of Maine; and

A bill (S. 2436) to authorize the President to appoint commissioners to the Belgium international exhibition at Antwerp, and for other purposes.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 12) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill (H. R. 7874) making additional appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and further, that it had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BECK as conferees on the part of the Senate.

MRS. ELIZA E. HEBERT.

The Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar resumed its session.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, for twelve years, in summer's heat and winter's snows, this claimant has knocked at the doors of Congress, the great ultimate court for everybody who has a claim against this Government, for justice. This claim was presented to the Forty-third Congress, was reported favorably, and passed this House almost unanimously.

A MEMBER. Under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. ELLIS. It was reported in the Forty-fourth Congress by the present distinguished Senator from Michigan, then a member of this House [Mr. CONGER], and we all know that if there was any one who was prejudiced against claims of this class it was he. It was easier, of course, for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a claim to pass favorably the rigid inspection of OMAR D. CONGER; yet he reported this claim favorably and was active in favor of its passage in the Forty-fourth Congress.

In the Forty-fifth Congress it was again reported favorably, but it died, as so many of our bills die, on the Calendar. In the Forty-sixth Congress it was again reported favorably, and finally it fell into the hands of a member from Wisconsin, General Bragg, and was by him reported to the House in a characteristic way—adversely. Passed twice by the House, five times favorably reported by committees of this House, twice passed in the Senate, it comes to us with the indorsement of committees and of Congresses. I take it, Mr. Chairman, that all we want to do is justice.

Let us see, then, in the first place, if this lady is the proper claimant. This House will require that it be proven and shown, first, that she is the proper claimant. In the second place, the House will demand that it be shown that she and her husband were loyal to the Government of the United States. In the third place, it will be demanded that it shall appear that this property was taken for the use of the troops of the United States. If these three propositions be maintained, then there is not a man in this House who will vote againt this claim.

The first question is, Is this the proper claimant? My friend from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT], long a learned professor in our law institution there, has correctly stated the law. The law of Louisiana presupposes, from the very act of marriage, in the absence of contract, a community of acquets and gains. It is established by virtue of the marriage. The husband may bring in separate property; it remains his separate property. The wife may bring in separate property; it remains her separate property. But whatever is acquired after the marriage by the common economy, the effort of both, enters into the community of acquets and gains, in which the wife is entitled to share equally with the husband.

A MEMBER. The testimony utterly fails to show that this property was acquired subsequent to their marriage.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, it was not real property that was taken; it was personal property; it was poultry, animals, stock, cords of wood—property of the kind that is accumulated in a year or in two years or sometimes in a month. It was not real property, it was personal property that was taken, and the burden is upon the Government to show that it was the separate property of the husband; for the presumption of the Louisiana law is that it was acquired after marriage and belonged to the community of acquets.

Now, what about the assignment? Sir, the provision of the code is textual, that the husband may give his wife anything that he could give to a stranger. The exception is that he can not give her anything in fraud of creditors. He may assign to her during the marriage not in fraud of creditors; but if he is out of debt and there is no fraud upon any creditor, then the husband may give to the wife whatever he could give to anybody else. So in that view of the case the assignment is legal.

But the truth is that the community was dissolved prior to the presentation of this claim by divorce in 1871; and whenever the community of acquets and gains is dissolved, whether by death, marriage, or divorce, that moment the rights of the parties are fixed and at that very moment the wife becomes entitled to one-half of the property. So that, whether you take it in view of the assignment, or whether you take it in view of the divorce, or whether you take it in view of the recent demise of the late husband, the rights of this claimant have become fixed, and she is entitled to one-half the claim. But the committee have guarded the bill so as to require her to produce the receipt of the late husband or of his legal representatives, and to take the amount in full and final payment of the entire claim. She is the guardian of their children, some of whom are minors. She is the guardian of the children, and as such is constituted, by the law of Louisiana, the administratrix of the estate. So that in every view of this case she is the proper party in court.

But the gentleman says that there was an assignment in fraud or in violation of law. Why, Mr. Chairman, the provision of the United States statute which prohibits the assignment of claims is made for this purpose only, to prevent parties who are well informed as to the value of claims from taking advantage of the ignorance of the parties in interest and buying up valuable claims for a mere song. That is the intendment of the statute.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have succeeded in showing the House beyond peradventure of a doubt that the proper party is in court, and that there has been no violation of any statute of the United States in the assignment in this case. Why, sir, what led to that assignment? Coming here a woman, ignorant of the law, she went to the Commissioners of Southern Claims and was informed that she was not the proper party to present the claim. Ignorant of the law at her home, ignorant of the law here, she took the word of the clerk, who was himself an ignoramus in the civil law, in the common law, and in the law of justice, and she went off to obey what she thought was the ex ca- thedra judgment of the commissioners of Southern claims to get the assignment, and her husband gave it. Therefore she is the proper party in court.

In the second place, was she loyal to the Government of the United States? Why, Mr. Speaker, there can be no question of that fact. She and her husband remained loyal to the United States throughout all that long and dismal period of the civil war. Her home and her outbuildings were the hospitals and the home of Union soldiers; she herself was the nurse of Union soldiers. Her house was the headquarters of Federal officers. General Banks testifies to this; General Halbert E. Paine testifies to it; Captain Allcot testifies to it; Governor Wiltz testifies to it; Mr. KELLOGG, now a member of this House, who was then down in Louisiana, has testified to it. Ay, out of the lips of a hundred witnesses her loyalty and the loyalty of her husband to the Government of the United States have been perfectly established. I take it, then, that my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES] will not controvert the second point in the controversy.

This lady, then, is the proper party in court, and she was loyal to the Government of the United States. It remains but to see whether this property was taken. Here is the testimony. My friend from Wisconsin certainly has not read General Paine's testimony recently. He says General Paine does not know anything about this matter. Now let us see whether he does or not. General Paine, now a well-known lawyer of this city, was in command of the troops who were encamped upon the plantation of the claimant. Of course the general in command of the troops was not supposed to know minutely or particularly what was or what was not impressed for the service of the troops; but here is his own statement:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA:

Halbert E. Paine, having been duly sworn, on his said oath deposes and says, that on the 7th day of February, 1863, the Second Brigade, Third Division, Nineteenth Army Corps, arrived at Indian Village, on Bayou Plaquemine, in the State of Louisiana, under his command, and remained there until the 22d of the same month; that on the 8th of that month he detailed Captain Craig—

The gentleman from Wisconsin says there were plenty of provisions there, plenty of supplies; that there was no need of impressing anything. Here is what the general in command says, and there is a difference between his statement and that of my friend from Wisconsin on this point—

On the 8th of that month he detailed Captain Craig, of the Fourth Wisconsin Regiment, and Allcot, of the One hundred and thirty-third New York Regiment, to seize necessary mules, horses, carts, wagons, forage, wood, and boats for the quartermaster's department, and sugar, beef, and pork for commissary department of his command.

If the statement of my friend from Wisconsin is true, that there were ample supplies there and no need of impressing any, upon what reason was this order of General Paine based?

That he required them to give receipts in a prescribed form for all property so taken and to turn the same over to Lieutenants Wooster and Brevorts, brigade quartermaster and commissary; that he required said Wooster and Brevorts to take up the property so turned over to them on their returns and to dispose of it according to law. That he required Captains Craig and Allcot to inquire and report concerning the loyalty of all persons whose property they should seize, and to avoid as far as they could the seizure of any property of loyal persons. That under this order so issued said officers, with the assistance of non-commissioned officers and privates detailed for that duty, made numerous seizures of property, which was used by affiant's said command. That affiant has no particular recollection as to the amount of the several kinds of property seized as aforesaid. And affiant further says that he stationed a detachment of troops at Plaquemine, on the Mississippi River, and another at a point on the Bayou Plaquemine, between Indian Village and Plaquemine, which points were mentioned, as affiant believes, until his command left that part of the country on the 22d of February. That he remembers Mr. and Mrs. Hebert, whom he saw at their residence on the road between Indian Village and Plaquemine. That he supposes his troops, of course, used the wood which they found most convenient for fuel.

The troops were encamped on the plantation of the claimant, and this wood was piled up on the bank of the bayou—and that which was seized also by the officers detailed as aforesaid to seize wood and other property. That he has no personal knowledge of the taking of any such. That he has no doubt that all the forage, fuel, corn, and wood used by his command, which consisted of the Fourth Wisconsin, Eighth New Hampshire, One hundred and thirty-third New York, One hundred and seventy-fifth New York Regiments, and a battery of artillery of the regular Army, during the time they remained at Indian Village and Plaquemine, and at the intermediate post mentioned, were taken from the neighborhood.

Now, let us see why General Paine's order to these officers to give receipts to parties whose property they impressed was not obeyed. I turn to the testimony of one of the seizing officers, Captain Allcot, of New York. I invite attention to the testimony of the impressing officer himself:

CITY AND COUNTY OF NEW YORK,
State of New York:

John H. Allcot, of said city and State, being duly sworn, doth depose and say as follows: That he resides at No. 102 East One hundred and fourth street, in said city; that in the year 1863 he was captain in the One hundred and thirty-third Regiment New York Volunteers, and in the brigade commanded by General H. E. Paine, while in camp at Indian Village, Iberville Parish, Louisiana, near the plantation and house of Mr. and Mrs. Jules J. Hebert; that he was detailed as forage-master of the brigade at the time, his command comprising one captain besides himself and, as near as he can now recollect, some twenty enlisted men; that he visited the plantation of Mr. and Mrs. Hebert, and found thereon large quantities of cordwood, lumber, corn, and other articles; said wood, lumber, corn, &c., was seized by him and his command stationed at Indian Village. Further, said wood, corn, lumber, &c., were taken to camp in quantities as required, with the understanding that a receipt for the same should be given before the troops left. Said receipt was not given in consequence of the brigade being suddenly ordered away.

That is the reason this lady does not come here with the receipt of the impressing officer in her possession.

Further, that the place where the property was seized was known as Jules J. Hebert's plantation. That the stock, comprising cattle, sheep, mules, and hogs, were taken from the plantation of Mr. John A. Darden, and were claimed by Mrs. Hebert as her property while on our way to the camp; the cows were given up to her, but the remainder were refused and driven to camp. Further, that it has been represented to him that a certain Jules O. Neraux (who was at that time about 16 years of age), has made a statement to the effect that quantities of flour, pork, sugar, coffee, &c., were taken from the commissary stores by General Paine and his officers and given to Mr. and Mrs. Hebert in exchange for articles taken from them. Said statement deponent knows to be untrue, as no such transaction took place, or could have taken place, without his knowledge.

Thus we have from the lips of the impressing officer himself the story of this impressment of supplies for the service of the troops of the United States.

Then in another affidavit this impressing officer gives the following testimony:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
City and County of New York, ss:

John H. Allcot, of said city and county, being duly sworn, deposes and says, that in the year 1863 he was captain in the One hundred and thirty-third Regiment New York Volunteers, and was in the brigade commanded by Col. H. E. Paine while in camp at Indian Village, near the plantation and home of Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Hebert, and that as well as he can now recollect there were quite a number of troops encamped there in the spring of 1863, probably about 4,000, and that these troops were there for some considerable time, and while there cordwood and lumber were taken from their plantation and premises, Mr. and Mrs. Hebert's, by the Army, for the use of the Army, and the cordwood was used by the Army for fuel, and was necessary, and the lumber was used by the Army for flooring in the tents, the ground being very damp from overflow, and was necessary, and the said wood and lumber was so taken and used by officers and soldiers with the knowledge and authority of the officers, and was necessary at the time. The wood was used in the camp-fires to cook and wash by and was indispensable, as neither officers or soldiers could do without some fire. And further, that from all he could learn Mr. J. J. Hebert was always a loyal man and devoted to the cause of the Union from the beginning of the war.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, this testimony of the impressing officer is upborne by twenty-five or thirty witnesses, some of them black, some of them white, some of them soldiers, some of them civilians, who in one concurrent strain testify that the plantation and home of this loyal woman were devastated as only troops can devastate a place. Poultry, hogs, horses, mules, wood, lumber, were all taken with the knowledge and authority of the Federal officers, some by the direct order of the officer in command, for the use of the Army—taken from a loyal person. Then by what right under the law does any man say that this claim shall not be paid?

But my friend here, for whose ability and character I have so high a respect, declares that he can not support this bill because there is a discrepancy in the two statements presented.

Now let us see. These statements do conflict. But how? She presented her first claim to the Southern Claims Commission. Bear in mind that she was a lady, that she was unused to business matters, that she made out to the best of her knowledge and belief a true satement and fixed the prices thereto, that she was not a merchant, she was not in business, she was not a dealer in produce, poultry, cordwood, or anything of that sort, and was not supposed to know, and could not be supposed to know, the correct value of these things. She got some of her ideas from the state of affairs which existed in the South during the war when a cord of wood was worth $30 or $40, when a man would give all he had for a turkey and almost bankrupt his very soul for a chicken—she got some of these ideas from the war. That was in her first statement, but in her second statement these things are all moderated. They are cut down. The original claim, when these extravagant estimates were made, was in 1873 for $47,000, but it has been trimmed down, and the claim presented to-day, and which we believe to be just, is for $21,000.

I think, without detaining the committee any further, I have shown, first, that she is the proper party in court; in the second place, she was loyal to the union of the States, and in the third place the property was seized. I trust the committee will proceed at the proper time to do justice to this party. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Louisiana thinks that I have made some mistake as to the letter of General Paine, and I will send to the Clerk's desk, to have read, his statement, so that the House may judge for itself.

Mr. ELLIS, I have read it.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Let the Clerk read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 28, 1880.

DEAR SIR: Your favor inquiring respecting an alleged seizure of quartermaster's and commissary's stores by my order in Iberville Parish, Louisiana, during the war (the property of Mr. or Mrs. Hebert), was duly received.

I have on several occasions answered the same inquiry, addressed to me by committees of Congress and by agents of the Southern Claims Commission, and perhaps of other tribunals; and in answering have been able, availing myself of my order-books, to give more precise information than I shall be able to give now, without any memoranda to refresh my recollection.

During the winter of 1862-'63 I was sent from Baton Rouge with my brigade (then the Second Brigade, Third Division, Nineteenth Army Corps), a squadron of cavalry, and one or two light batteries, to a place called Indian Village, on the Bayou Plaquemine, about nine miles distant from the village of Plaquemine, at which the bayou makes its exit from the Mississippi River. I was sent to observe a force of the enemy then encamped at Rosedale, on the Bayou Grossetete, not far from Indian Village, and easily accessible from that point.

I established my headquarters at Indian Village, but also established posts at the village of Plaquemine and at a point about half-way between Plaquemine and Indian Village.

One day I was returning from an inspection of these posts, accompanied by your friend George W. Carter, then a captain in the Fourth Wisconsin Regiment, and at a point not far distant from this middle post was accosted by a gentleman at the road-side, apparently in feeble health, who said that his wife, who he said was sitting on the porch of his house, would be glad to see me. I alighted and went with him to the house, which was but a few feet from the road-side, where he introduced me to a lady whom I suppose to have been Mrs. Hebert, respecting the seizure of whose property you inquire. I think Captain Carter alighted also and heard our conversation, but I am not sure on this point. This lady said to me that her husband was sick and suffering for want of wheat flour, that the soldiers had taken her poultry, and that it would be a great favor to her if I would furnish her some flour. On my arrival in camp I sent her a barrel of flour. This was the first and last I ever heard of this lady, until I saw many years afterward in the city of Washington a lady whom I understand to be, but did not recognize as, the lady whom I saw that day.

Now I have no personal knowledge whether any property belonging to Mr. or Mrs. Hebert was or was not taken by my troops, but the facts which I am about to state will enable you to judge as well as I can as to the probabilities on this subject. Our supplies furnished by the Government at that time were abundant and excellent. A steamboat transported them to our camps. Immediately on my arrival at Indian Village I detailed a party, consisting of several commissioned officers and a considerable number of enlisted men (one of the officers being Colonel Craig, the last commander of the Fourth Wisconsin Regiment), whose duty it was, as defined in the order making the detail, to make seizures of corn, sugar, molasses, forage, beef, mules, and other supplies of which the country was then full, and to give to the owners of all property seized written receipts therefor. The party so detailed satisfactorily performed their duty, and no complaint ever reached me that they made any seizure without giving the voucher as my order required.

In view of the abundant supplies furnished by the Government and the large quantity seized by this party, I can imagine no temptation for the soldiers to incur the trouble of making seizures themselves of any of these articles except poultry.

I think that Colonel Craig is now in the mining region of Michigan, and that, if you desire it, I could procure his address and that of the officers who were associated with him in this business, and that from them you may be able to obtain information which is more definite and tangible than any I am able to give.

Regretting that my memoranda are not at hand to enable me to give you a more satisfactory answer to your inquiry,

I am, yours, truly,

H. E. PAINE.

Hon. E. S. BRAGG, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

Mr. ELLIS. May I inquire what is the date of that letter?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. January 28, 1880.

Mr. ELLIS. Seven years before General Paine made the affidavit I read from, when his memory was better.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. The affidavit does not state anything differently.

Mr. ELLIS. The affidavit states that he ordered the property to be taken, and the report of the officers shows that they went and took it. There is the issue, and I must ask again, in my own time, to show what there is in it.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. You are mistaken, I think.

Mr. ELLIS. No; I am not mistaken. Let me read it:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA:

Halbert E. Paine, having been duly sworn, on his said oath deposes and says, that on the 7th day of February, 1863, the Second Brigade, Third Division, Nineteenth Army Corps, arrived at Indian Village, on Bayou Plaquemine, in the State of Louisiana, under his command, and remained there until the 22d of the same month; that on the 8th of that month he detailed Captain Craig, of the Fourth Wisconsin Regiment, and Allcot, of the One hundred and thirty-third New York Regiment, to seize necessary mules, horses, carts, wagons, forage, wood, and boats for the quartermaster's department, and sugar, beef, and pork for the commissary department of his command; that he required them to give receipts in a prescribed form for all property so taken and to turn the same over to Lieutenants Wooster and Brevorts, brigade quartermaster and commissary; that he required said Wooster and Brevorts to take up the property so turned over to them on their returns and to dispose of it according to law.

That was General Paine's order, and Captain Allcot's statement, which I have read, shows he took the property. If that paper be sent to me I will recur to it again.

Mr. STORM. The reporters have taken it.

Mr. ELLIS. He ordered the property to be taken, and the officers say that they took Mrs. Hebert's property.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is reported from the committee with an adverse recommendation.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the adverse report be non-concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was taken on ordering the bill to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, nays 17.

Mr. THOMAS. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw the demand for tellers.

Mr. BREWER, of New York. I renew the demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. BREWER, of New York, and Mr. ELLIS were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 138, noes 27.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills to the House with various recommendations.

PAPERS ON FILE IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HITT, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 315) relative to certain papers in the State Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. MILLER, of Texas.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar is a bill coming over from last Friday.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, upon that bill the yeas and nays were ordered. I suggest that by consent, as within about five minutes the House will take its usual Friday recess, we pass that bill over informally and take up the bills reported by the committee to-day, to which there is no objection, and which may be passed before the recess.

Mr. VALENTINE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish to state that I have no interest in the matter except to further the business of the House.

Mr. VALENTINE. I ask the gentleman to allow me to make a brief statement in reference to a bill which I hold in my hand.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to the gentleman making a statement.

Mr. VALENTINE. I have a bill here upon which I desire immediate action. It is a very important measure, and I am satisfied a brief statement will convince gentlemen of the propriety of its adoption.

This bill if passed will relieve the Private Calendar of more bills than have been taken from it during the present session of Congress, although it is general in its nature. It is a bill for the purpose of extending the jurisdiction to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certified copies of lost checks.

Mr. STORM. Regular order!

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope the gentleman will not call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of the roll on the adoption of the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on last Friday. On that amendment it will be remembered the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that inasmuch as it is within a very few minutes of the recess, the previous question be considered as ordered and then let it go over to come up as unfinished business to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments, and then I will accept the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee and let it go over.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It will be too late for the gentleman to accept the proposition in a moment, the time having about arrived for the recess. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of the roll. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope my request will be submitted to the House.

Mr. STORM. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania requests that the previous question may be considered as ordered upon the adoption of the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar and upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time and also upon its passage, for unless that is done it will not come up as unfinished business except on Friday.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And if that is done will it come up to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What bill is that?

The SPEAKER. It is the Bigley bill—the bill for the relief of Nicholas Bigley, coming over from last Friday. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be read.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not insist on having the bill read now, but will consent to the request I made.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the vote be taken upon it on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the regular order is the question on the adoption of the amendment to this bill, and upon that the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It only lacks a minute and a half of the time for recess. I move that the House do now adjourn. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 34, noes 61.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. VALENTINE. I make the point of order that the hour has now arrived when under a previous order of the House we must take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will preside as Speaker pro tempore at the evening session.

The hour having now arrived when by order of the House a recess is to be taken, the Chair declares the House in recess until 8 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which the session is held this evening.

The Clerk read as follows:

That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 8 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the consideration of business under the order just read.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. STOCKSLAGER in the chair.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that the business of this evening may begin, on page 45 of the Calendar, with the case of David T. Dudley. There are some cases preceding it on the Calendar which have been disputed. I ask that these be passed over informally.

There was no objection.

DAVID T. DUDLEY.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 6965) granting a pension to David T. Dudley, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David T. Dudley, late a private in Company C, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteers.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask that the report be read, and to save time I ask now that in each case after the reading of the bill the report be read.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6965) granting a pension to David T. Dudley, submit the following report:

We find that this soldier enlisted in Company C, Fourth Michigan Volunteers, June 20, 1861, and was discharged June 13, 1864. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Gettysburg, July 2, 1863, and was confined at Richmond until August 29, when he was paroled. He claims to have contracted rheumatism and diarrhea while a prisoner of war. Two of his comrades, S. Morse and W. J. Munroe, testify that he was sound and well up to the time of his capture; that when returned to his command he was sent to the hospital to be treated for rheumatism and diarrhea. The hospital records show that he was treated for intermittent fever, which is not inconsistent with the testimony of the comrades above referred to.

Orderly Sergeant F. G. Halstead testifies:

"He was taken prisoner with me while in line of duty; was well while on the march to prison, and was stricken down with the rheumatism about the last of July, 1863, and was very bad off from the first, and grew worse, until he was unable to help himself. That I did take care of him the most of the time until his release, which I think was in August, 1863. This disease was contracted while in Belle Isle, Virginia, a prisoner of war, taken in the battle of Gettysburg, July 3, 1863."

He further says his knowledge of the above facts is obtained from the following source, namely:

"That I was with him most of the time during his service in our company, and having the care of him while sick on Belle Isle. That I saw him in 1865, and he was suffering from the same disease."

November 28, 1881, Dr. M. M. Butler testifies that he has been claimant's family physician since 1872, and that he has been and still is suffering with rheumatism and diarrhea.

July 20, 1881, the examining surgeon at Plattsmouth, Nebr., certifies that he finds the right leg smaller than the other, measuring two inches less in circumference. That he finds his disability from rheumatism to be one-half, his disability from diarrhea nothing. The case was rejected in the Pension Office on the ground "that there was no record of alleged disease," &c.

Your committee, after a careful examination of the papers in the case, find that he has clearly proven that he was taken prisoner at Gettysburg; that he contracted rheumatism and diarrhea while confined at Belle Isle, and that it has continued ever since, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH TYLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4055) granting a pension to Sarah Tyler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place the name of Sarah Tyler, dependent mother of William Tyler, deceased, late of Company B, Fifty-second Indiana Volunteer Infantry, to date from January 1, 1863, on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws.

The committee recommend the following amendment:

In line 6, strike out the words "to date from January 1, 1863," and insert in lieu thereof "on the pension-roll."

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4055) granting a pension to Sarah Tyler, submit the following report:

We find that Sarah Tyler was the mother of William Tyler, who enlisted in Company B, Fifty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers, December 26, 1861. The Adjutant-General's report says: "Frozen to death near Fort Pillow, Tennessee, December 31, 1863."

Claimant seems to have been unable to satisfy the Pension Department that she was dependent on her son at the time of his death. The evidence shows that Allen Tyler, the husband of claimant, was 75 years old at the time of his death in 1883, and for past sixteen years has been unable to work, and the aged couple have been supported by the charity of their neighbors. The claimant is 64 years old, feeble, and penniless. The affidavits of six of her neighbors, whose good character is certified to by the postmaster, are offered to substantiate the foregoing statements. The evidence is entirely satisfactory. The case is a very strong one, and your committee without hesitation recommend the passage of the bill with amendment striking out the words "to date from January 1, 1863," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "on the pension-roll."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Does this bill put the applicant on the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JEREMIAH P. SWARTZELL.

The next business on the Private Calender was the bill (H. R. 7026) granting a pension to Jeremiah P. Swartzell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jeremiah P. Swatzell, late first sergeant of Company I, Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7026) granting a pension to Jeremiah P. Swatzell, submit the following report:

Your committee find that this man was enrolled and was taken into actual service September 20, 1864, though not mustered until April 9, 1865, in Company I, Seventeenth Kentucky Cavalry. That he served faithfully as first sergeant of his company until October 4, 1865, though his discharge is dated September 20, 1865. On the 8th of October, four days after his discharge reached him, he was taken down with a severe attack of rheumatism and disease of the liver, confining him to his home for nearly six months and from which he has never recovered. J. W. Freeman, Dr. N. S. Johnson, J. T. Clark, R. R. Morgan, and Martha J. Hunt all testify that they knew claimant intimately before and at time of enlistment, and that he was a sound, able-bodied man. Charles E. Van Pelt, captain of Company I, Seventeenth Kentucky Cavalry, testifies:

"Claimant was a faithful soldier, and stout and able-bodied in every particular during his service; and that if he was disabled immediately after discharge on account of rheumatism, it was certainly the result of or caused by his service, and that his habits were correct and temperate."

Several witnesses testify as to his severe sickness, commencing October 8 and continuing until the next spring, and also as to his condition until 1869. Dr. W. W. Woodring testifies to treatment from 1871 to 1881 for chronic hepatitis, and that he has been frequently prostrated, and for the last three years of the time he has been compelled to abandon his occupation as a carpenter. Robert L. Brooking and J. W. Duston testify to the same effect from 1874 to 1881. Six or eight other witnesses testify as to his condition during the years from 1865 to 1881. Dr. B. F. Mastaman, examining surgeon at Independence, Kans., reports in 1882:

"I find him suffering from chronic rheumatism, affecting the right side, but more especially the right shoulder, hip, and knee; I find slight enlargement of the knee-joint; at times he suffers from this trouble very severely. He also suffers from chronic hepatitis; there is enlargement of the liver, and well-marked tenderness. At times he is confined to his bed for several days. He is unable to perform any manual labor."

The case was rejected in the Pension Office for the reason that the sickness did not manifest itself until after claimant had left the service. But it seems very improbable to suppose that the severe sickness that prostrated him four days after his discharge did not originate in the service. Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM H. KINMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7177) granting a pension to William H. Kinman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. Kinman, formerly of Company F, Thirty-fourth Ohio Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7177) granting a pension to William H. Kinman, submit the following report:

This soldier enlisted July 25, 1861, in Company F, Thirty-fourth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, and was discharged March 27, 1862, for disability. March 3, 1876, application was made for a pension on the ground that at Barboursville, W. Va., he contracted lung fever on or about November 1, which resulted in disease of the lungs. The application was rejected on the ground that the disability existed prior to enlistment, the only evidence of disability being the statement of the captain of the company in his certificate of disability that "he has been afflicted for about eighteen months with lung disease." On the other hand, Mrs. Miriam Williamson, M. D., says:

"I was claimant's family physician and was frequently in attendance upon the different members of the family (especially on the father); that she had good and frequent opportunity to know of condition of claimant prior to and at the date of his enlistment in the Army; that he was to all appearance and from her knowledge of him at that time a sound and able-bodied man, free from lung disease; that had he had any lung trouble she would have known it."

The postmaster at Waynesville, Warren County, Ohio, says:

"Mrs. Williams is an excellent lady, who is a regular physician, having studied with her husband, and her character is unimpeachable."

A. H. Dodge testifies that he had known the claimant from 1857 to time of enlisment and considered him a strong, healthy man. The postmaster says, "He is a good, truthful man." Mary and J. A. Malony say they had known claimant for four years before enlistment, boarded in the same family with him, and to the best of their knowledge he was not troubled with lung disease. The postmaster speaks in high terms of the character for truth and sincerity of these witnesses. W. F. Rosenboyer, a comrade in the same company, says claimant was taken down with lung fever at Barboursville, in December, 1861, and he was left under treatment of Dr. Clark, one of the regimental surgeons. G. W. Ebright, another comrade, testifies that they had made a long, hard march of over one hundred miles, and that in consequence of the exposure and hardship of this march claimant was taken sick and that he never recovered.

Dr. Ayers, assistant surgeon in charge, testifies to having treated him during his sickness. The testimony is full and complete that he never fully recovered; that he was unable to do any further service in his command; that he was discharged the following March, has been an invalid ever since, and that he is now sick and poor. The case would doubtless be allowed without hesitation in the Pension Department were it not for the unfavorable statement of the captain of the company in the certificate of disability.

Your committee believe that the strong evidence by unimpeachable witnesses to the contrary ought to have been received and the pension allowed. But admitting that the claimant's lungs were weak when he enlisted, it is evident that the long marches and exposure to inclement weather severely injured his health, and he is clearly entitled to relief during the very few years yet remaining to him. Your committee heartily recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HARLAN JACKSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4458) granting a pension to Harlan Jackson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Harlan Jackson, late of Company L, Sixth Regiment Kansas Militia.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4458) granting a pension to Harlan Jackson, would submit the following report:

The evidence shows that claimant was an enlisted man in Company L, Sixth Kansas State Militia; that the company was called into the United States service to repel the invasion of the State by the rebel forces under the command of General Sterling Price; that on the 24th of October, 1864, an engagement took place in Linn County, Kansas, known as the "Battle of Mine Creek," in which claimant received a gunshot wound in the left shoulder and arm. Capt. John H. Belding, Lieuts. John M. Seright and William A. Baugh testify that they know the above statements to be true from personal knowledge. The Pension Department can not grant a pension, because the law provides that all claims for pensions filed by militiamen must be proved up before July 4, 1874. It has been the universal custom to grant pensions by act of Congress to members of the State militia wounded in action in line of duty while under the command of officers of the United States Army. Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to say just one word. I do not think that Congress, the House or the Senate either, has ever failed to pass one of these bills. It does seem to me there ought to be a general law repealing the limitation as to the militia. If that were done it would relieve the Private Calendar of a great many of those cases.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARTHA ANGELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2138) granting a pension to Martha Angell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Martha Angell, widow of Lieut. John C. Angell, late of Company B, Ninth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

The Clerk commenced to read the report.

Mr. BAGLEY (interrupting the reading). I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Let it be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the further reading of the report was dispensed with, and it was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2138) granting a pension to Martha Angell, submit the following report:

Claimant is the widow of John C. Angell, who enlisted September 10, 1861, in Company F, Benton Cadets Infantry Volunteers, and who was at time of his discharge, December 23, 1864, a lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Regiment West Virginia Volunteers. Lieutenant Angell died September 3, 1876, from St. Vitus's dance, produced by overexertion during hard marching in the mountains of West Virginia. Samuel Bell, first sergeant of Company B, Second Virginia Veterans, testifies that he knew Lieut. John C. Angell from 1860 until the time of his death, and was present when he died and knew him during the war and after. Was in the same brigade with him when he was assigned to the ambulance corps on account of a nervous, tottering step. He had no bodily ailment such as would cause him to require medical attendance. The same nervous disease terminated his life at Laclede, Mo., September 3, 1876. He was unable to perform any manual labor from the time of his discharge until his death. That Drs. John R. Philson and J. C. Griffith, who treated him, are dead. We believe the disease of which Lieutenant Angell died was contracted or produced by the heavy mountain campaigns of West Virginia during the three years of service.

J. H. Lowhead, late first lieutenant of Company E, same regiment as Angell, says:

"I have known the late Lieut. John C. Angell since 1857, during the war, and for two years after the war intimately. When he joined the Ninth Regiment West Virginia, early in 1862, he was in good health and always with his command in all the arduous marches to Cayd's Mountain, under General Crook, to Lynchburg, under General Hunter, and the campaign in the valley of Virginia. I repeatedly said to him, 'Lieutenant, you are killing yourself by your excessively hard duty.' I knew him in the Army as one of the bravest soldiers; always doing duty, many times physically unable. After the war I knew him as a broken and wrecked man, physically and mentally. I would further say that the disability seemed to be excessive nervousness. I might say he was suffering from nervous prostration. I solemnly say that from the time he began to fail while in the service up to the last time I saw him, probably in 1867, he gradually and rapidly failed physically and mentally, and was in such a helpless condition that he had to be waited on by his friends."

Professor Lowhead is superintendent of schools of Bourbon County, Kansas, and a man of unquestioned integrity. Hiram Curtis, a man of undoubted veracity, testifies:

"He knew Lieutenant Angell before enlistment; that he was a healthy man when he entered the service. I participated in some of the battles in which Lieutenant Angell was engaged up the Valley, Hunter's raid and retreat, and battle of Winchester. I believe the rigid mountain campaigns of Virginia produced the nervous debility from which he suffered. I knew him after the war, and that he was not capable of performiug manual labor, and that the nervous debility grew on him and affected his mind until he died; that he left a family of wife and six children with nothing whatever, homeless, and dependent on friends; that his wife and children are still dependent."

W. A. Ellis and J. C. McElroy testify in strong terms to his high character and good health during the five years preceding his enlistment.

I. Malloy, captain Company A, One hundred and sixth Ohio Volunteers, says:

"Lieutenant Angell was in the full sense of the term a No. 1 soldier. I was personally associated with him in many battles in the valley of Virginia, also on the Hunter raid, which was one of the hardest of the war. I knew him before and after the service, and believed him to be a healthy man when he enlisted. The disease of which he died, St. Vitus's dance, was due to the many long marches made by his command in the campaigns of West Virginia."

A. Campbell, captain Company A, Second Virginia Volunteers, testifies:

"He knew Lieutenant Angell from childhood to time of enlistment; that he attended school with him, worked in the same mill with him, and was especially intimate with him. That prior to the war he was always well and sound; that he entered service about the same time and saw him frequently in the service. Up to beginning of the Hunter raid know he was in good health. During that raid I observed that his strength failed and his mind became flighty. At that time I thought the hardships and exposure of that campaign had broken him down, and still believe so. Met him again after my own discharge at Racine, Ohio, and found him unfit for any mental or physical labor. His condition was the subject of common conversation among his acquaintances, every one considering him 'out of his mind.' At that time suggested that he apply for a pension, but he refused, as he had an insane idea that he was sound in body and mind. He was strictly temperate, and his moral character was excellent."

T. J. and B. A. Elliot, men of excellent character, make full and strong affidavits to the same effect.

Dr. Z. T. Stanley says:

"I attended Lieutenant Angell in his last illness, and that he died at Laclede, Mo., September 3, 1876, of a nervous disease commonly known as St. Vitus's dance. Excessive overexertion and exposure of a long and fatiguing march in a mountainous district would produce the disease of which he died."

While from the nature of the disease it seems impossible to secure the rigid proof required in the Pension Office, yet your committee feel that considering the amount of the evidence and the high character of the affiants there can not be the slightest doubt but what this soldier's death was caused by his severe and arduous service, and unhesitatingly recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL HANSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 542) granting a pension to Samuel Hanson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel Hanson, late a private in Company D, Thirty-fourth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry.

The Clerk read the report in part.

Mr. PERKINS (interrupting the reading.) This is a long report. I ask that the further reading be dispensed with, and that the report be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 542) granting a pension to Samuel Hanson, submit the following report:

This soldier enlisted January 16, 1864, in Company D, Thirty-third Regiment Iowa Volunteers, and was mustered out with his company August 15, 1865. In 1870 he applied for a pension, alleging disability from lung disease; that in March, 1864, at Little Rock, Ark., he was attacked with lung fever from exposure while in service, which seriously affected his lungs and from which he never recovered. The Adjutant-General's report shows that he was left sick at Little Rock March 23, 1864. The Surgeon-General's report shows that he was admitted to general hospital at Little Rock March 22, 1864, for treatment for "pleuropneumonia," and returned to duty April 11, 1864.

Riley Jessup, late captain of Company D, in affidavit made September 23, 1870, states:

"At Little Rock, March, 1864, while in the line of duty, claimant was attacked by lung fever, brought on by exposure in the service; said disease affected his lungs, and that they continued affected until discharge; that his lungs were not affected at the time of enlistment or prior to said attack of lung fever; that claimant was of good habits while in the service, and, in affiant's opinion, the disease was the result of unavoidable exposure."

Dr. D. A. Hoffman states:

"Claimant was examined by me before he enlisted, for the purpose of ascertaining whether he was a sound man physically. That at that time he was not affected with any disease of the lungs. On his return from the service, immediately after his discharge, I treated him for disease of the lungs, which was the result of acute inflammation of the lungs, contracted while he was in service. I have treated him for the said disease at various times since September, 1865, to the present time (December, 1870), and that his disease still continues."

The testimony is ample and undisputed that his disease has continued ever since, excepting that Dr. Huntsman, of Oskaloosa, the examining surgeon, said in 1772 that he found no disease of the lungs. A few months later another examining surgeon says:

"I find upon examination that the applicant has a deep, hollow cough, ex-pectorating purulent and muco-purulent matter, night-sweats, and emaciation; auscultation shows in the upper portion of the left lung; cavernous râle; respiration and voice amphoric; dullness on percussion over the whole left lung; the lower portion very dull, and can not ascertain that air passes into that portion of it. He is physically unable to perform manual labor."

A few months later Dr. W. S. Orr, examining surgeon at Ottumwa, reports him totally incapacitated from obtaining a sustenance by manual labor, and says the disability is probably permanent.

It would seem as though nothing was wanting to establish a case in the Pension Department, but two special examiners were sent out and a mass of contradictory evidence was submitted, and the case was finally rejected on the ground that claimant's lungs were affected when he went into the service. If the evidence submitted by the special examiners proves anything, it proves that the soldier was a weak man, physically unfit for the service when he was accepted; that he was a hale, hearty man after his discharge, working at heavy work in a stone-quarry and receiving full wages; that he was before enlistment a sound, rugged young man, of excellent habits, and at the same time a confirmed drunkard; that he had a severe consumptive cough; and by other witnesses equally reliable it is proven that he "never had the least symptoms of anything being the matter with his lungs prior to his going into the Army; that he was frequently employed to chop wood and split rails, and was noted as a first-rate wood-chopper." The Commissioner of Pensions in 1878 was evidently bewildered by this mass of contradictory evidence, for in a letter to claimant's agent he says:

"The invalid pension claim No. 162081, of Samuel Hanson, was rejected September 16, 1875, upon competent evidence (medical and lay) elicited by special examinations, showing that the alleged disease was not due to the service; in other words, that his lungs were diseased at the time he enlisted, and that the principal cause of his disability was due to an attack of lung fever since his discharge. It is proper to add that an examination made March 2, 1872, fails to discover any disease of the lungs."

This is certainly being equal to the occasion. The disability existed before enlistment, the disability was caused by lung fever after enlistment, and finally the disability never existed at all.

The simple facts seem to be that some two months after enlistment the soldier had an acute attack of lung fever from which he has never recovered, and that he is now totally incapacitated from performing manual labor. By the passage of this bill his few remaining years will be made comparatively comfortable. He loses the twenty years of arrears to which he seems to have been as clearly entitled as his more fortunate comrades who received them. Believing that simple justice requires that the Government should care for this soldier, your committee recommend the passage of this bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL M. BARTLETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7094) granting a pension to Lemuel M. Bartlett.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lemuel M. Bartlett, late a private in Company K, Thirty-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 6, strike out "Lemuel" and insert "Samuel."

Amend the title so as to read:

"A bill granting a pension to Samuel M. Bartlett."

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7094) for the relief of Samuel M. Bartlett, submit the following report:

Samuel M. Bartlett enlisted in Company K, Thirty-fourth Illinois Regiment, December 2, 1861, and was discharged December 20, 1862, for disability. He filed an application for pension June 28, 1880, basing his claim on injuries received in line of duty while on detached service, guarding baggage trains, by jumping hastily from wagon, the train at the time being suddenly attacked by guerrillas; in jumping he struck on his right foot and ankle, turning same under and crushing and disabling it. He also claims to have ruptured himself at the same time, which rupture has since developed into an aggravated hernia. His claim was rejected by the Pension Department, the reason being "claimant discharged for old fracture of right ankle."

The evidence in the claim is strong and conclusive that prior to enlistment he was a sound, healthy, able-bodied man, with no apparent disabilities.

Elijah Hubbard testifies:

"Knew claimant years before he enlisted; he was sound, wholly free from lameness of right ankle and foot, and affiant believes claimant had no hernia; was well known for his prowess in athletic sports and at hard labor; lived near him much of his life; never knew of his being ill before his enlistment."

T. E. Stockwell testifies:

"Knows claimant was sound at and before enlistment, doing hard labor, with no lameness of right ankle and foot, and to best of belief was free from hernia; knew claimant a number of years before enlistment."

John Thompson, comrade, testifies:

"I knew claimant about a year before enlistment; lived near him; saw him almost daily; enlisted with him the same day, and believe he was sound and free from hernia, lameness of right foot and ankle, and varicose veins."

D. C. Wagner, captain of claimant's company, says:

"Claimant was sound, with no lameness of right foot and ankle or hernia prior to being detailed during the fall of 1862 for guard duty over the mountains between Tennessee and Kentucky; had previously been able to perform any duty assigned him; never saw claimant after he went on said duty."

John Thompson, comrade, says:

"He was in hospital at Louisville, Ky., when claimant was brought in with injuries of right foot and ankle and great soreness and pain in pit of stomach. After discharge saw claimant at his home in Portland, Ill.; he was quite lame from injury to foot and ankle, and his stomach trouble had developed into an aggravated hernia."

Benjamin Woodwood, surgeon Twenty-second Illinois Volunteers, in charge of Park barracks in November and December, 1862, testifies that there was a man who was injured as claimant alleges to have been, but can not swear to his identity.

C. L. Fisk, examining surgeon, Franklin, Mass., certifies:

"Applicant received an injury to right ankle-joint by jumping from a train-wagon, which has resulted in permanent lameness, attended with fearful swelling and varicose veins of the leg. He also has a hernia midway of the lower portion of the sternum, and the umbilicus as large as a small orange, or about three inches in diameter. I rate one-half on ankle and results and one-half on hernia and results."

S. K. Field, R. A. Dudley, E. O. Dickenson, selectmen of Leverett, Mass., certify that claimant is old, in poor health, totally disabled for manual labor, and a charge upon the town, being in its poor-house.

In view of all the facts, your committee think a case is made and well established by all the evidence; they therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, with the following amendments: Substituting "Samuel," in the title and also in the sixth line, for the word "Lemuel."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman who reports this bill. I did not catch in the reading whether the report states what this soldier was doing in the wagon.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], who reported the bill I believe is not present. The report distinctly states that this soldier was injured, while on detached service guarding baggage trains, by jumping hastily from wagon, the train at the time being suddenly attacked by guerrillas.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. When the guard of a wagon is discharging his duty is his place inside the wagon? Is that the soldier's place?

Mr. MATSON. I suppose it may sometimes be right for the soldier in such a case to ride on the wagon. I have heard of officers riding on wagons.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. But that is not the place for them.

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LLOYD W. HIXON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6798) to grant a pension to Lloyd W. Hixon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lloyd W. Hixon, late an assistant surgeon in the service of the United States of the Thirteenth Regiment of the Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

That claimant was mustered into the military service of the United States as assistant surgeon, Thirteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, March 3, 1862, and honorably discharged August 1, 1864.

November 6, 1882, he filed a declaration for pension, alleging that he contracted deafness while in the service and in line of duty, which was rejected January 18, 1884, on the ground of existence of disability prior to enlistment.

Charles W. Hovey, inspector of customs, Boston, Mass., testifies:

"That he was a lieutenant-colonel of claimant's regiment in the service; remembers that he was troubled with deafness at Belle Plain, Va., in the winter of 1862-'63, which was greatly increased by exposure; at discharge was seriously troubled, and believes it was the result of exposure in the service."

A. W. Whiting, M. D., of Newton, Mass., says he was surgeon of claimant's regiment:

"That the exposure incident to the service was such as to seriously affect claimant's hearing, and his deafness was increased to such an extent as to incapacitate him from practicing his profession, which resulted, in his opinion, from the exposure and hardships of the service."

Dr. J. O. Green, of Boston, Mass., testifies, December 3, 1881:

"Known claimant since 1863, but first treated him in 1873 and during each year to 1876 for catarrhal deafness of an aggravated type, which made gradual progress, producing more and more thickening of the tympanum, mucous membrane, and secondary disease of auditory nerve, until now (May, 1883) he can not distinguish words through the most powerful ear-trumpet nor hear a vibrating tuning-fork when placed on the skull and mastoids, and there is no question about the disease being hypertrophic inflammation of the mucous membrane, aggravated in character and progress."

Oliver E. Cushing, of Lowell, Mass., testifies April 21, 1884:

"I have known Lloyd W. Hixon for many years, and at no time prior to his enlistment in the United States service in 1861 was he incapacitated from the discharge of any professional duties by his inability to hear."

Artemus S. Tyler, of Lowell, Mass., testifies April 21, 1884:

"I have known Lloyd W. Hixon for many years, and at no time prior to his enlistment in the United States service was he incapacitated for the discharge of any professional duties by his inability to hear."

In addition to the testimony specially cited above, it is clearly shown by a preponderance of the evidence that the claimant was free from the disability at the time of his enlistment in the military service; that the disease had its origin in the service and while in line of duty; that the disability so incurred has continued to increase in severity until the soldier is now shown by the report of the United States examining surgeon to be totally disabled.

Your committee, in view of the facts, unhesitatingly recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

EDWARD WILCOX.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6775) granting a pension to Edward Wilcox:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Edward Wilcox, an imbecile son of Leonard Wilcox, late of Company A, Twenty-first Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, and pay his legally appointed conservator a pension of $25 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

Edward Wilcox is the orphan imbecile son of Leonard Wilcox, late of Company A, Twenty-first Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, who died at Falmouth, Va., December 16, 1862, the mother of Edward having died prior to the enlistment of the father, or on June 16, 1859. Edward Wilcox was born March 11, 1858, an idiot, and is now 26 years of age.

After the death of his father he drew a pension as a minor child until he was 16 years of age, when, under the law, his pension ceased. He has lived with an uncle and aunt, who have done what they could for him, which at best was not much, as they themselves were very poor, being often helped, as the records of the town of Stonington, Conn., frequently show, by its authorities, in the matter of food and supplies. The uncle is now dead, and the poor unfortunate is left in the keeping of the aunt, who is poor in purse and feeble in health, and is scarcely able to maintain herself except by assistance above quoted.

Herewith is appended the sworn affidavit of Dr. E. Frank Coats, of Mystic Bridge, Conn., namely:

"That he has known Edward Wilcox, of Mystic Bridge, Conn., only son and child of Leonard Wilcox, since the time of his birth, March 11, 1858, and that he is now and always has been an idiot, incapable of taking care of himself, and is wholly dependent upon an aunt, who is feeble and dependent upon her own hands for support. His mother died of hemorrhage of the lungs in 1859, and his father died in the Army of the late war in the service of his country. I have been physician to the family ever since the birth of the said unfortunate child."

Inasmuch as Congress has power to grant the relief asked, and have in several like instances granted its aid to those who, like the beneficiary in this bill, are more helpless than a minor child, your committee are of opinion that the relief sought should be granted, and would therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill with an amendment striking out the words "twenty-five," in the eighth line, and substituting the word "eighteen" therefor; so it shall read, "a pension of $18 per month," &c.

The amendment reported by the committee is as follows:

In line 8, strike out the word "twenty-five" and insert "eighteen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment. After the word "conservator," in line 7, insert the words "for his use and benefit;" so that it will read: "and pay his legally appointed conservator, for his use and benefit, a pension," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CULBERTSON, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, two weeks ago House bill No. 4079, for the relief of James B. Kirk, was laid aside informally, as some of the gentlemen present may remember, and I desire to have it taken up and disposed of.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I will yield to him after we shall have gone through with the bills on the page on which we are now working, as I think it is the desire of the House to give all the members present an opportunity to call up such bills as they see fit.

WEALTHY H. SEAVEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6966) granting a pension to Wealthy H. Seavey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of Interior is authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll the name of Wealthy H. Seavey, of Erroll, N. H., as dependent foster-mother of Charles W. Seavey, late a private in Company I, Seventh Regiment Maine Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. RAY) was read, as follows:

That Charles W. Seavey, when an infant, was adopted by the claimant as her own child. She brought him up and he always resided with her till his enlistment as a private in Company I, Seventh Regiment Maine Volunteers, in 1861. Mrs. Seavey had the benefit of his earnings before his enlistment, and he frequently sent her money from his earnings after going to the war—at one time $5, at another $30, and at another $100. Mrs. Seavey was a widow when her adopted son enlisted, and is a widow now. The son died while in the service and in the line of duty. There is no question about her dependence upon the deceased for support. A pension was allowed her at the Pension Office, but was shortly afterward stopped, because the deceased was not her own son. The correspondence of the soldier with Mrs. Seavey during his Army service has been produced, and shows clearly that the deceased called the claimant his mother, and it is clear that he treated her as such from infancy to his death.

Mrs. Seavey now is an old lady, in feeble health, and entirely without means of support. The deceased left no near relatives who ever took any interest in him during his lifetime or since his decease. The only reason for disallowing the pension at the Pension Office was because the claimant was not his natural mother. Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH A. BURCHFIELD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7373) for the relief of Sarah A. Burchfield.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to adjudicate the pension claim of Sarah A. Burchfield, widow of Robert L. D. Burchfield, who was a lieutenant of Company D, Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry, as though he had been regularly mustered into the service of the United States at the time of his being wounded.

The report (by Mr. J. S. WISE) was read, as follows:

That Robert L. Burchfield was a second lieutenant in Company D, Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry, and was appointed as such on the 1st of January, 1865, and served to 8th August, 1865, as appears by act of Congress of March 13, 1872.

By the above act of Congress the said Burchfield was paid for services as such officer for the period above mentioned. But this private act failed to direct that his name should be placed on the rolls of said regiment as a second lieutenant, for which reason the Pension Office refuses to grant the relief asked by the widow of said Burchfield.

Not only does this act of Congress recognize the fact of his being such officer, but the proof from persons having actual knowledge shows that said R. L. D. Burchfield was a second lieutenant in Company D, Third Regiment of North Carolina Mounted Volunteers, and that he served faithfully as such soldier and officer.

That said Burchfield, while in line of his duty, was severely wounded by the enemy in Cherokee County, North Carolina, which rendered his left leg entirely useless, the ball taking effect in the left thigh, near the hip-joint, and passing through and coming out near the knee-joint, and unfitting the left leg for any kind of use.

The said Burchfield filed his application for pension in consequence of disability on the 3d day of January, 1873, which was rejected on 20th July, 1874, for the reason hereinbefore stated.

The said Burchfield was honorably discharged on the 8th day of August, 1865, at Knoxville, Tenn. The said Burchfield has since died, and Sarah A. Burchfield is his widow, now surviving.

Under the holding of the Pension Office the widow could not obtain a pension. The committee, being of opinion that her claim is meritorious and that she is entitled to prosecute her claim for a pension free from obstructions, do recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as a substitute for H. R. 1135.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM S. RAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7374) to restore William S. Ray to the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to restore William S. Ray, late a private in Company G, Third Regiment North Carolina Mounted Infantry, to the pension roll.

The report (by Mr. JOHN S. WISE) was read, as follows:

William S. Ray was duly enlisted as a private in Company G, Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry. He was placed on the pension-rolls on account of wounds received which totally disabled him, receiving at the time $18 per month. He was dropped from the rolls the 26th of May, 1877, on a report from G. H. Ragsdale, special agent from Pension Department, on a charge that he was not in the line of duty when wounded. The affidavits of comrades show that the soldier came through the lines from his regiment in Madison County, North Carolina, on the special duty of piloting recruits for the Federal service, which he often did, and was fired upon by rebel scouts while so employed, receiving his severe wound at the time. This testimony is corroborated by that of soldiers in the confederate army who were eye-witnesses to the whole affair.

The committee think that the testimony is sufficient to restore the soldier, and we recommend the passage of a substitute for the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make one or two observations in relation to this matter. It appears that in this case a special examiner was sent out, I suppose to the home of this soldier, to inquire into his title to a pension. That examiner must have had the witnesses before him and must have had an opportunity to examine them face to face. Obviously, therefore, he could better tell whether or not they were testifying truly than this House possibly can from mere ex parte affidavits—none of us having even seen any of the witnesses. This man was dropped from the rolls upon the report of that special agent. If that agent was a bad man, or if he was an incompetent man, this report fails to so state. Now the point I desire to make is this, that wherever there has been an examination by a special examiner of the Pension Office who has had the witnesses before him, he certainly has had at least a better opportunity of getting at the facts than any committee of this House, any dozen men in this House, or the whole House together, can possibly have upon mere ex parte affidavits.

One other remark I wish to make. There is a general law that has stood upon our statute-book for many years, which requires the Commissioner of Pensions in all cases where a pension claim has been rejected in his bureau, and where he deems the case a meritorious one in regard to which Congress should act, to report the facts to this House, together with the evidence upon record in the bureau, with his recommendation that Congress shall take action upon it. I do not wish to take up the time of the House with this matter, because I despair of preventing the passage of these measures except by filibustering—which I do not propose to do; but I wish to say that in my opinion a case that can not be made out before the Commissioner of Pensions or before the Pension Bureau upon ex parte affidavits is certainly a very poor case to come before Congress.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] if he can tell us whether this special examination was held under the new system, which gives the claimant the privilege of cross-examining the witnesses, or under the old system where the inquiry was wholly ex parte?

Mr. HEWITT. I do not know. I do not suppose that the report gives that information. I will say, however, that I approve of the new system, for I do not believe in sending out spies to make secret examination into these cases. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] whether this is one of the old cases?

Mr. MATSON. It is.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Well, the observations that I have been making upon this subject are general and are not meant to apply specially to this particular case; but I do say that this House ought to lay down the rule that it will not receive or consider a case coming from the Pension Bureau that has been investigated there and finally adjudicated, unless it is accompanied by a recommendation from the Commissioner of Pensions under the general law.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, the objections made by the gentleman from Alabama, in relation to this case, are not without force. However, as to the point that this case has been investigated by a special examiner of the Pension Office, I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the date of that examination. It appears from the report that the examination was made in May, 1877. At that time the practice of the Pension Office was to send out secret agents to examine into cases pending, or cases that had been adjudicated in the office, giving no notice whatever to the claimant, but examining the witnesses without his knowledge, taking the testimony of persons who were opposed to him, and giving him no opportunity to meet and cross-examine those witnesses. The examination in this case was probably of that kind, because that was the practice at the time it was made.

Then, as to the objection that pension bills ought not to be passed by this House unless in cases recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions, that is to be answered by the fact that if the Commissioner of Pensions and the clerks in the Pension Office are to be required to perform that additional labor, to examine not only into the legal features of each case, but also into its equitable merits, then the adjudication of claims in that office will necessarily be even slower than at present. I think the gentleman would hardly propose to put that additional labor on the Pension Office, because it would, of course, necessitate the employment of a large additional number of clerks.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will ask the gentleman whether there is not a number of cases that come before his committee with the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions under the general law?

Mr. MATSON. There are cases of that kind, and we have reported, I suppose, as many as twenty or thirty of them, or possibly more than that, during this Congress. I believe that all the cases that have been recommended by the Commissioner have been reported favorably by the committee. But the fact that some cases have been recommended in that way is no reason for assuming that they are the only meritorious ones. Those cases were recommended because it happened that the parties prosecuted them and followed them up and brought them to the special attention of the Commissioner, who therefore recommended them to Congress under the resolution of 1830.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would further ask the gentleman whether or not it is the duty of the examiners of the Pension Office, wherever they think a case has equitable merits, although it does not meet the requirements of the law, to call the attention of the Commissioner of Pensions to it?

Mr. MATSON. I do not remember the exact language of the resolution of 1830, but my impression is that it applies only to the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Of course it applies to the Commissioner of Pensions, but it is the Commissioner who passes upon all these cases. The clerks and other employés of the department are merely his agents.

Mr. MATSON. I am quite sure that the practice of the office is not such as to require the examiners to call the attention of the Commissioner to the fact that in their opinion Congress ought to intervene in particular cases, and I am quite sure also that those cases in which the Commissioner has made recommendations have been cases to which his attention was specially called.

Mr. WOLFORD. As I understand the report in this case, the Commissioner of Pensions rejected this claim because he held that conducting recruits to the Army was not in the line of this soldier's duty.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think the claim was rejected because the man was considered to have been a deserter.

Mr. MATSON. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] that the rejection by the Commissioner of Pensions, as I understand, was not upon the ground that conducting recruits was not a part of the soldier's duty; the Commissioner did not say that; but in rejecting the case he said it appeared from the evidence taken by this secret special detective that the man was not in the line of duty when wounded.

Mr. WOLFORD. Another question: Does not the report state that the proof shows the man was conducting recruits at the time he was wounded?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir; the report so states.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. But suppose he had no order to be conducting recruits; that he left his command and engaged in this service on his own responsibility, what do you say about that kind of a case? A man might much prefer to go out and bring in recruits than to be engaged in fighting battles.

Mr. MATSON. I think that if the soldier was engaged in that kind of occupation, whether he had the command of an officer to do so or not, he was serving his country in a military capacity, and if wounded while so engaged ought to be pensioned.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Though he had left his command without orders and without leave?

Mr. MATSON. I do not say that if he was absent without leave or was a deserter he would be entitled to a pension; but I do say that in the absence of any proof on that point, if at the time he was wounded he was engaged in his military service, which was for the benefit of his country, he ought to be pensioned.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If he had been regularly detailed by a proper officer having authority to detail him for that purpose and was performing that service under a lawful order, and was wounded while so engaged, he would be entitled to a pension, because he would have been in the line of duty.

Mr. MATSON. In that case he could get a pension through the Pension Office.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. But if he had left his command without orders and entered of his own choice upon this kind of service, and had been killed while so engaged, he would not have been killed in the line of duty; and neither his widow nor any one else who had been dependent on him would be entitled to a pension under the law.

Mr. MATSON. This soldier might not have been in the line of duty in the strict meaning of the term, and at the same time might not have been a deserter or absent without leave. He might have had the right to be absent from his command, might not have been a deserter in any sense of the word, and I repeat, if he was not a deserter, was not absent without leave, and was engaged in this business, I think he ought to be pensioned if he was wounded while in the performance of such service.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the objection raised by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] as to the ex parte statement in behalf of the petitioner, it is clearly shown by the report of the committee that the information upon which this soldier was dropped from the pension-roll was purely ex parte; so that in this respect the case is equally balanced. But, as shown in the report, disinterested parties, the soldier's comrades, men who were with him at the time, testify that he was in the line of duty.

The gentleman from Alabama makes a further objection that perchance the soldier engaged in this particular line of service without a command from some superior officer. This objection is also met by the affidavits of his comrades, who state that he was there in the line of duty; and as has been said by the chairman of the committee, whether he was or was not there by express command, he was doing a service to his country, which was then imperiled. He was discharging a duty for which every loyal citizen of the Government would commend him; and I think the mass of the American people will indorse the action of Congress in giving him a pension under circumstances of this kind.

Mr. WOLFORD. Only a few words in relation to this case, for I do not want to occupy the time of the House.

It occurs to me that if ever there was a case where a man was fairly, justly, and honestly entitled to a pension, this is such a case, if we can believe the facts as stated in the report. I am not talking about the man being entitled to a pension according to the rules and regulations made by the Pension Department under authority of law, but I am talking about his being entitled to a pension from the Congress of the United States on account of having been wounded in the service of his country.

Now, I want to call the particular attention of my friend from Alabama and of the House to a few facts in relation to this case as reported.

It is in proof according to the report that he was in the line of his duty. Not only that, but it is in proof he was in the line of his duty. How in the line of his duty? Why, sir, that he was conducting recruits. He was then in a country which was in possession of the enemy, and in order to conduct recruits to our Army he had a very dangerous and difficult task to perform. The man who stood in battle face to face with the enemy, on equal terms, with equal numbers, was not in the danger, nothing like the danger, and was not doing the same service to his country in the highest sense of a dangerous service as the man who undertook to conduct recruits through the enemy's country, through the enemy's lines into the lines of our Army.

I know something about it from experience and observation. I know something about the difficulty of such a service. Here is a man that the law presumes, every single principle of common sense presumes, did not undertake this difficult and dangerous service in order to evade his duty, but the presumption arises and ought to arise in this Congress, and will in the mind of my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT], and in the mind of everybody else who will pay attention to it—the presumption arises from the proof that he was ordered there. That is the legal presumption, the sensible presumption. And why? Because the proof according to the report is that he had previously been engaged in that very service of which no complaint was made. He was not arrested as a deserter when he brought, perhaps, many companies of recruits to our armies and did great service to it. If, then, the presumption is that he was previously engaged in doing that duty, would a deserter, would a man who had gone without authority, have selected this dangerous service; would he have repeated it without reprimand or arrest or punishment from his officers?

The legal presumption, the sensible presumption, the fair presumption for this Congress to make is that he was ordered there, or at least if not ordered, I will put it upon the ground where it is more credit and honor to him—if he was not ordered there he was permitted to go. His love of country, his desire to serve a cause which nobody could tell whether it would be triumphant or not, at a time when it was doubtful how the scale of war would turn, how the issue would eventuate; this man, from love of country, from the desire to get more men into our Army, that we might be stronger, that we might be more powerful, that we might preserve and maintain the nation in its glory and beauty, that we might be triumphant—this man, actuated by the highest motive of patriotism, by the greatest desire to see his country victorious, may have requested time and again that he should be allowed to go and get more men. If he did, it was commendable, and his pension ought to be passed that much sooner.

That is all, and the very worst phase which can be put upon it, that this man, who loved his country, desiring to go, and who did go, and did a great deal more good than he could have done as an individual standing alone in the ranks of battle. But I go further than that. I wish to say a word or two more. There are now thousands and tens of thousands of most worthy individuals, most loyal soldiers of our Army, who are debarred from receiving a pension. The rule in the Pension Department, the law, may not give them ample protection.

I go further and say, now that the war is over, that the effort to divide and make two governments in a territory where there was but one—and that was the real issue—when that is all over we ought to do justice to the men who stood so bravely by us. [Applause.] There are of those who were in the confederate army none now but Union men. Every soldier who fought against us in the war is now for perpetuating this Government. The Government should be kind and just to its soldiers. It ought to make the soldiers love it. If you wish to perpetuate the Government in its glory and beauty—and every man does; my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] does; every man on this floor does; if you wish to perpetuate it in its glory and beauty and power and dignity, so as to hand it down as long as time shall last; if you would hand it down in its integrity, in prosperity and in honor, you must encourage the idea that this great Government will be grateful to those patriotic soldiers who fought to maintain it in the hour when its existence was imperiled. [Applause.]

Indeed, I will vote to pension every soldier of every war who has an honorable discharge. I am for doing that out of the love of liberty and to make the soldiers grateful to the country. I would do it because they have loved their country. [Applause.] I am for pensioning every one who can bring a case as meritorious as the one now presented. In every case where a man did most dangerous duty which could be done in the army, as was the case with this man, I never would forgive myself, nor would my distinguished friend from Alabama, if I voted against it. [Applause.]

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

W. H. H. COLEMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6982) granting a pension to W. H. Coleman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed and authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of W. H. H. Coleman, late a private of Company B, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. PATTON) is as follows:

The committee find by the report of the Adjutant-General that H. Coleman, a private of Company B, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Reserves, was enrolled on the 10th day of June, 1861; three years at Camp Wright, and reported to February 28, 1862; present up to June 30, 1863, to August 31, 1863; absent sick in general hospital since August 10, 1863; transferred to Company B October 31, 1863; absent sick February 29, 1864, to April 30, then present; mustered out with company June 30, 1864, as William H. H. Coleman.

Surgeon-General's Office reports W. Coleman, Eleventh Pennsylvania Reserves, was sent from regimental hospital to Alexandria March 29, 1862—date of admission—and returned to duty May 26, 1862.

Examining Surgeon J. M. Torrence certifies May 31, 1882:

"William H. H. Coleman is one-fourth incapacitated from obtaining his subsistence by manual labor. Claimant's disability, so far as I can judge at present, is due to the so-called muscular rheumatism; symptomatic features, tongue slightly furred; some stiffness in motion."

Examining surgeon board at Kittanning, Pa., in March 7, 1883, find—

"William H. H. Coleman's disability was possibly incurred in the service as he claimed, and he is entitled to one-eighth total rating. Also find the affidavit of Dr. Thomas St. Clair, who says, "I have known William H. H. Coleman before his enlistment and since childhood; was the family physician of his father, and believe him to have been sound when he entered the Army."

Also the affidavits of Henry Miller and Frank Hamers that—

"They were well acquainted with William H. H. Coleman, and have known him since the year 1860; that they knew at the time said claimant enlisted in the Army in the year 1861 he was a sound, able-bodied young man, and have known him since his discharge in the year 1864, and that he has been suffering with rheumatism, and they have often visited said Coleman at his residence and found him confined to his bed with rheumatism, and that he has been afflicted with said disease during all the time since he came home until the present time, and have often seen him so badly crippled with said disease as to be unable to move around."

And the sworn statement of D. H. Lucas, similar to that of the above affiants, Miller and Hamers.

Also comrades J. T. Gibson and G. A. McLain testify that—

"William H. H. Coleman was left in camp, can not remember date, but was in the fall of 1863 or spring of 1864, and affiants knew that at the time said Coleman was left in camp he was suffering with rheumatism, and affiant G. A. McLain saith that Coleman at the time he enlisted in the Army was a sound, able-bodied man and free from rheumatism. Also affiants further say that said Coleman was detailed from the company into the commissary department, and that John F. McClain, the regimental postmaster, and Joseph Hoffman, who acted as butcher for commissary department, messed and tented with said Coleman; that they are both dead."

The committee also find twelve letters from prominent citizens of Indiana, Pa., the home of William H. H. Coleman, recommending him for a pension, which letters we would add to this report.

The committee are of the opinion, after considering all the facts in the case, that the claimant is entitled to a pension, and they therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that bill. The form of the bill, it will be observed, is as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed and authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of W. H. H. Coleman, late a private of Company B, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

I move to strike out all after the word "corps," in line 6, and add the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELLEN EDMISTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4605) granting a pension to Ellen Edmiston.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ellen Edmiston, widow of Elias Edmiston, late of Company —, —— Regiment Volunteers.

The committee recommend the following amendment:

Fill the blank in line 7 by the words "A, Fifty-fifth;" so that it will read: "Company A, Fifty-fifth Regiment Volunteers."

The report (by Mr. PATTON) is as follows:

That claimant is the widow of Elias Edmiston, who enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company A, Fifty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, November 30, 1863, and was honorably discharged June 19, 1865.

The soldier was pensioned in his lifetime at $14 per month, for gunshot wound of both thighs, left shoulder, and head, and died March 4, 1875.

The application of the widow was rejected on the ground that the death of the soldier was not due to his military service.

It is shown by both medical and lay testimony that the soldier was a constant sufferer from his wounds, and that for a short time before his death his mind was affected by the wound of his head. He wandered from his home on the night of the 3d of March, 1875, and on the following day was found dead in the woods. It is shown by the report of the inquest held upon his dead body that he came to his death "by exposure and cold."

Your committee are of the opinion that the death of the soldier was due to wounds he received in defense of his country, and that his widow should receive a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, amended, however, by inserting after the word "Company," in line 7 of said bill, the words "A, Fifty-fifth."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask as to what, in the opinion of the medical board who examined this case, is the ground for granting a pension?

Mr. PATTON. I do not remember distinctly without again looking over the papers, but the facts are stated in the report. He lost his mind for some cause, supposed on account of his wounds, and while wandering in the woods died, and was found dead the next morning. He was shot three times.

The amendment proposed by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I move a further amendment: to insert in line 7, after the word "regiment," the word "Pennsylvania."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA WARR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2646) granting a pension to Eliza Warr, widow of Isaac Warr, late of Company F, One hundred and fourteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Eliza Warr, widow of Isaac Warr, late of Company F, of the One hundred and fourteenth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, on the pension-roll, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $8 a month from the date of the death of her husband, November 14, 1879, to continue during life, or until she should again marry.

The committee recommend the following amendment:

Strike out in lines 7, 8, 9, and 10 the words "and to pay her a pension at the rate of $8 a month from the date of the death of her husband, November 14, 1879, to continue during life, or until she should again marry," and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The report (by Mr. PATTON) is as follows:

The committee report that it appears from the claim for pension and evidence filed in the Pension Office in the case of Eliza Warr, widow of Isaac Warr, late private of Company F, One hundred and fourteenth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, that said soldier enlisted in said service as a private August 21, 1862, and served (when not under treatment for disabilities) until July 1, 1865, when he was honorably discharged; that while in said service and line of duty in action he was wounded at Petersburg, Va., April 2, 1865, and that also from exposure in like line of duty he contracted a severe cold, which resulted in disease of lungs, of which he died November 14, 1879; that soon after his death the widow made her claim for pension, and based her claim upon the belief that her husband's death resulted solely from his wound by depletion of the system, and the evidence of the doctors who attended him tended at first to that conclusion, but by the evidence afterward that the soldier also contracted a cold, which caused affection of the lungs, in said service; that his family doctor testified lastly more specifically as to his disease of the lungs from the time of his arrival home at the time of his discharge, showing that the consumption of which he died, although it did not originate from his wound, did result from his lung disease, which originated from cold contracted in said service. At the first the claimant had no regular attorney, and believing that she was entitled to a pension on account of her husband's wound alone (which was, it appears, a bad one), she at first omitted to state anything about her husband's disease of lungs, which she subsequently did.

The evidence filed in the case in support of the fact that consumption of the lungs, which was the immediate cause of the soldier's death, originated in the service named, is to the following effect:

Samuel Dentel and John Butcher testify that they knew the soldier from 1847; that they saw him a few weeks or a few months after his discharge and return from the Army in 1865, and he was then thin in flesh and much changed in appearance from what he was when he enlisted in August, 1862; that he had a cough and was never free from it afterward, and got worse from year to year, and died of consumption, the result of his army life; that he was sound when he enlisted, and came home broken down, and was never well afterward and not able to do laborious work; that he was also wounded and suffered from that as well as from his disease of lungs. He was energetic and never complained, and worked and attended to business when he was not able; that they lived near neighbors to him both before and after the war, and witness Butcher helped him at his work sometimes, which was that of a florist, he not being able to do it.

John I. Shuster and William France testify that they were in his company in the Army, the first named as sergeant of the company, and the last named as private, and that about the middle of December, 1864, near Petersburg, Va., from exposure in cold weather without shelter, the said soldier contracted a cold, which troubled him while in the service afterwards; that the enemy, under Wade Hampton, made a raid on the cattle of the Union Army, and the One hundred and fourteenth Regiment, to which the soldier and witnesses belonged, was sent out after the enemy, and were out all night, and spent part of the night in a temporary fort, which they called that night "Fort Freeze to Death;" that the weather was cold and they were without shelter, and the said Isaac Warr caught cold, from which he never recovered; that he was a kind of man who would not give up, and kept on duty afterward until he was sent away wounded; that up to the time he contracted his sickness he was a strong man and free from cold or cough; that witness, France, saw him several times after the war and he was still troubled with cough, and grew worse from year to year.

Peter Devereux testified that he knew the soldier from 1855, and saw him often before he enlisted in 1862, and after his discharge in 1865, and that before his enlistment he was a strong, healthy, vigorous man, and had been a soldier in the Mexican war; that the witness saw him a few weeks after his discharge from the Army in the summer of 1865, and then formed the opinion that a strong, vigorous man had been broken down by army life. Witness saw him often each year afterward, and he gradually wasted away until he died; that he had a cough after his return from the Army which resulted in consumption, of which he died.

A. W. Given testifies that he was first lieutenant and brevet captain of the soldier's company, and remembers him being off duty on account of sickness about the first of 1865. Witness could not remember the exact time nor the nature of his sickness, but is almost certain it was from cold contracted from exposure in line of duty; that he had a cough after, about December, 1864; that he was a man who would not give up, and kept on duty when not able, and after December, 1864, he got thin in flesh and had a hectic flush on his face.

Dr. James M. Leedom testifies (after the claimant better understood her rights, and based her claim on her husband's disease as well as his wound) that he attended the soldier from about August, 1865, after his return from the Army, to the fall of 1870f or disease of lungs; that when he first called to attend him in August, 1865, he was confined to his bed and had a cough and incipient phthisis, and also suffered from a wound in his left hip, which was suppurating very much, and so continued for about six months; that the witness attended him more or less every year for his lung trouble, and he had the cough during the whole time, and toward the last of said treatment his expectoration was of that nature peculiar to phthisis, and he had tubercles in the lungs when he first attended him after his discharge; that the witness has no doubt and believed that his lung disease was caused by exposure incurred in the Army, and that his wound contributed to said disease from the drain on his system; that witness knew him for three years before he enlisted and was his family physician and never had occasion to attend him then. He was then in sound health and free from lung disease.

Dr. Jacob H. Wehner testifies that he attended him from October 16, 1878, till November 14, 1879, the date of his death, for phthisis pulmonalis (consumption), and the disease was in the third or last stage; that he believes exposure while he was in the Army was the exciting cause; that he also had a wound on his left hip which had left a large cicatrice, and that the drain on his system from the wound might have contributed, and probably did contribute, to his disease.

The claim was rejected by the Pension Office before the widow filed the additional evidence as to the origin of the soldier's lung disease in the military service from cold and exposure, and notwithstanding the nature of the evidence as herein reported the Pension Office refused, under their strict ruling, to reopen or reconsider the case.

The conclusion arrived at in this case by the committee from the evidence recited is that the soldier was a remarkably strong, healthy man before and at the time he entered the service; that while in the service he contracted a severe cold, which resulted in disease of the lungs; that he was also badly wounded in one of his hips, and that from these disabilities his death resulted. We therefore report the bill favorably, and recommend its passage, amended, however, by striking out all after the words "pension-roll," in line 7 of said bill, and insert in lieu thereof "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JESSE C. BUCK.

The next business on the Private Calander was the bill (H. R. 5146) granting a pension to Jesse C. Buck.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jesse C. Buck, late a private in the Third Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery (One hundred and fifty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers), at the rate of $8 per month.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out in lines 8 and 9 the words "at the rate of $8 a month."

The report (by Mr. PATTON) is as follows:

Jesse C. Buck enlisted as a private in the One hundred and fifty-second Regiment (Third Artillery) Pennsylvania Volunteers, February 29, 1864, and was honorably discharged July 5, 1865, and filed his declaration for pension November 27, 1868.

That in July, 1864, while stationed at Fortress Monroe, Va., as an unassigned recruit, he was injured by a blow on his left leg from the toe of his comrade's boot while marching at a double-quick; that the rest of the company passed over him and he was severely injured. The fact is fully established by four of his comrades, who also testified to his being sound before his enlistment and free from all lameness; also to the fact of his being lame and entirely disabled since the time of his injury.

The medical testimony is to the same effect. The doctors show that the injured limb is shorter and smaller than the other; that the injury to the tendon of the muscle has caused atrophy of the said lower left leg, severe pain, and a permanent lameness. He must use a crutch and cane in order to move.

Against all this is the certificate of the examining surgeons, who say:

"The man is now in good general health, with the exception of extreme obesity—three hundred and sixteen pounds—now really a disease, which he claims is a sequence of his enforced inactivity. That this statement and conclusions are not true and legitimate we are not prepared to assert. He claims his army weight was one hundred and sixty pounds."

They find all the signs of an injury claimed by the soldier; find him wholly unfitted for manual labor, and rate him at three-fourths. The committee find that he has properly and satisfactorily accounted for his inability to furnish any other kind of proof of his injury; that the proof by his comrades and physicians must be accepted as fully establishing his claim. The committee agree that he should be allowed a pension, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill with the following amendment: Strike out, in lines 8 and 9, the words "at the rate of $8 per month."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask my friend from Pennsylvania who makes this report if there has been any application to the Pension Bureau in this case?

Mr. STORM. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. On what ground was it rejected?

Mr. STORM. On the ground that he had not sufficiently proven, or had not proven to the satisfaction of the office, the fact that the injury was received in the service. We show here by the testimony of four of his comrades, men who were with him at the time that the injury was received, as set forth in the report, the facts in connection with his disability.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. How is that stated in the report? I did not catch the reading.

Mr. STORM. The fact as set forth in the report is as follows:

The fact is fully established by four of his comrades, who also testified to his being sound before his enlistment and free from all lameness; also to the fact of his being lame and entirely disabled since the time of his injury.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I want to know the manner in which he was lamed originally.

Mr. STORM. That is also set forth in the report:

That in July, 1864, while stationed at Fortress Monroe, Va., as an unassigned recruit, he was injured by a blow on his left leg from the toe of his comrade's boot while marching at a double-quick; that the rest of the company passed over him, and he was severely injured.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. He now weighs about 300 pounds, I believe.

Mr. STORM. Three hundred and sixteen; but that ought not to weigh against him now. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think he had better have a pension.

The amendment reported from the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM PAUGH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5581) granting a pension to William Paugh.

Mr. STORM. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally without prejudice.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

AMOS STROH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5387) granting a pension to Amos Stroh.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Amos Stroh, late lieutenant-colonel of the Eighty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, on account of disease contracted in the military service of the United States, while captain of Company G, in said regiment, at the rate of $15 per month from the 1st day of August, 1863.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out, in lines 8 and 9, the words "at the rate of $15 per month from the 1st day of August, 1863," and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The report (by Mr. PATTON) is as follows:

That Amos Stroh was mustered into the service of the United States on the 16th day of September, 1861, as captain of Company G, Eighty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, for three years, and was promoted to lieutenant-colonel of same regiment April 17, 1863. He claims that while in the military service of the United States and in the line of his duty he contracted a disease of the kidneys, from which he is now totally disabled.

This claim was originally filed ——, and was rejected upon a final hearing on the 11th day of December, 1879, on the ground that claimant was not disabled by disease of kidneys before or since his resignation from the Army. Additional evidence was filed, and the case reopened. On October 2, 1882, the claim was again rejected on the ground that the additional evidence filed did not change the status of the case. It is in evidence that claimant was in perfect health when he entered the service, and that he took sick on or about the close of the seven days' fight, in July, 1862, on the Peninsula, Virginia, and that in view of said sickness he was sent home on recruiting service; that after his arrival home he was confined to his room for over two weeks, and that during his stay home, a period of three months, he was treated for disease of the kidneys by Dr. A. C. Smith, his family physician; that, though only partially restored to health, at the expiration of said period he returned to his command, and, as shown, was as soon after promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel of the regiment. In this capacity he served until the day of his resignation; and though it is not shown that he resigned on account of sickness, it is shown that his kidney trouble had not left him. The medical testimony of Drs. Bowman, R. B. Kirby, A. C. Smith, R. Leonard, De Young, B. S. Erwin, and J. G. Zern, who have treated him from time of discharge to the present time, clearly and fully establishes the fact that he was treated for kidney disease, and no other.

Since the rejection of the claim by the Commissioner of Pensions the certificate of six physicians of Carbon County, Pennsylvania, where Colonel Stroh resides, setting forth his soundness before going into the Army, and his impaired physical condition after his return from the Army, and at the present time. They all unite in saying that he has chronic affection of the kidneys and bladder; some of these physicians knew him personally before he went into the Army.

Also a certificate of seven of his fellow-laborers (the applicant being an iron-molder), setting forth the physical condition of the soldier before and since his military service, and his inability now to pursue manual labor as a means of securing a livelihood.

Also a statement signed by twenty-eight of the officers and privates of the said Eighty-first Regiment, showing that claimant was a sound man when he entered the service, and that he became disabled in the line of his duty while on the Peninsula in 1862, from disease, which the regimental surgeon, Dr. Gardner, pronounced kidney trouble, caused by exposure, and on this account was off of duty for about four weeks, and was afterward sent home on recruiting service in order to allow him an opportunity to regain his health. That he has suffered from the same disease since his return; that he is now sixty-three years old, and is unable to earn a livelihood by manual labor, and that a pension be allowed him. Taking all the evidence, both before and after rejection of this claim, and it makes a very strong case, and on its showing the soldier is clearly entitled to relief.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as amended, by striking out in line 8 all of said line after the word "regiment," and strike out lines 9 and 10. And add to the bill "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE TAPP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6018) increasing the pension of George Tapp.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the pension of George Tapp, late a lieutenant of Company B, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, now on the pension-roll of the United States as certificate numbered 72534, to be increased, and to pay him a pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be in force from its passage.

The committee recommended the striking out of the word "fifty," in line 9, and the insertion of "forty-five."

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that, for manifest reasons, the reading of the report be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The report (by Mr. PATTON) is as follows:

From the papers presented to your committee we find the petitioner, George Tapp, served honorably in Company B, Eleventh Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers, from December 11, 1861, to November 21, 1863, and subsequently in the Veteran Reserve Corps.

In the first-named service he received three gunshot wounds, viz: August 28, 1862, a bullet entered his left arm just above the elbow-joint, and he is now, as a result of this wound, unable to extend this arm, but carries it in a horizontal position. On the same date his right forearm was pierced by a bullet, which cut into the bone and caused sloughing off of an artery, leaving this arm useless where weight is concerned.

At Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863, a bullet cut the cord of right testicle in such manner that amputation of the testicle resulted; the same ball continued through the adductor muscles of the thigh. The wounds enumerated have steadily grown worse since they were received, and his left arm is practically useless, as also is his left leg for locomotion, being but a partial prop when placed in position, and it is dragged by a serpentine or semi-circular movement when the claimant tries to move over short distances by aid of a cane in his partially disabled right arm. The loss of testicle has resulted in impotence, and, deserted by his wife, he has for years existed, by means of his pension, in a hut.

Your committee are of the opinion that such disabilities as this officer has received demand that a pension sufficient to relieve him from want or dependence upon others should be granted. We therefore report favorably upon his claim and recommend the passage of bill 6018, granting a pension of $45 per month to said George Tapp, amended by striking out of bill, in line 9, "fifty dollars" and insert "forty-five dollars."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if, from his own knowledge, this is a case where the pension ought to be increased?

Mr. MATSON. It is undoubtedly such a case. The testimony is conclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT PATTERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1759) granting a pension to Robert Patterson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Robert Patterson, late a private in Company F, Thirty-seventh Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1759) granting a pension to Robert Patterson, having had the same under consideration, hereby submit the following:

The claimant, Robert Patterson, enlisted and was mustered into the United States military service on the 19th day of April, 1864, as a private in Company F, Thirty-seventh Wisconsin Volunteers, and served until May 24, 1865, when he was honorably discharged.

He made application for a pension upon the 4th day of February, 1876, upon the ground that he was disabled on account of rheumatism and erysipelas contracted in said military service, which was rejected by the Pension Office upon the 8th day of September, 1877, upon the ground that there was "no record of alleged disability, and inability of the claimant to furnish medical evidence connecting the alleged disability with the military service."

The proof is clear that he was a sound and healthy man when he entered the service. The testimony is also satisfactory that he contracted the diseases alleged at White House Landing, in August, 1864, in the State of Virginia, and while in the line of duty. It is also fully established that he was suffering from the effects of those diseases when he was discharged from the service, and that he has continued to suffer therefrom ever since that until the present time. That his disability is the result of diseases contracted in the service seems to be fully established. Examining Surgeon F. V. Burroughs, of Mauston, Wis., testifies:

"In my opinion the said Robert Patterson is one-half incapacitated for obtaining his subsistence by manual labor from disability resulting from erysipelas and chronic rheumatism."

The foregoing findings and conclusions are supported by the testimony of six witnesses besides the examining surgeon. Your committee therefore report in favor of the passage of said bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LEWIS J. BLAIR.

Mr. LOWRY. I crave the indulgence of the committee to allow me to call up a short bill unanimously reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It is the bill (H. R. 7500) to restore the name of Lewis J. Blair to the pension-roll, and will be found on page 49 of the Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll the name of Lewis J. Blair, late lieutenant-colonel of the Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was reported with the following amendment:

In line 4 strike out the word "restore to" and insert in lieu thereof the words "reinstate on."

Mr. LOWRY. Perhaps it will be in the interest of expedition and will allow other gentlemen to come in if I am permitted briefly to state the facts in the case in place of having the report read. This is a bill to reinstate General Blair as lieutenant-colonel on the pension-roll he having heretofore been allowed a pension. His name was dropped in consequence of a special examination and a report of a special examiner, ex parte in its character, where no opportunity was afforded the pensioner of being heard. That report was to the effect that his wounds had not been contracted in the service. On a full examination of the case the committee find the facts to be quite otherwise. They state that the evidence is full and satisfactory as to the fact that the injuries were received in the service, and that they are fully satisfied his name should not have been dropped from the pension-roll. They recommend his restoration. The amendment proposed is simply a slight verbal alteration.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) in this case is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 372) to restore Lewis J. Blair to the pension-roll, having considered the evidence in the case, beg leave to report:

That claimant was mustered into the military service of the United States as captain of Company H, Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, August 29, 1862; was subsequently commissioned major and lieutenant-colonel, and was honorably discharged June 7, 1865.

July 14, 1870, he was granted a pension of $20 per month for injuries of left side and ankle, received at the battle of Missionary Ridge, November 25, 1863.

November 29, 1876, his name was dropped from the pension-roll by order of the Secretary of the Interior, on the report of a special examiner of the Pension Office, on the ground that the disability for which the soldier was pensioned was not due to his military service.

The committee have examined this case very carefully, and find from the evidence of the colonel commanding the regiment at the battle of Missionary Ridge, and other officers present at this engagement, that Lieutenant-Colonel Blair was injured in his left breast, arm, side, and leg, by a bursting shell, and by being struck on the ankle by a spent ball; that he was treated in hospital for these injuries. The assistant surgeon of the regiment certifies to treatment for these injuries at the battle. The continuance of the disability from these injuries is shown by the testimony of the physicians who have treated him since his discharge. He is also shown to have been free from any disability prior to and at the time of being mustered into the military service of the United States.

The pension was originally granted by Commissioner of Pensions Bentley, after a personal examination of the evidence on file.

Your committee find in the evidence on file in this case, as well as that taken by the special examiner of the Pension Office, no sufficient reason for the action of the Commissioner in dropping the name of this soldier from the pension-roll, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute bill.

MRS. ANN E. GRIDLEY.

Mr. WINANS, of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to call up out of its order the bill (H. R. 7617) granting a pension to Mrs. Ann E. Gridley.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Ann E. Gridley, a volunteer nurse in the late war, and pay her the sum of $25 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the report.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama [interrupting the reading]. I do not think it is necessary to read any more of the report. It may be printed in full in the RECORD. It presents only one question, whether or not we shall put nurses in the Army on the pension-roll. It is a new class.

Mr. BAGLEY. The gentleman will remember that we had several precedents of that kind last year.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Oh, yes.

The report (by Mr. WINANS, of Michigan) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred H. R. 7617, granting a pension to Mrs. Ann E. Gridley, report:

That said Mrs. Ann E. Gridley is a resident of Hillsdale, in the State of Michigan; that she commenced her work under the auspices of the Soldiers' Relief Association as a volunteer nurse in the spring of 1864, and was continuous in her patriotic services until the close of the war. She was not only an Army nurse but a disbursing agent of the association to aid the sick, wounded, and dying soldier, and provide special articles needed for his immediate relief.

The secretary of the association, Mr. T. Moses, says: "She was especially systematic and energetic in her methods, carefully examining her reports, as she came to me for funds and stores with which to prosecute her work."

And further: "I was personally cognizant of her work in the field and hospitals after the great battle of Cold Harbor. Perhaps her most important work was for the Andersonville prisoners as they languished in hospitals at Annapolis, after exchange. Her devotion to this most exacting and laborious duty nearly cost her her life. She contracted a fever from the contagion brought from Andersonville, from the effects of which she may never fully recover."

Dr. G. S. Palmer, late surgeon United States Volunteers, says: "She did most excellent work among the sick soldiers at Annapolis. She contracted a severe fever and came near losing her life while in hospital service."

Dr. Bliss, brevet colonel (late surgeon), United States Army, says of her:

"As a volunteer nurse during the late war she was an efficient and faithful worker in the field and hospital. Her services were directed by good judgment and accomplished great good to the sick and wounded soldier."

Dr. Radcliff says:

"She served with efficiency at the United States general hospital at Annapolis during 1864 and 1865, especially during a severe outbreak of hospital fever, where she came near sacrificing her own life."

Dr. Heden Densmore says:

"Mrs. A. E. Gridley worked untiringly for the soldiers in the capacity of nurse during the war without compensation. Her labor was given over a large portion of time in various places with a heroism I have seldom seen equaled."

Dr. J. E. Dexter says:

"I knew Mrs. A. E. Gridley both in field and hospital as a volunteer nurse in the late war; none were more devoted and faithful. She merits special consideration from the Government."

D. T. Pierce, a member of the Michigan Relief Association, says:

"I can of my own personal knowledge state that no one rendered more valuable service than Mrs. Ann E. Gridley. Her present impaired health is undoubtedly the result of continual labor in the field and hospital."

E. W. Barber, reading clerk for several Congresses, and late Assistant Postmaster-General, says:

"She gave her whole time to the nursing and care of sick and wounded soldiers. No person from Michigan was more faithful, earnest, and devoted. Besides her personal and unpaid service she gave two boys to the service of her country—one to the Navy and the other to the Army, the latter entering the service at the age of 15 years, and remaining during the entire war. If there is anything on earth or in the loyal North that deserves consideration from the hands of the agents of the Government, it is Mrs. Gridley. She needs it to keep the wolf away from her door."

Harry H. Smith, the present efficient journal clerk of the House, says:

"I made the acquaintance of Mrs. Gridley in 1864, while a private in the Twenty-sixth Regiment of Michigan Infantry, on detail in this city, while assisting Dr. Tunnercliff, then Michigan military agent, looking after sick and wounded Michigan soldiers. Mrs. Gridley was similarly engaged; but did not confine her labors solely to Michigan soldiers, but assisted all sick and wounded Union soldiers to the extent of her ability."

Considering the above testimony, and in view of the further fact that her services were gratuitous, and that she has never received any compensation and is now poor and in ill-health, we recommend the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAROLINE TRECKELL.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent to take up out of its order the bill S. 929.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 929) granting a pension to Caroline Treckell was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caroline Treckell, widow of Lieut. Greenbury Treckell, deceased, late of the Aubrey Cavalry Company, Kansas Militia.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to make a brief statement in connection with this bill as the report of the House committee has not been published.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is that bill on the Calendar?

Mr. PERKINS. It has passed the Senate, and was reported by the House committee this morning, but the report has not been printed.

Mr. MATSON. I understand that the bills reported this morning are now at the Printing Office as well as the reports accompanying them.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is in the hands of the Clerk.

Mr. PERKINS. I will make a brief statement. This is an old widow lady. I desire to say a word to explain why she has not obtained a pension through the Department. Her husband had undertaken to organize a company, and had been commissioned lieutenant of the company by the governor of Kansas. But he was killed by Quantrell's guerrilla organization before he was mustered into the United States service. For that reason the widow has not been able to obtain her pension through the Pension Bureau. There is no question as to the facts, and they are as I have stated.

The bill has passed the Senate, and has been unanimously reported by the committee to this House. This claimant is an old lady, now supported by the charity of her friends, and I ask that the bill pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. JENNIE E. JOHNSON.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 2002) for the relief of Mrs. Jennie E. Johnson be taken up.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Jennie E. Johnson, the mother of Capt. Charles P. Johnson, deceased, late a captain on the retired-list of the Army of the United States, as a pensioner at the rate of $25 per month.

The report (by Mr. HOLMES) was read, as follows:

That claimant is the mother of Charles P. Johnson, who enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company A, Seventeenth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, February 25, 1862, and was promoted successively first lieutenant and captain, and who was by special act of Congress approved February 21, 1868, retired as a captain, and died April 12, 1879, from the effect of wounds received at the battle of Big Black River.

The evidence in the case discloses the following facts:

He enlisted at Leon as a private in Company A, Seventeenth Volunteer Regiment of Iowa Infantry, and was mustered into United States service March 21, 1862, as first sergeant. Through natural efficiency and strict attention to duty he was promoted to the rank of second lieutenant September 4, 1862, and was commissioned as captain June 3, 1863, and was the only officer in the regular Army commissioned by special act of Congress.

In the same year, while leading his company in a charge at the Big Black River in the rear at Vicksburg, he was wounded by a minnie-ball passing horizontally from side to side through the body, between the rectum and the spinal column, tearing away a part of the former, fracturing a vertebræ of the latter, and injuring the spinal cord to such an extent as to paralyze the lower extremities. The hospital surgeon thought the case hopeless, but by request, and also thinking to perform the last kind act for a friend, the regimental surgeon came and dressed his wounds by drawing a silk handkerchief, one-half at a time, entirely through his body.

The next day he fell into the hands of the rebels and was transported in a cattle-car to Atlanta, where his mother, having heard of his condition, reached him some time afterward. He remained here until the occupation of the city by General Sherman, when he, with his mother, was sent to Saint Louis, Mo. The nature of his wounds finds no parallel in the medical records of either Europe or America. The only position he could assume was that of lying on his face, and for sixteen years he could not find relief from his sufferings in any other position. For years, upon eating tomatoes, blackberries, or any fruit having fine seeds, these would tear open his wounds afresh and the natural excrement of the body find three avenues of escape.

After the death of Captain Johnson his widow was granted a pension, which she continued to receive up to the time of her death.

The soldier left no children, and with the death of his widow there was no one left with a legal claim against the Government for pension.

It is shown by the evidence that the mother, who is the claimant in this case, nursed the soldier back to life; cared for and watched over him as only a mother could, and in her care and attention exhausted all her means in ministering to his wants. She is now old and infirm from the long years of constant watching over her soldier son, and is left without any means of support, and with no one to look to for support in her declining years. She is shown to be an estimable lady, and a pension is asked for her by Governor Sherman, governor of Iowa, and many other leading men of the State, and by all who are familiar with the long years of laborious devotion to and the great sacrifices of health and means made for her son, who by reason of his wounds received in battle for his country was more than a child again.

Your committee think this claim appeals with peculiar force to the equities of Congress, and confidently believe that a pension should be given claimant for the sacrifices she has made, not only of her health, but of the means that otherwise would have been ample for her maintenance in her old age, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, amended, however, by striking out all after the words "United States," in line 7 of said bill, and inserting the following: "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment reported by the committee was as follows:

In lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "as a pensioner at the rate of $25 per month" and insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

EMMA O. ZEIGLER.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4878) granting a pension to Mrs. Emma O. Zeigler. General Robinson, the author of the bill, is no longer upon this floor, and I ask that the bill be considered now.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emma O. Zeigler, widow of W. A. Zeigler, late captain of Company —, First Regiment West Virginia Infantry Veteran Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

That claimant is the widow of William A. Zeigler, who enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company B, First West Virginia Light Artillery Volunteers, August 5, 1861; was commissioned second lieutenant in Company I, Fifth Regiment West Virginia Volunteers, January 13, 1863; first lieutenant West Virginia Veteran Infantry Volunteers, September 5, 1864, and captain March 29, 1865, and was honorably discharged July 21, 1865.

September 20, 1869, soldier filed a declaration for pension, alleging that on or about August 5, 1864, near Middleburg, Md., while retreating from the enemy, and in command of Company I, Fifth West Virginia Volunteers, he received sunstroke.

April 20, 1876, the soldier died, pending the final adjudication of his claim. After the death of the soldier, Emma O. Zeigler, the widow, completed the claim, and was granted a pension up to the date of her husband's death. But her claim for pension as the widow of said soldier was rejected on the ground that the fatal disease of which the soldier died was not due to and was not a result of his military service.

Surgeon Hysell, of the Ninth Regiment West Virginia Volunteers, testifies, November 3, 1879:

"That he frequently prescribed for the soldier in the summer of 1864 for hemorrhoids, or piles, and chronic diarrhea, and as surgeon of the First West Virginia Volunteers he prescribed for the said officer on several different occasions during the winter of 1864 and 1865 for the same trouble, together with ulceration of the rectum; that after both officers were discharged from its service in 1865 they settled about ten miles apart, affiant at Wyandotte, W. Va., and the officer at Catlettsburg, Ky.; and that he frequently saw and prescribed for the said Zeigler during the following winter and the summer of 1866 for what he called his old trouble, and the officer appeared to be suffering with the same disease for which he had treated him while in the service."

A. Robb, M. D., testifies, May 27, 1876:

"That he attended soldier in his last illness; had been his family physician for three years; he died April 20, 1876, of what he supposed was hemorrhoids, or piles, but shown by post mortem examination to be cancer of rectum, involving lower part of spinal cord, sciatic nerve of left side and the bladder; that he treated soldier March 17, 1876, for what he considered piles; soldier died April 20, 1876; a post mortem examination made eight hours after death showed the disease to be of a cancerous nature."

Captain Ewing swears to an intimate acquaintance with the soldier from 1856 to 1870; they occupied the same room as an office from 1865 to 1870, and knows soldier was frequently complaining of piles and under treatment for the same by Dr. Pugh, who was a physician boarding in the soldier's father's family; affiant filed soldier's application for pension and did not allege piles because DR. Pugh was dead and they could not prove medical treatment.

Alcinous Carnahan swears he was ward-master in the regimental hospital of the Fifth West Virginia Volunteers, and had a personal knowledge of the fact that Lieutenant Zeigler was afflicted while in the service with piles, and that from 1865 to 1870 soldier complained of piles.

Colonel Enochs, of soldier's regiment, swears that soldier was treated for piles in 1864, during the summer campaign in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, and from that time on to the date of his discharge in 1865.

James C. Ely testifies that he is a druggist in the town of Catlettsburg, Ky., and sold medicines to the soldier frequently during the year 1865, and on to 1870, which he desired for piles.

This case was investigated by a special examiner of the Pension Office in 1882, and the testimony thus taken is very voluminous and conflicting. In submitting the evidence in the case the special examiner says:

"I also believe that William A. Zeigler contracted piles in service, and that they continued to slightly affect him up to death."

It is shown by the evidence that the widow has not remarried, and that the soldier abandoned her a few years before his death, being at the time in fear of arrest for having used money belonging to an insurance company. The soldier located at Blanchester, Ohio, where he assumed the name of Avery, and July 19, 1871, was married to Miss Alice Jerrall, with whom he lived until the date of his death, April 20, 1876; and that ten children were the result of this marriage. During the time he was living with this woman at Blanchester, Ohio, he kept up a correspondence with and sent small sums of money to his lawful wife at the town of Catlettsburg, Ky., in which he impressed her he could not return home by reason of his liability to arrest for the use of money belonging to the insurance company as aforesaid. It is shown conclusively that no divorce proceedings were ever had by the soldier or claimant, and the legal marriage of claimant is fully established. Your committee find from the evidence in the case that the soldier's death was due to the disability contracted in the military service, and that his legal widow, which is the claimant in this case, is entitled to a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House. I wish to state the reason why I make that request. When the bill was up before General Gibson made some objection to it, but he came to me last Friday night, after the committee had risen and we had gone into the House, and stated that he had investigated the matter, and that after that investigation instead of having any objection to the bill he wished to have it pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH DAVIS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 457) granting a pension to Elizabeth Davis.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Davis, widow of Hannibal B. Davis, late captain of Company K, Fourth Regiment Missouri State Militia, to date from the death of said Hannibal B. Davis.

The report (by Mr. HOLMES) was read, as follows:

The claimant, Elizabeth Davis, is the widow of Capt. Hannibal B. Davis, late a captain of Company K, Fourth Regiment of Missouri State Militia. This bill was favorably reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the Forty-seventh Congress. As the report referred to is a very fair résumé of the points in the case, your committee herewith incorporate the same into their report, namely:

[House report No. 593, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the (bill H. R. 315) granting a pension to Elizabeth Davis, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

We find from the papers on file in the original case at the Pension Office, and those presented to your committee, that the petitioner is the widow of Hannibal B. Davis, who was a captain of Company K, Fourth Regiment Cavalry, Missouri State Militia; that he was mustered September 10, 1862, and resigned April 8, 1864. He was killed by a band of guerrillas at Tipton, Mo., September 1, 1864, a few months after his resignation from the service. The evidence shows that Captain Davis had made himself particularly obnoxious to the guerrilla forces in the State of Missouri during his service as captain of the Fourth Cavalry, and threats had been made repeatedly that when opportunity occurred he should be killed.

Having resigned from the service and located at Tipton, he was pursuing his avocation when notice was given of an impending raid by guerrillas upon the town. A force of home-guards was quickly organized and placed in charge of the captain, who did valiant service in repelling the invasion of the guerrilla band, but was unsuccessful in staying its progress. He, with others, was captured, and as soon as he was identified was placed in close custody, his comrades being released. He was carried across the county line into Cooper County, Missouri, where he was shot and killed. This case was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the officer was not in the service of the United States and in line of duty at the time of his death.

Your committee understand that under the law this widow is not pensionable, but there are equities of the case deserving of attention and recognition by Congress. The deceased officer for two years had been a gallant soldier in the service of the Government, and in that service had incurred the displeasure of the many bands of the enemy which were prowling through the State of Missouri at the time. The homes of himself and other Union men were threatened with attack on account of the action he had taken in the past, and hastily donning his former uniform he led his neighbors to repel the incursion of the enemy in defense of his home, and on account of his former service to the United States he was killed, and his services were forever lost to his wife. She claims, and your committee is of the opinion justly and equitably, the recognition of his services by the Government in the payment to her of a pension, the same as if he had been regularly upon the muster-rolls of the United States Army. An act granting him a pension passed the House in February, 1881, but failed to be reached in the Senate,

Your committee recommend that the bill be passed.

Your committee indorse all the statements of the foregoing report as fully borne out by the record proofs, and therefore recommend that the pending bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH M. BISSELL.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 6940) granting a pension to Sarah M. Bissell.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah M. Bissell, widow of Commodore Simon B. Bissell, late of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama) was read, as follows:

The committee have given Mrs. Bissell's case thoughtful consideration, and are convinced that no more deserving claim has come before Congress. Mrs. Bissell is the widow of the late Commodore Simon B. Bissell, who gallantly and faithfully served his country through a long and honorable career in the Navy, and now in utter helplessness she appeals for a pension barely sufficient to keep her from actual want. And in this connection the committee calls attention to the following letter from that gallant patriot Admiral David D. Porter; it tells its own eloquent story. The committee makes the said letter a part of this report:

OFFICE OF THE ADMIRAL, Washington, D. C., June 19, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: Please accept my warmest thanks for your kind and encouraging letter regarding the pension of Mrs. Bissell.

I regret very much to hear that there is not a prospect of getting a bill through for the relief of Mrs. Bissell during the present session. The distress of this interesting family is the most dreadful that has come to my knowledge for many years.

It can scarcely be conceived that a person once holding Mrs. Bissell's position as the wife of a commodore in the Navy could be reduced to such poverty. Mrs. Bissell and her daughter have not a cent in the world. They have been obliged to sell every little article of value to purchase food. Fortunately they have a small house of their own in which they can hide their grief and their poverty.

I never knew until day before yesterday their actual destitute condition, and I yesterday sent them the first square meal they have had for two weeks.

Commodore Bissell, when he was retired, took his family abroad to a cheap place, where he was enabled to lay up a little from year to year. He put the money in the hands of a relative of his wife's to invest for her. After the commodore's death his family returned to America to find that all their savings which they had sent home had been made way with, and that absolute poverty stared them in the face. Their own relatives are unwilling to help them by the loan of even a dollar.

How they will get along God only knows, unless they can get this pension.

It is not right that the family of an officer who so faithfully performed his duty as did Commodore Bissell should be suffering such extreme poverty from no fault of their own.

I hope you will excuse me for troubling you with this long story; but as you have interested yourself in the matter, and it comes under your cognizance, I thought it my duty to state to you the exact condition of this family. If anything could be done for them this session, it would be an act of mercy.

I am sure you have sympathy enough for this case to excuse my intrusion on your time, and I am glad to know that you consider the claim of Mrs. Bissell a just one.

I am about the only one who interests himself in the cases of the wives of old officers left by the death of their husbands in distress. I do so because I know their merits and demerits, and must be the last one to recommend any person for a pension who did not actually deserve it. These good people, Mrs. Bissell and her daughter, deserve more than ordinary consideration. Thanking you for your courtesy in finding time to write and give me such encouraging news for the future,

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully and truly yours,

Hon. G. W. HEWITT, M. C.,
Chairman Committee on Pensions,
United States House of Representatives.

The committee earnestly recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

HECTOR W. SUMMERS.

Mr. HALSELL. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7501) granting a pension to Hector W. Summers.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Hector W. Summers, of Bucksville, Logan County, Ky., late a private in the Twenty-sixth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

That claimant enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in the Twenty-sixth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers the latter part of December, 1861, at Calhoun, McLean County, Kentucky. He was regularly enrolled and was paid one month's pay by John MacMorton, and was furnished a uniform and arms and assigned to duty. Colonel Burbridge was in charge of the camp of rendezvous, and Major Davidson of the Twenty-sixth Kentucky Regiment. In a few days after being enrolled he was detailed for recruiting service and ordered to Bouyer's Ferry, on Green River. While on duty at this place he was captured by a party of confederate soldiers, under command of John M. Porter, late Commonwealth's attorney for the third judicial district of Kentucky, and now deceased. He was taken to Bowling Green, Ky., and confined for about six weeks, when, on the evacuation of that place by the confederates, he was removed to Salisbury, N. C., where he was confined in prison for more than six months, at the expiration of which time he was paroled and sent home, and reported to Colonel Maxwell, then in command of the Twenty-sixth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers. On reporting to the colonel of his regiment for duty he was told by that officer to go home, as he could not live in camp; to live at home if he could.

It is shown that the soldier was suffering from chronic diarrhea at the time of his release from confinement in the confederate prison, and from heart disease, with which disabilities he has continued to suffer ever since; that he is now an old man, being 67 years of age, and broken down in health, as a result of his confinement in rebel prisons.

The fact of his military service is clearly established, as well as that of his capture in the line of duty; the latter being shown by the testimony of John M. Porter, commanding the confederate forces who captured him.

His application was rejected by the Pension Office solely on the ground of his not being mustered into the military service.

Your committee find from the evidence that the soldier was regularly enrolled and assigned to duty, and that he was detailed as a recruiting officer and was on duty as such at the time of being captured, and that his long confinement in confederate prisons was the cause of the permanent disability from which he is now suffering, and that he should be pensioned by the Government in whose service he lost his health, and therefore report a bill to place him on the pension-roll, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

RACHEL SMITH.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5813) granting a pension to Rachel Smith.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Rachel Smith, dependent mother of Andrew M. Smith, late a private in Company E, Twenty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LE FEVRE) was read, as follows:

Mrs. Rachel Smith, as appears from the papers accompanying said bill, was the dependent mother of Andrew M. Smith, who enlisted in Company E, Twenty-sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the 19th day of June, 1861, and served until July 25, 1865, when he was honorably discharged from the service; that during the entire term of his said service he was the sole and only support of his mother, said Rachel Smith, as he had been before he enlisted in the service; that after his discharge from the service he continued to support his mother until he was intermarried with Miss Mary E. Work, when she became an inmate of his family, and so continued until his death; that on the 8th day of February, 1873, a pension at the rate of $4 per month, beginning from the 9th day of December, 1872, was granted to said Andrew M. Smith by the Commissioner of Pensions, Hon. J. H. Baker; that on the 9th day of February, 1872, said pension was increased to $24 per month upon the order of said Commissioner of Pensions; that on the 5th day of May, 1876, said Andrew M. Smith died; that thereupon his widow, Mary E. Smith, applied for a widow's pension, which was granted to her from and after the death of her said husband, which pension she divided with the said Andrew M. Smith's mother, said Rachel Smith; that on the 17th day of July, 1880, the widow of said Andrew M. Smith, Mary E. Smith, remarried, in consequence whereof said pension lapsed. Therefore, the said dependent mother, Rachel Smith, prays that she may be granted a pension as said dependent mother.

Your committee, in view of the above-recited facts, as shown by the papers, recommend the passage of said bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA SLUSS.

Mr. WOLFORD. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3605) granting a pension to Eliza Sluss.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Eliza Sluss, widow of John M. Sluss, late captain of Company A, Third Indiana Volunteers (serving in the war with Mexico), subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. STOCKSLAGER) was read, as follows:

Eliza Sluss, the claimant, is the lawful widow of John M. Sluss, deceased, who was captain of Company A, Tnird Infantry Indiana Volunteers, in the war with Mexico, and who was pensioned for injuries received in the line of duty, said pension bearing date of August 14, 1849, at the rate of $13.33½ per month. That his pension was suspended in 1850, reinstated, and increased to $20 per month in 1855, and again suspended in 1864. The case was referred to Dr. Hood, medical referee of the Pension Office, in 1874, who went to the home of Captain Sluss, and made a personal examination of the case.

Dr. Hood, after a careful consideration of the evidence and an examination of the physical condition of Captain Sluss, says:

"I declare it to be most unqualifiedly my opinion that wrong was done to Captain Sluss when payment of his pension was suspended. I recommend resumption of payment at the rate paid at date of suspension, for injury to lower part of abdomen and results. I may be permitted to add that I entertain no doubt at all as to the perfect justice of this recommendation, something which I can not always say."

On this recommendation of the medical referee of the Pension Office, Hon. Columbus Delano, then Secretary of the Interior, says:

"In view of this opinion, I deem it my duty to direct the restoration of Captain Sluss's name to the pension-roll, and hereby authorize the same to be done. His pension will be resumed from the date of suspension in 1864, and at the rate formerly paid."

On this order from the Secretary of the Interior, Captain Sluss's name was again placed on the pension-roll, he being paid for the full time that he was unjustifiably deprived of his rights, and he continued to draw a pension of $20 per month until his death, February 25, 1879. The immediate cause of his death was (in the opinion of Dr. Maxwell, the attendant physician) acute bronchitis.

He says, however, that:

"I have no doubt but that the general debility resulting from the disease for which he was drawing a pension and that as well as debility from age were important factors in bringing about the fatal termination."

The claimant, Eliza Sluss, widow aforesaid, is now old and feeble and is in need, and we deem it but just and right that her name be placed on the pension-roll; therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HOLDEN COOK.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 7707) to pension Holden Cook. The report in this case is in the hands of the Printer; but if any gentleman desires I can state briefly the circumstances of the case.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Holden Cook, late a private in Company A, Thirty-first United States Infantry.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

JASPER J. HENRY.

Mr. PEEL. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 3074) granting a pension to Jasper J. Henry.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of Jasper J. Henry be placed on the pension-roll of invalid persons, on account of wounds received while acting as guide and pilot for the First Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers in the war of the rebellion, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET A. BERRY.

Mr. BAGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 5925) granting a pension to Margaret A. Berry.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret A. Berry, widow of William M. Berry, late a private in Company I, Tenth Indiana Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The claimant, Margaret A. Berry, is the lawful widow of William M. Berry, who enlisted as a private soldier in the Eighteenth Indiana Infantry in the year 1861, and afterward was promoted to a lieutenant, and resigned in 1864, returning to his home and family only to remain a short time (about sixty days), when he again enlisted, this time in Company I, Tenth Indiana Cavalry. His captain, James E. Mathers, testifies—

"That the said Berry was a man somewhat addicted to drink, but nevertheless was an excellent soldier and a man of fine business qualifications, and with kind treatment seemed to be very manageable. On account of superior business tact and qualifications, he was detailed by George R. Swallow, colonel commanding the regiment, as acting commissary sergeant of the regiment, the duties of which post he discharged with credit to himself and regiment while Colonel Swallow retained command."

Afterward Maj. Thomas G. Williamson had temporary command, and he reduced Berry to the ranks by a public order. The disgrace from this seemed to bear so heavily on the soldier's mind that he never seemed the same man afterward.

The evidence declares the fact that about 4 o'clock on the morning of the 25th of July, 1865, Berry was found dead about twenty feet from his tent with a gunshot wound through the head. The evidence also discloses the fact that for about ten days previous to this time Berry was insane, and the said wound was supposed to have been inflicted by his own hand.

Captain Mathers further testifies in the following language:

"While I believe that strong drink may have been one of the causes leading him to insanity, I at the same time believe that the mortification and disgrace felt on account of the public order referred to had much more to do with bringing on insanity than anything else."

The evidence shows that the said Berry was a sound man when he entered the service, and that he was a good soldier, and that he served faithfully for about four years. The claimant is very poor and oftentimes in want for the necessaries of life, and is now well along in years.

In view of all the circumstances, your committee think this a deserving case, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

JACOB FUNKHOUSER.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 2872) granting a pension to Jacob Funkhouser.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jacob Funkhouser, of the county of Preston, West Virginia, a private soldier of the war of 1812.

The report (by Mr. JONES, of Texas) was read, as follows:

The said Jacob Funkhouser is shown by the records of the Interior Department to have enlisted in Capt. Christian Core's company, Virginia Militia, and served therein from February 20 to March 4, 1815. He received a land-warrant for one hundred and sixty acres under the act of 1855, but his claim for pension was rejected July 30, 1878, by the Pension Office, on the ground that his service was rendered subsequent to the treaty of peace. Applicant is now in his ninety-fifth year, poor and dependent. While excluded from a pension by a strict construction of the law, yet inasmuch as he enlisted, and doubtless served part of his time before the news of the treaty of peace was received in the remote northwestern section of Virginia, in which he then resided, the committee deem his case a meritorious one, and recommend that the above bill pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CORNELIA V. BLACKMAN.

Mr. PETERS. I ask unanimous consent to take up out of its order the bill (H. R. 7571) granting a pension to Cornelia V. Blackman. This bill has been reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and is on the Calendar, but the report is still in the hands of the Printer.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to place the name of Cornelia V. Blackman, widow of Harvey C. Blackman, late a second lieutenant in the Eighth Kansas Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll, and grant her a pension from the date of the passage of this act, subject to the pension laws.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

ABBY P. ARNOLD.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration a Senate bill reported to-day from the Committee on Invalid Pensions—the bill (S. 764) granting an increase of pension to Abby P. Arnold. This bill, like a great many others which we have passed, proposes to increase the pension of the widow of a general officer.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, to increase the pension of Abby P. Arnold, widow of the late General Richard Arnold, United States Army, from $20 to $50 per month; said increase to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MARION D. EGBERT.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent to have taken up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. 2975) granting a pension to Marion D. Egbert. This bill has been once considered, when objection was made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE]. The bill was introduced by the Delegate from Washington Territory [Mr. BRENTS], from whom I have received a letter stating that he is confined to his house by reason of a fractured ankle, and asking that the bill be passed. I am also requested by the Delegate-elect from Washington Territory, Mr. Voorhees, to look after this matter. Both of these gentlemen assure me that the beneficiary is a very worthy person and the claim a very meritorious one.

I will also state that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE] desires to withdraw any opposition he may have manifested heretofore to the bill.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Marion D. Egbert, late of Company K, Eighty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, for pension.

The report (by Mr. JOHN S. WISE) was read, as follows:

Marion D. Egbert was a corporal in Company K, Eighty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and in service in September, 1863, at Cumberland Gap. He was detailed to act as ordnance-sergeant. One day in the latter part of November, 1863, while he and the men working under his orders were sunning the ammunition in the magazine, a comrade lit a port-fire, which communicated with damp powder on the ground, and would in a moment have produced a fatal explosion of a large amount of cannon ammunition. Egbert, seeing the danger, and that he could not flee from the explosion, threw himself across the line of burning powder and broke the trail, thus preventing the explosion. The fire burnt his blouse and pants quite severely, and the fright, shock, and fire produced a partial deafness, loss of sight, and paralysis in the left side.

The Pension Office required proof of the soldier's condition from a surgeon and two comrades. These Egbert frankly states he can not furnish, because, as the ill effects of the fright and burning did not culminate at once, he was not treated in hospital, and because those present when the accident occurred were men detailed from a Tennessee regiment, whose names he did not know and does not now know. But he does prove by a comrade that he saw him a few days after the explosion suffering severely. He proves by many of his acquaintances that he was sound prior to his going into the service, and has not been sound since. He proves a good character as a man, and his physician testifies that he has been attending him off and on since 1864 for partial paralysis of his tongue and left side.

We are satisfied of the merits of this case, although it falls short of the degree and character of testimony required at the Pension Office. We recommend passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN W. ROBSON.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3833) for the relief of John W. Robson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, arrearages included, the name of John W. Robson, late a private in the Sixth Wisconsin Battery, at the same rate as other soldiers of similar disability.

Mr. BAGLEY. Has this bill been reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. It has been.

Mr. BAGLEY. With arrears?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I think not with arrears.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I am oppposed to this bill, and can not allow it to go through. I object to its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Wisconsin is objected to.

JOHN O. GARDNER.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to take up out of its order the bill (H. R. 7178) granting an increase of pension to John O. Gardner.

There being no objection, the committee proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of John O. Gardner, formerly of Company A, Ninth Maine Volunteers, to $20 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

Claimant enlisted September 22, 1861, in Company A, Ninth Maine Infantry, and was honorably discharged August 4, 1865, having served faithfully for nearly four years. December, 1879, he applied for a pension, alleging that about the 18th of July, 1863, he was injured and wounded by a ball from the enemy's lines, which struck in his cartridge-box and threw him violently to the ground, causing injury to his spine and back. This occurred near Fort Wagner during the siege of that fort. Also wounded in the hand August 22, 1863; also on the 20th day of May, 1864, he was wounded in the shoulder by a ball during an attack by the confederate forces at Bermuda Hundred, Va.

On account of these wounds he was transferred to the Veteran Reserve Corps. He was allowed pension for the gunshot wound of right shoulder at rate of $2 per month, but his claims for the other and far more serious injuries were not allowed, because he was unable to show medical treatment in service and at time of discharge.

Dr. A. G. Peabody, who treated the soldier from 1865 to 1867, is dead, and his testimony can not be had. The hospital records say, "was wounded severely in shoulder at Bermuda Hundred, May 20, 1864," but do not mention his other injuries.

Lieut. S. A. Doten testifies:

"The army was retreating, and a bullet from the enemy's gun struck the cartridge-box of applicant, which he had thrown back across the small of the back where the injury was received. This was, as near as affiant can recollect, about July 18, 1863."

Affiant says he was personally present and speaks from personal knowledge of the facts.

Several of claimant's old neighbors testify that when he returned from the service he was so injured in the back that he was unable to resume his work in the mills. Claimant testifies that he was treated for the wound in the back by Surgeon Delon H. Abbott. Dr. Abbot says he remembers treating applicant, but can not recall the particulars, and is unable to state what he treated him for.

Dr. D. W. Lewis testifies:

"That he has known applicant intimately since 1871; that during all that time he was suffering more or less from affection of the spine, and was disabled at least three-fourths. Have treated said John Gardner for injury to the spine, said to be caused by gunshot striking the cartridge-box, which seems to have caused concussion of the spine. Has been entirely unable to work at his trade for seven weeks."

Dr. A. M. Vail testifies that he treated applicant from 1878 to 1880, for weak back, which he diagnosed as "chronic spinal congestion," and that he was disabled at least three-fourths.

Dr. E. W. Bliss, examining surgeon at Hiawatha, also speaks of the injury to the back, and rates it at one-half disability.

There seems to be little reason to doubt the origin and continuance of the disability, and yet it is not as clearly established as the rigid rules of the Pension Office require. The soldier was three times wounded on the battlefield. He is unable to perform manual labor, and has a family dependent upon his daily labor for support. Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BAGLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. STOCKSLAGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration, pursuant to order, sundry bills on the Private Calendar reported by the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with various recommendations.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask that there be printed for the use of that committee the letter of the Secretary of War and accompanying documents concerning the bill (S. 2492) to prevent the discharge from the military service of the United States of graduates from the Military Academy under the provisions of section 3, chapter 181, of the Supplement to the Revised Statutes, and for the repeal of the said section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made if there be no objection.

WILLIAM H. M'BRIDE.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2488) to remove the charge of desertion against William H. McBride, late a private in Company F, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask that the bill may be put upon its passage at this time.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was, to strike out all after the title, and to insert:

Whereas William H. McBride did, while a minor, enlist in Company I, First Pennsylvania Reserves, on the 10th day of June, 1861, and served in the same until the 2d day of October, 1862, when he returned to his home; and

Whereas he enlisted on the 13th day of October, 1862, in Company F, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, and served until the 7th day of August, 1865, when he was mustered out with that company; and

Whereas his name now stands upon the rolls of the War Department as a deserter: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of William H. McBride, Company I, First Pennsylvania Reserves, on the records of the Adjutant-General's Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, the title was amended to read: "A bill to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William H. McBride."

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NEWTON, MASS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further morning business, the Calendar under Rule VIII is now in order.

The bill (S. 1331) making appropriation for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., was announced as first in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. PENDLETON. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the judgment rendered in favor of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass., against the United States, in the sum of $371,025, from January 24, 1881, to the date of payment of said judgment; also the sum of $17,949, interest on $25,000 in United States bonds and $20,000 in United States interest-bearing notes taken from said bank and deposited in the United States subtreasury at Boston, Mass., on the 28th day of February, 1867.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $36,746.15 is hereby appropriated for the purposes set forth in section 1 hereof, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question on the amendment and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. Will not the Senator from Missouri now be good enough to state succinctly what the difference is between these two propositions?

Mr. COCKRELL. One proposition is to pay $249,000, interest upon the whole amount.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the other?

Mr COCKRELL. The other is to pay $36,000, the interest upon the Government bonds and some compound-interest notes that were deposited in the subtreasury and used by the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the difference between the two amounts to be paid under the separate propositions?

Mr. COCKRELL. One is $249,000 and the other is $36,000.

Mr. INGALLS. Is $36,000 the entire amount to be paid under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is the entire amount. The amendment proposes to pay interest upon the Government bonds and the compound-interest notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. I ask whether the deposit, apart from the securities mentioned, was in money? Besides the bonds and interest-bearing notes of the United States deposited in the Treasury, was the balance entirely in money?

Mr. COCKRELL. Money and certificates of deposit or certified checks—or something of that kind. The bonds and compound-interest notes named were the only securities of the United States that were bearing interest by the cancellation of which the United States saved interest.

Mr. SHERMAN. The other was money, or matters that could be converted into money immediately?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. In other words, it increased the surplus of the United States upon which the United States authorities based the amount of the public debt they should pay in each year, and went to pay the public debt of the United States and stop its interest. The United States got the interest on one just as much as on the other.

Mr. INGALLS. That is a very important statement; and I suppose, of course, there can be no doubt but that the Senator believes it.

Mr. HOAR. I do.

Mr. INGALLS. If it were fully substantiated by the facts I should vote for the original proposition; but if the statement of the Senator from Missouri is correct, I think his amendment ought to prevail. That is to say, if there were interest-bearing securities of the United States by reason of which the United States only saved that amount of interest, I do not think we ought to be called upon to pay this enormous excess upon the balance of the securities. The general idea, of course, as everybody understands, is that the Government does not pay interest; but if the Government saved interest, it ought to reimburse it or return it. If the facts are as the Senator from Missouri states, and this is the only amount of interest that the United States saved, of course that is all we ought to repay.

Mr COCKRELL. When I state facts they are facts.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not doubt that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Here is the record in this case that no Senator will deny. Here is the receipt given by Hartwell to Carter, and here are the various items composing the $371,000. The only items in the statement of the character referred to by the Senator from Kansas are compound-interest notes, $20,000, and Government bonds, $25,000. Here are all the items. The first item is the proceeds of Dyer's check of February 21 on the First National Bank of Boston, and then the compound-interest notes.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that the balance of these funds went to the extinguishment of the interest-bearing indebtedness, and thereby the United States saved interest on that amount. The balance of these funds went just like all the Treasury funds go. Any surplus of the general amount in the Treasury was applied to the extinguishment of the debt.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I said.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all. This particular fund did not go to extinguishing the interest-bearing debt any more than the tariff taxes collected on sugar went. There are millions of such taxes that have to be refunded. Are you going to pay interest on those? Every dollar that is collected in the customs revenue goes into the general Treasury and aids in the extinguishment of the debt. Millions of dollars are paid as rebates almost every year. There is a large amount of rebate on sugar. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] can probably state the amount of rebate on sugar. According to the theory in this case the Government had interest stopped on that amount. Are we going to pay those claimants interest? They have just the same claim to interest that this claimant has.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The Government, according to the court and its findings, took money belonging to the Newton bank, kept it some seven or eight years, when a judgment was rendered for the exact amount of money taken without interest. Is not that true?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; that is not true.

Mr. JACKSON. That is true.

Mr. FRYE. So I understand.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg pardon; the Government of the United States did not do it. A little clerk, a disbursing officer in the subtreasury, was seduced and led astray by the agent of the Newton bank and bribed into letting the agent of the bank have $371,000 of the people's money out of the subtreasury, and he was speculating upon it. He undertook to put it back into the bank, and he put certain funds there in the bank. It was then, when the disclosure came, that the agent confessed what Mr. Carter and he had been doing. The Government had nothing more to do with it than the Senator had—not a particle. The idea that a little disbursing clerk in Boston is the Government of he United States!

Mr. FRYE. I did not intend to take any part in this discussion, but I confess I can not see the distinction which the Senator from Missouri makes. The court held beyond any manner of question that the Government of the United States did wrongfully take and convert to its own use money belonging to the Newton bank—there is no question about that—and the Government of the United States had the use of that money for seven or eight years.

Mr. COCKRELL. The same as it has the use of money on all rebates.

Mr. FRYE. It had the use of that money. I do not care whether it has the use of it on rebates or not; I am looking to this question alone. The Government had the use of that money seven or eight years. Of course the Government received interest on that money, because it extinguished a certain portion of its liabilities which otherwise would be bearing interest if the Secretary of the Treasury did his duty.

The Newton bank recovered judgment some seven or eight years subsequent to that, and a judgment only for the amount of money taken. I say I see no reason on earth why the United States Government should not return 5 per cent. or whatever per cent. interest it received on the use of that money during the seven or eight years. I say as between individuals no such question would ever be made. I say no honorable man receiving money under like circumstances would ever make the question that he ought not to pay interest for those seven or eight years.

Mr. President, I do not believe in the doctrine of the United States that it never shall pay interest. It is a custom. It is a bad custom.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is the law.

Mr. FRYE. The United States does not pay interest, and yet it claims interest on every default that is ever made to it. It demands limitations of liability against itself; it claims it shall have no limitations of liability when itself is the claimant. I have known instance after instance reported by the Committee on Claims where a perfectly just claim was awarded against the United States Government which had been subsisting in full justice for years and years, and yet no interest was allowed.

Pray, why should not the United States pay interest under the same circumstances that I should be compelled to pay interest? No good reason can be given why a citizen of the United States should not be permitted to go to the United States courts, if he has a claim against the United States. My recollection is that no civilized nation on this earth, except the United States of America, prevents its citizens from exercising that right. If they could go to the courts of the United States and recover judgment they would recover judgment under the rules of the court and under the laws of the country, and would receive the interest under the judgment of the court which is claimed here and which is reported favorably by the Committee on Claims.

Sir, I see no justice in the position taken by the Senator from Missouri, but I see entire justice in the report made by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Maine is right in the position which he has argued with so much warmth, then I ask him to make his theory practical by submitting to the appropriate committee and to the Senate some general law that will give interest to everybody. He has just stated himself that it is the constant habit of the Committee on Claims to report for the repayment without interest of moneys which the Government has received without the sanction of law. So it has been done and is being done session after session; and yet we are asked to pay interest in this case, which is not as strong a case as many of the others. Here is a case where the bank officers were participes criminis in this fraud, and we are asked to pay interest, and yet we are to go on adhering to that rule which the Senator says is dishonest. If such a rule should be established, let us meet it by a general law instead of taking exceptional cases and giving interest and then adhering in the long run to our rule, which he says is not honest, not to pay interest.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I stated, or intended to state, that in my opinion this is an exceptional case, but that I myself went a great way beyond the claim made in this exceptional case, and believe that where the United States withholds payment of a just claim it should pay interest in all cases.

Mr. HARRISON. If this case is exceptional it is exceptional against the claimant. Does the Senator from Maine think this is as strong a case as where a tax-collector of the Government has, over the protest of a citizen, wrung from him illegal taxes, and after ten years it is decided that there was no authority of law for the collection, and absolutely without any fault he asserts his rights all the time, and the Government refuses to pay interest on the money so held? Does not the Senator think that that is a stronger case than the case here, where a man connected with the bank was the person who got the money from the Treasury originally and another officer of the bank combined with him to put it back there, but under circumstances that did not bind the bank?

I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Maine in thinking that in a great class of cases the Government should pay interest, but my point is that it should be done under some provision of law that makes the payment of interest equal and honest all around to its citizens, humble as well as influential, poor as well as rich.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I wish to restate the point once more. The matter of taxation stands on its own footing, and this Government, as all governments, has to commit to executive officers, often humble officers, the duty of assessing and collecting a tax and holding it, and it is held until the United States can settle the question, if there is any question about the liability of the Government. But this case stands upon the ground which the Supreme Court of the United States have solemnly affirmed in the case of Francis Vigo, cited by the report. Here is a case where it is the uninterrupted policy of the Government to pay interest.

The case of Francis Vigo was a case referred to the Court of Claims by an act of Congress to be settled according to the usual policy of the Government. It went from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court, and they say that, aside from the tax policy, which is otherwise, in other cases which are familiar to us, where the United States has seized upon the property of a citizen and wrongfully converted it to its own use, as it did in this case, it is the policy of the United States to pay interest, and fifty cases are cited in the report of the committee which establish that policy.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will allow me, in order that I may distinctly understand the facts upon which this claim is based, if I am right when I say that certain interest-bearing securities owned by the First National Bank of Newton, and certain cash funds so owned, were illegally transferred to the possession of the United States Treasury.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. Then the claim for interest is based, if I understand it, purely upon the fact that the United States Treasury was in possession of these interest-bearing securities and these cash funds for a number of years.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir. The claim for interest is based upon the fact that after the facts were all known to the United States officials by the confession of the parties implicated, a demand was made and a refusal to pay over, which would have made any citizen in the world under similar circumstances liable to interest.

Mr. HARRIS. Still, if I understand it, however, it depends upon the fact that moneys of a private citizen or corporation were wrongfully held——

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. By the Treasury, and not restored to the rightful owner.

Mr. HOAR. That is true.

Mr. HARRIS. In principle I desire to know how that differs from every other case where the moneys of a citizen or private corporation have found their way into the United States Treasury and are wrongfully held there, and whether in such cases the invariable rule has not been to refuse to pay interest and simply to restore the principal, when it was restored at all.

Mr. HOAR. I can answer the Senator. It is the invariable policy of this Government to pay interest except in two classes of cases; one in cases of property taken during war under the war power, where the whole theory goes on the ground that the repayment of the property is made as a gratuity and bounty of the Government and not as of strict right, and the other being the case alluded to by the Senator from Indiana, which is the case of a tax. Taxation is in its nature unequal; it is in its nature clumsy; it is in its nature purely artificial; and the policy of the Government, as of every State, is to commit the power to certain officers, a large number of officers, many of them persons in a humble place in life, officers low down in the scale of official life, who assess as well as they can in the first instance the tax, take the property into the possession of the Government by the processes of tax collection, and then the Government examines any case if there is a case of injustice or illegality, and restores to the citizen what he has paid; and the man who gets the money back without interest after three or four years in court, when it has been wrongfully seized by a tax-collector, is no more wronged than I should be if I were compelled to pay taxes on a large sum of money when my neighbor, who perhaps is worth four times as much as I am, under the unequal arrangements of the tax laws pays nothing. That stands on its own footing. With these two exceptions the principle is as the Supreme Court of the United States has stated it.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to ask as to the French spoliation claims?

Mr. HOAR. They do not draw interest.

Mr. HARRISON. They ought to have it, I should think, according to the doctrine we laid down.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think so. Now, Mr. President, another thing I wish to state before I sit down. I wish to repeat what I said when the Senator from Missouri was on his feet before in regard to the equity of making any distinction between the interest-bearing securities to the Government and the money or cash which was received. The Government received $46,000, which it was bound to pay to the owner of the property with interest. It stopped paying that interest because it had the muniment of the debt in its own possession. That, it is agreed, ought to be paid back. But it also took a quantity of funds needed to pay to the creditors of this bank the money for which its stockholders were personally liable to the extent of their capital stock, and they were obliged to make the payment under the statute obligation. That money swelled the surplus of the United States in its Treasury, and the amount of that surplus determined the question how much of the public debt from time to time should be paid by the Government each year; and therefore the Government got, in the one case just as much as in the other, the benefit in the saving of interest on its public debt with these funds. That is my proposition.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have listened to this debate for several days, apparently involving some important questions as to the liability of the Government to pay interest upon money adjudged to be due from it; but I do not think this case is so technical a question as that. If it were a case of voluntary contract with the Government, if it were a case of an ordinary claim for loss or damage against the Government, then the rule as to the payment of interest would be adjusted according to the many precedents of which the volumes of Opinions of the Attorneys-General are so full. But it is not a technical case. It is a case sounding rather to my mind in what is the honorable and the moral obligation of the Government to one of its own citizens. Here is the case proven to us where there was a breach of trust, amounting perhaps to a felony, committed by the agent of one of the banks, and the result of that breach of trust and felony was to transfer the property of that institution into the custody of the Government of the United States, one of whose agents accepted it. Why, sir, there is an old saying and a strong one, that seems to me to cover this case, that the receiver is as bad as the thief, when the receiver, knowing the origin of the property, consents to take and keep it and enjoy the fruits of another's crime.

Mr. President, if between any two Senators in this body a case similar in its general facts could be supposed, that one Senator should be robbed by his trusted servant and the property received by the servant of the other and converted to his use—I do not think that the analogy is unsound between that case and the present, where the trusted servant and agent of one member of this body should take his private property and place it in the hands of the agent of another member of this body who had also been equally delinquent. Is it possible that if I went to one of my friends on this side or the other side of the Chamber and showed him that his balance in bank had been made good by the delinquency of a clerk in my employment and that his loss had been made good by my loss, can there be a doubt but such loss would be suffered to fall upon the individual who was the primary loser and not the one to whom that loss had been transferred by collusion and the commission of a second fraud?

If this be so, it seems to me simply just and right that this Government would only be setting the example that an honorable citizen irrespective of legal obligation would set to the community in which he lived, if it refused to let the Treasury of the United States become the beneficiary of a fraud, or to gain money, either principal or interest, by a transaction founded upon that which was in substance a felony.

The proposition of the bill reported by the Senator from Tennessee, which he has so carefully and elaborately reported and discussed here with so much ability and fairness, is simply this: That from the time the property of this bank was converted through these dishonest channels to the use of the United States and they began to gather the fruits of that conversion those fruits should be paid back; that is to say, the fruit called interest should be paid back with the fruit called principal.

I do not think, with all respect to my friend from Missouri, whose care for the public interests so constantly excites my respect and admiration, there ought to be a distinction between an interest-bearing bond and a fund that bore no interest, and yet the use and benefit of which went into the Treasury of the United States. Was it honest? Was it right? Does this Government propose to fatten upon stolen property? No, sir; no, sir. If an honest agent of the Government had been there knowing the origin of these bonds, he never would have permitted either the cash or the bonds or anything else, interest-bearing or not, to be received at all. But is the case changed because the Government also had in its employ another dishonest agent who should collude with the first culprit in the employment of the bank, and the Government receive and retain any advantage from their combined dishonesty? It seems to me not. If it were a question of contract; if it were a question sounding in pecuniary damages; if it were a question of tort, or a question of contract, then I should be disposed to consider this matter of interest upon the amount more closely. But it is not so. The whole of this transaction is bottomed in fraud; it is bottomed in crime; and I ask ought we to shelter the Government of the United States by a technical defense when we know that fraud in one of its worst forms brought that money and converted it to the use of the Government, and that the Government has had its profitable use from that time to this?

The example to be set by the Government of the United States to its people always should be the highest good faith, of honesty, of honor in its transactions; and when we who are the agents of the Government to give expression to these views have it in our power by a practical act of this kind to show our hostility to fraud, our unwillingness to profit by the fruits of fraud, it seems to me that technical questions and defenses should give way to the robust and honest and true question, Can the public Treasury profit and can the American people wish to profit by stolen goods, whether it be in principal or interest? I say not, and therefore it is not a question for the technical application of a rule that the Government does not pay interest upon a sum ascertained to be due, although there are exceptions and they have been fully set out in this report; but this case goes far below it. This is not a case of contract, or quasi-contract, or of damages in tort or contract. But here is a case that grows out of a felony, and the question is whether the Government ought to pocket either principal or interest by that felony? It seems to me it ought not, and that everything received into the Treasury from a source so tainted ought to be restored to the orignal owner, who was robbed of his property and never lost his title to it.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, if this case can be made an exceptional case, I see no objection to the passage of the bill; but the Senator from Delaware admits at the outset of his remarks that this is not a technical exception from other cases, but he places it upon broader grounds. Now what I very much fear is that the report of the Senator from Tennessee on this case and the speech of the Senator from Delaware as well as that of the Senator from Maine may make this a precedent for any case that may hereafter arise for the payment of interest. I do not myself wish to reverse the past action of Congress in relation to denying interest upon all claims, or nearly all claims, except those with peculiar and exceptional conditions.

The Senator from Delaware admits that this is a case of fraud. I think the case in this respect is very much in the condition of the woman that made a confession in a conference meeting, which was that she had never done wrong but once, and then Mr. So-and-so was as much agin to blame as she was. [Laughter.] In this case the Government of the United States has done wrong, but the bank of Newton was as much agin to blame as the Government itself.

Now the question that arises is whether in this instance the bank comes here entirely with a clear conscience in demanding that the Government should sustain all the loss.

Then in relation to the computation of interest; if any interest is to be allowed, the question arises whether interest ought to be computed before even the bank had made any claim or instituted any suit for recovery of the amount of loss. I understand it by the report to have been about six years before the bank even pretended to have any claim against the Government.

Then another question arises whether the interest ought to be computed prior to the date of judgment in the suit.

Under these circumstances it seems to me there is some danger that if this case be passed upon favorably, it may stand as a precedent for any case that may hereafter arise in the payment of interest.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I concur with the Senator from Vermont that this matter is getting to be rather in danger of being drawn into precedent hereafter; and I am not willing to subscribe to the doctrine stated by the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Delaware as being applicable to the Government of the United States. Both the Senators cite the cases of dealings between private individuals, and attempt to draw an analogy from those dealings which they say would bind the Government to pay interest in a case like this. There is no analogy really between transactions or dealings or torts perpetrated by one individual upon another and like transactions occurring between individuals and the Government of the United States. The Government of the United States is here merely for the purpose of conducting the Government, preserving the public property, collecting the public revenues, and disbursing them for public objects. It is not engaged in commercial pursuits, in banking, or anything else out of which it can make money, or if it is it is very improperly at work at it. If I obtain money of a citizen, whether I do it by a tort or upon a contract, I am supposed to put it into my own private business and make profit out of it; I am supposed to have used that with all the advantage that the other party, to whom it rightfully belonged, could have used it in the event I had allowed him to retain it. Consequently I am made liable for interest; and that, it must be remembered, is not a common-law rule; it has its origin in statute, which undertook to impose this matter of justice upon the private consciences of men. But when the Government of the United States receives from a private individual, tortiously, if you please, or by contract, or by accident, by finding, or in any other manner, money, and it goes into the common treasury, while it is there there is no presumption that that money is being used for the purpose of profit. On the contrary, the money is there as public money, and only for public uses, liable to be paid out in that way and only in that way.

There is no expressed or implied obligation that arises in such a case as that against the Government that it should pay interest. If the Government is so situated as that it can make interest out of the money, or (as is true of a part of this claim) so situated that it can save interest as against itself upon some of its obligations, then it is right enough that it should pay interest; but it would never do to apply the rule of interest which obtains between individuals for the rectification and balancing of their transactions and dealings, between any creditor and the Government unless the Government is under an express obligation to pay interest. It would never do. We should bankrupt the coming generations by the accumulation of claims that we allow to lie over from year to year if as a rule they were to bear interest because we had committed some tort which deprived a man of his property or because we had the use of a man's money in some way and deprived him of it so that we kept him from making the interest which he says we are liable for.

Take the claims for French spoliation that occurred in 1800; put interest upon them as a court of equity or a court of law would permit interest upon individuals in cases of that kind, and we should never get out of paying the debt. Take all of the claims that lie back now in the musty records of the Congress of the United States and of the Departments and commence to pay interest upon them; we should never get done paying the interest upon them. No government ever yet bound itself, unless it was by an express legislative agreement, to the payment of interest to its creditors. I remember the case of the claims under the Spanish treaty of 1819, called the "Florida claims." They were very numerous. The judges of the Territorial courts first and afterward of the district courts of the United States were empowered by an act of Congress pursuant to the treaty of 1819 to consider claims that were allowed in that treaty. That was between Spain and the United States. These judges put interest upon those claims as a part of the debt, and they were reported to Mr. Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury at the time, in combination—the principal debt and the interest as one sum charged up by the judgment and decree of the court; and the question arose then whether Mr. Woodbury, having the ultimate power of decision upon questions of the kind, and acting as upon an appeal from the decision of the judge as a commissioner, would commit the Government of the United States to the payment of interest upon that debt. He decided against it, decided correctly what has been sustained by every Secretary of the Treasury from that time to this and by every Attorney-General but one. That claim is still here demanding that we shall pay the back interest upon it. The Government has uniformly refused to do it, and rightfully refused to do it, and in so acting it has called into pretty wide and loud clamor what Spain had to say about our conduct on that occasion.

There is another case that must be fresh in the memory of Senators. We received during our war, about the year 1862, I think, from the Government of Japan $750,000, in the nature of an indemnity for certain wrongs that were alleged to have been committed by the Japanese against our flag and against our ships. Mr. Seward, at the time that money was received, declared distinctly and put it on record and sent it to both Houses of Congress, that there was no sound, conscientious ground upon which the Government of the United States could receive that money; hence he never put it into the Treasury at all; he kept it in the State Department; he put it to work by investing it in bonds and reinvesting the proceeds, from time to time, until the accumulations upon that sum of money amounted to very nearly $2,000,000. The Government of the United States never refused to pay that back to Japan upon the ground that she was not entitled to it; but yet there was a good long delay about it. Congress could not get its consent as to the form in which that money was to be sent back to Japan.

What was the result? The Committee on Foreign Relations reported a bill here to pay the money back to Japan with the accumulated interest upon it; not upon the ground that the Government of the United States had committed itself to the payment of interest by the receipt of the money merely, but that it had been kept out of the Treasury; had never been converted into the Treasury; had been used by the Secretary of State in speculations, we may call them, or investments and reinvestments in our own bonds, and that amount of money which had been accumulated in bonds of the United States—nearly $2,000,000—was more than half of it the result of interest that we had saved ourselves from paying to other parties. When we came to pay this acknowledged debt the Congress of the United States refused to pay to this friendly government the interest upon that money.

Mr. FRYE. Do you think it did right?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not think so at the time because the case was different from any other that I know of. I thought we put the case on a wrong principle. If the case had been liable to be put on the principle that Congress decided it on the decision was wrong; but I think Congress put it on the wrong principle. But suppose that, instead of having received the money from Japan as we did we had received it under the belief of its being rightfully received, being our own money, without any demur on our side at all as to the nature of our claim upon it, and then suppose we had put it into the Treasury and we had expended it in the public service, the principle would have been entirely different and the action of Congress would have been justified by the highest morals.

There is no analogy, I maintain, between the dealings of private individuals with each other and the dealings of a private individual with the Government of the United States, simply because the Government is not here for the purpose of making interest out of money that is put into its Treasury. That is not one of its functions or purposes.

There is more than that in this case. Interest is not a debt of justice for a tort; it may be upon a contract; and I was a little surprised to hear the Senator from Delaware say that if this had been a contract perhaps he would not have been willing to pay interest, but it being a tort, or rather a crime, as he denominated it, he was. In an action of trover for the conversion of property, in an action of replevin or detinue for the wrongful detention of property, interest when given is given only as in the nature of damages, and entirely in the discretion of the jury. They may impose it or they may not impose it, according to the circumstances of the case.

If I go along the highway and I find a pocket-book that contains a thousand dollars in money and the name of the individual is marked upon that pocket-book, that identifies the ownership of the money, and I take it to my house and lock it in my safe and keep it there for three, four, or five years; I am trying to find out who is the owner of that money. The owner comes to me within ten days and makes proof before me, not satisfactory to me, however, but he makes proof before me that that is his thousand dollars and his pocket-book, and that is his name, and that he is the man who is there described. I say to him, "Still, sir, you must excuse me; go into court and prove it; I do not know you; I want a judgment to defend me in this matter; I am acting honestly and sincerely about it." Would it be expected that a jury would give interest against me upon that money when I had locked it in my safe and had made no use of it? Surely not. And hence it is that in the action of replevin or of trover or of detinue interest, I repeat, is not a debt of justice; it is merely a privilege given to a jury to assess it in the nature of damages so as to do justice between men and men according to their own conduct.

Here we got a sum of money, it is said, that was stolen from a bank in Massachusetts, and through the connivance of a subordinate officer of the Treasury of the United States was carried into the Treasury of the United States, and it is asked that the people of the United States shall be required to pay interest upon that sum of money. What profit have the people made out of it? Have they ever refused to pay it? They have never refused to pay it, and they have never put this money to any use which would increase its amount in the Treasury of the United States. Hence I say that we are about to set a precedent here which I concur with the Senator from Vermont in believing would be a very dangerous one, and one that would violate some very well-established precedents which have been adopted by the Congress of the United States after very full and learned debate upon this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 18, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Morrill,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Platt,	Voorhees,

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the bill passes I desire to say that if I supposed this bill would receive the sanction of the House of Representatives and become a law I certainly would resist it; and I think I could bring a great many forcible considerations to bear, most of which, however, have been stated by Senators who have debated the question.

I believe the establishment of the proposition of this bill as a principle of legislation in regard to claims would involve the sacrifice of millions upon millions of dollars. There are classes of claims depending now where very great sums of money are involved, so large that we can hardly measure them.

I believe the principle of the bill is altogether wrong. The Government of the United States did no harm to these parties. They had the full measure of redress according to the law. They have received back the principal sum. The original money stolen was from the Treasury of the United States. Afterward, from other money taken from this bank wrongfully and placed in the Treasury of the United States and there found, that money has been refunded. The only loser of the principal sum is the United States, which has lost the principal of the money taken by its cashier from its Treasury and placed under the control of persons who managed or controlled this bank. To pay interest on this sum of money now, it seems to me, is a very dangerous and doubtful principle. I do not propose to discuss it any further, but simply to record my vote against the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall vote against this bill, and I desire to say that I shall do so not because I do not think there is not some merit in the bill, and that a portion of the claim ought not to be paid, but as I understand this case it is entirely a departure from the precedents which have heretofore obtained protecting the Government against the payment of interest upon claims against it. In my opinion it will come home to plague us hereafter, and perhaps some of the very cases we have passed refusing interest will be back here asking for the payment of interest which has already been refused.

As I understand, the case is this: An agent of the Newton bank induced an officer in the subtreasury at Boston to let him have for his firm the assets or money of the Government of the United States which he lost; and to indemnify the Government he placed in the possession of the subtreasury bonds and other assets belonging to the bank. After those assets belonging to the bank were in the hands of the Government they could not be paid out. What officer of the Government could take those bonds that had been delivered to the Government and hand them over to the bank? The Government only pursued the proper course in keeping them until a final judgment was obtained. There is no charge here that there was any unnecessary delay on the part of the officers of the Government. They were compelled for their own protection to let the matter go to judgment.

I repeat that as I understand the case the agents of the Government, the officers of the Government, were guilty of no delay; that every step they took was necessary for their own protection; that as soon as the matter could be properly adjudicated the Government paid a large proportion of the demand of the bank; and on the remaining portion I should be perfectly willing to see the Government pay, from the date of that judgment, interest, as also to pay back the interest it saved on the bonds that belonged to the bank which were handed over to the agent of the Government in Boston. But I am not willing to go beyond that. I am not willing to go beyond the judgment obtained against the Government and pay anything more whatever to this bank, because it is a departure from the policy that has heretofore obtained and which is expressed in our statutes upon this subject.

If we make this innovation upon the part of the Government, how many claims will come here, just as proper and valid claims against the Government, for the interest which has been refused heretofore? How many claimants of that character will come back to ask us to indemnify them by paying them the interest which has heretofore been refused? It is a precedent that I do not think we ought to establish, and, therefore, I shall vote against this bill, at the same time believing that there is some merit in the bill, and that a portion of the money ought to be paid.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, in the commencement of the discussion of this bill I stated that I thought it might be proper enough for the Government to pay interest on the interest-bearing bonds while they were held by the Government. I computed and stated to the Senate the amount of interest on the balance of the money between the rendition of the judgment and the final payment of the balance, $111,000. I computed it and stated it to the Senate. An amendment has been introduced by the Senator from Missouri to pay that amount, the only amount that there is any possible right, or equity, or decency for the bank or these men to demand of the Government at all. The Senate has refused to incorporate that amendment in the bill, and goes for the $249,000 of interest.

Sir, in the sixteen years that I have served in Congress in the other House and this, having been six or seven years of that time upon the Committee on Claims in the House and in this body, I state here publicly that no such claim for interest has ever been allowed on any bill presented in either House. I defy contradiction by anybody. We have both in the House and in the Senate stood refusing bills ever since the war closed, where the equities, where the sympathies, where the rights of individuals were infinitely stronger than the right of this bank, or of Carter, a large stockholder of this bank, or of its cashier. We have been compelled to refuse claimants even the principal, to say nothing of interest, on account of the precedent which would bring in demands against the Treasury of the United States to the extent of millions and hundreds of millions of dollars.

The House and the Senate passed a bill called the Best bill which appealed to the sympathy and to a kind of native sense of justice of Congress, where the residence and adjoining property of a loyal citizen of the United States was destroyed to make room for fortifications, when there was no war in the neighborhood and no immediate threatening of war at that point, and where it would seem as if the property of that loyal citizen might have been saved, as the result proved that it might. Congress passed that bill; and the President of the United States, seeing to what an extent that would be used as a precedent in this unfortunate class of cases, where good men and loyal men had suffered from the circumstances surrounding their cases and from the laws of war, vetoed the bill; and from that day to this that class of cases, stronger in their merits, more just in the enforcement of law in favor of the sufferer than this is or can possibly be made to be, have been rejected, both principal and interest.

As I said before, I have no knowledge except from the record of this case. I have no feeling in regard to it. It would be more agreeable to my feelings, where there was a seeming equity, to vote in favor of the Government doing more than was necessary to an individual sufferer, a citizen or citizens of the United States, than a private citizen would be required to do. Yet I say to you, sir, and to the Senators here that there are piled up in the room of the Committee on Claims of the House and in the room of the Committee on Claims of the Senate amounts aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars equally defensible and equally proper to pass both as to principal and as to interest with this claim. That is why I oppose the passage of it.

I have as carefully as I was able to do, during all the course of my Congressional life, sought to pay honest and just claims where it was possible that they should be paid even where there were only equities in the matter, unless to do so would establish a precedent which if followed out would ruin the Treasury, would impose a burden of taxation upon the people beyond what they could possibly bear; but we might as well give up the Government in the beginning as try to allow interest in all the classes of claims equally meritorious with this.

It makes no difference to me that this claim comes from New England; it makes no difference to me that it comes from Massachusetts. If it came from any other State, North or South, if it came from any Southern State connected with all the changes and the diversities of opinion and the conflicting views in regard to war claims, or those which might be classed with the general ruin and conflagration which accompanies the marching of troops and the inflictions of war, I feel my duty to be just as great to meet this case from Massachusetts or Michigan as I should if it came from Louisiana or North Carolina.

I shall have performed my duty, sir, in voting to the extreme extent which I think proper, and to which I brought myself to coincide with the views of this last amendment offered and rejected, in the first remarks I made on this bill; and now I desire to have the opportunity of recording my vote against the passage of this precedent, which I think the most dangerous of any bill which has been under consideration in the House or in the Senate since I have been a member of either body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill, on which the Senator from Missouri has demanded the yeas and nays. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Bayard,	Dolph,	Jackson,	Plumb,
Blair,	Fair,	Jonas,	Sawyer,

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House requested the return of the bill (H. R. 1004) relative to the Chinese indemnity fund.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. T. R. COBB of Indiana, Mr. BARCLAY HENLEY of California, and Mr. L. E. PAYSON of Illinois the conferees on the part of the House.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. CULLOM. The morning hour has nearly expired, and I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2112.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I hope the Senator from Illinois will allow the Senate to proceed with the Calendar at least until 2 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The bill (S. 1420) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill is to be passed over by request of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], the Chair understands.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Illinois who reported that bill and has it in charge is absent, and I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so done.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2872) granting a pension to Jacob Funkhouser;

A bill (H. R. 2975) granting a pension to Marion D. Egbert;

A bill (H. R. 3074) to grant a pension to Jasper J. Henry on account of wounds received while acting as guide for the First Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers in the war of the rebellion;

A bill (H. R. 3605) granting a pension to Eliza Sluss;

A bill (H. R. 5813) granting a pension to Rachel Smith;

A bill (H. R. 5925) granting a pension to Margaret A. Berry;

A bill (H. R. 7178) granting an increase of pension to John O. Gardner;

A bill (H. R. 7501) granting a pension to Hector W. Summers;

A bill (H. R. 7571) granting a pension to Cornelia V. Blackman; and

A bill (H. R. 7707) to pension Holden Cook.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

The bill (S. 1886) to quiet titles of settlers on the Des Moines River lands in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BAYARD. Is there a report connected with this case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is; but it is quite lengthy.

Mr. LAPHAM. I suppose it is very plain that this bill can not be considered under the five-minute rule. I was not in when it was called up. Of course it is a bill that can not be discussed under this rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to its consideration under Rule VIII?

Mr. LAPHAM. I see the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] is not here. I do not want the questions in reference to it disposed of in his absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to its consideration?

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask that it may stand over without prejudice, as it did before, until the Senator from Arkansas is here.

Mr. PLUMB. It is now within ten minutes of the time when the regular order of the Senate, the bill in regard to interstate commerce, will come up. I shall not now make the motion which I have designed to make to take up this bill, the objection of the Senator from New York to the contrary notwithstanding, but I will do so at the time the bill is next reached on the Calendar. I desire to say that this bill is a bill which, if it is ever disposed of, ought to be disposed of now. It has been in Congress in one shape or another for a long time.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me a moment? I think I can relieve the difficulty. I understand that the Senator from Arkansas has given notice publicly to the Senate that he expects to be absent, after Monday, for some time. He is staying here until Monday only to take part in the eulogies on Senator ANTHONY. The Senator from New York will probably not secure his presence by postponement. This bill might as well come up to-day as next week, for any expectation of the Senator from Arkansas being present.

Mr. LAPHAM. There will be no business done on Monday, I understand.

Mr. HOAR. But after that the Senator from Arkansas expects to be absent for some time.

Mr. PLUMB. I think I will, notwithstanding what I said at the beginning, make the motion now to proceed with the consideration of this bill, the objection of the Senator from New York to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. LAPHAM. I hope it will not be taken up.

Mr. PLUMB. When it comes up in this way it is not under the limitation of the five-minute rule of debate. The Senator from New York can certainly express himself on the subject at length, if not now, the next time the bill comes up; but I am unwilling, so far as I am concerned, that the consideration of this bill shall be longer postponed, without in any way detracting from the importance of the position which the Senator from New York assumes in regard to it. I therefore move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill in question, notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. LAPHAM. That motion is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is in order.

Mr. LAPHAM. How is it? I have not objected.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. PLUMB. I understood the Senator from New York to object.

Mr. LAPHAM. No; I asked to have the bill stand over without prejudice.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well; objection is now interposed.

Mr. LAPHAM. I do not want a vote taken upon the bill now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that this bill now be taken up notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask for the yeas and nays on this motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 32, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Allison,	Conger,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Cullom,	Kenna,	Sawyer,
Beck,	Dawes,	Manderson,	Slater,
Bowen,	Dolph,	Miller of Cal.,	Vance,
Brown,	George,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Vest,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hampton,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Jackson,	Pugh,	Wilson.

NAYS—13.

Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Maxey,	Walker.
Frye,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Garland,	Lapham,	Sheffield,
Groome,	McMillan,	Sherman,

ABSENT—31.

Aldrich,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,
Blair,	Gibson,	Lamar,	Platt,
Butler,	Hale,	Logan,	Ransom,
Call,	Harris,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,
Cockrell,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sabin,
Colquitt,	Hill,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sewell,
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Palmer,	Williams.
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Pendleton,

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday; pending which the Chair asks leave to lay before the Senate some messages from the House of Representatives.

Mr. CULLOM. That can be done by unanimous consent.

CHINESE INDEMNITY FUND.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to return to the House the bill (H. R. 1004) relative to the Chinese indemnity fund.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the request of the House of Representatives?

The bill was ordered to be returned to the House of Representatives.

FORFEITURE OF OREGON LAND GRANT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SLATER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the presiding officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. SLATER, DOLPH, and PLUMB were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:
A bill (H. R. 542) granting a pension to Samuel Hanson;

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] as amended, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is, in line 14 of section 4, after the word "class," to insert:

Or shall charge or receive any greater compensation for transporting a similar amount and kind of property a shorter distance than for a longer distance over the same line of road and in the same direction; but this provision shall not be construed to legalize the charging as much for a shorter as for a longer distance in any case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned last evening I was discussing the question of the transportation of through freights going from New York to Saint Louis over the Central Railroad of Georgia, a longer distance for less money than the company charges for carrying its local freights a shorter distance. I now propose to resume the discussion where I left it.

But you may say it is unjust to the people of Georgia to permit this through business going from New York to Saint Louis to pass over the railroads in Georgia a longer distance at less rates than they pay for the shorter distance. What harm, let me ask, does this do any citizen of Georgia?

The freight goes to Savannah by steamer; it is loaded on a car that would otherwise go empty to Saint Louis, and it passes rapidly over the soil of Georgia, doing nobody any harm, but really doing a service to the people of Georgia. But you may ask how. I reply that the railroads of Georgia must make out of some business money enough to keep them in good condition and run them, to say nothing of the justice of paying dividends to their stockholders.

Now if we can not conduct through business over these long lines as cheaply as it is done in other sections, or can not be permitted to compete with other long lines for the business, then we must levy the amount that we would make on through freight as an additional charge on the local business.

In other words, each $1,000 that the through line makes in carrying return freights on cars that would otherwise go empty is that much that goes into the support of the railroads forming the line, and that much which must be levied upon the local business, if we are not permitted to collect it on this class of through business.

What good sense, let me ask, what sound policy, what statesmanship, would justify the exclusion of this freight from the soil of Georgia, driving it around on some other line, because it must pass through the State, if at all, on account of the great distance it has to travel, at a lower rate than we can charge for local freights and continue to live. These freights between New York and Saint Louis must go over some line.

What injury does it do any man, woman, or child in Georgia for it to pass on a Western and Atlantic Green Line car loaded in Savannah across the soil of the State to Saint Louis, which car would otherwise go back empty? None possibly that I can perceive.

If the freight does not go in a car that would otherwise go empty over the line between Savannah and Saint Louis it will go in a car that runs between New York and Saint Louis over one of the trunk lines. If it goes in a car over our Southern line that would otherwise go back empty, and we make $5 for each company on it, it is that much clear profit to the people of Georgia. Then why should it be prohibited?

But you may say that an act of Congress prohibiting transportation of that character will apply as well to the other trunk lines. True; and if so, then it would disturb the whole through business between Eastern cities and the West, and the people would be clamorous for its repeal as soon as they saw the mischievous and injurious impediments which the rule throws in the way of the business of the country.

But it may be said in the case supposed, in carrying the through freight from New York to Saint Louis over the Central road of Georgia, if the company carries it from Savannah to Atlanta for $5 in its transit across the territory the company should not charge more than $5 if the consignee should require it to be taken off the train and delivered at Jonesborough, twenty miles before reaching Atlanta.

In other words, that a car-load of the same character of freight going from New York to Jonesborough, Ga., should only be charged $5 if the company carries a like car-load of through freight consigned to Saint Louis from Savannah to Atlanta, which is twenty miles farther, for $5. In the one case the freight shipped from New York by steamer to Savannah and then shipped by the Central road from Savannah to Jonesborough would be local freight, so far as the Central road is concerned; and if the Central road should be required to transport like freight by car-load from Savannah to Jonesborough, and to put all its local freights at the same rate, its income would not pay one-half of the fixed expense of maintaining and running the road, and bankruptcy would follow.

Then no reasonable man would insist that the Central road should be required to put its local freight at $5 a car-load between Savannah and Jonesborough, as all must admit that the railroad could not run and charge such rates. In the other case the through consignment from New York to Saint Louis reaches Savannah by steamer, and it is put upon a car that is going by the next train from Savannah to Saint Louis for a load of bacon. The car is going empty, as the company has no freight with which to load it. By receiving the consignment from New York to Saint Louis on board the car and charging $5 for transporting it to Atlanta and delivering it to the Western and Atlantic road the company makes $5 clear money, which goes into its general income for its support, and of course charges $5 less on account of local freights. Where is the injustice? Where is the wrong?

But, says the objector, if the company only charges $5 on the through freight from Savannah to Atlanta, three hundred miles, it should not be permitted to charge more than $5 on a car-load of local freight from Savannah to Jonesborough, twenty miles less distance. Why not? It actually costs the company more to deliver it at Jonesborough than at Atlanta.

You may ask me, how? I reply that a car-load of through freight hitched on by the Central at Savannah to a train going to Atlanta is carried through without any necessary stoppage at Jonesborough, and when it reaches Atlanta it is simply uncoupled from the Central train and is coupled to a Western and Atlantic train, which takes it in charge and carries it to Chattanooga and there delivers it to the Nashville, Chattanooga and Saint Louis Railroad. The transfer is made by the simple operation of uncoupling it from one train and coupling it to the other, and the Central road in that case has no delay or stoppage at Jonesborough, and no trouble or expense of switching off the car and delivering the freight; but if it is required to deliver the freight at Jonesborough instead of Atlanta, the train must be stopped at Jonesborough and the car must be switched off from the track to a side track, causing several minutes' delay and consequent expense; for every minute of time lost by a train costs something in the salaries of persons managing the train, in the fuel consumed, in the engine, and other necessary expense.

Then the agent at Jonesborough must take the car in hand, and unload the freight upon a platform, place it in the depot, and roll it out again, and deliver it to the consignee when it is called for.

In the case supposed it actually costs the Central Railway decidedly more to deliver the car at Jonesborough than it would to run the train through to Atlanta, uncouple the car, and turn it over to the Western and Atlantic, which couples it to its train and carries it along. But the more important point is that the Central can not maintain itself and put its local freights as low as $5 a car-load from Savannah to Jonesborough, and it must break down and go into the hands of a receiver if it attempts it, while in the case supposed it can take the car-load of through freight consigned to Saint Louis in a car that would otherwise go empty from Savannah to Atlanta and carry it for $5 and make money on it, and all the money it makes by carrying freight of that character goes to aid in supporting the road and paying its expenses, and to that extent lightens the burdens which have to be put upon local freights for its support.

No citizen of Georgia is injured in the slightest particular by the action of the Central Railroad in loading the Saint Louis freight into the car that would otherwise go empty and transporting it across the territory of the State; while, on the other hand, every citizen who is a patron of the Central Railroad, and has to pay local freights upon it, is to that extent relieved, as his local freights can to that extent be placed at a lower rate; while, therefore, the rule that you shall not carry the same quality and quantity of through freights a longer distance for less money than you carry the like quality and quantity of local freight for a shorter distance is plausible and appears to be right in itself, all railroad experience shows it to be impracticable, seriously disturbing the operations of through transportation, and to be highly detrimental to the commerce of the country.

Many things connected with railroading that seem plausible and right when submitted in the abstract will not work in practice. For instance, the general rule recognized in almost all business transactions that competition, unlimited and uncontrolled competition, is best for the community and for the trade, does not always work, and frequently will not work at all, in railroading.

This proposition may seem to Senators somewhat startling, but it is nevertheless strictly true. As I have already stated, when there is unlimited and uncontrolled competition between different railroad companies in a State, or section of the country of anything like limited boundaries, competition becoming sharp soon results in the failure of the weakest competitor.

Say, for instance, there are three railroad companies competing for the freight of the same section of country, all in condition to serve that section, and competition becomes sharp; they begin to underbid each other for freights; the result is that they soon get the freight so low that the three roads can not support themselves on what each receives as its share of the business at the low rate to which each is driven by the competition, and the result is that the weaker one of the three breaks down and goes into bankruptcy and is sold out, and generally purchased by the strongest of the three. Then the competition is intensified between the remaining two roads, and they cut rates and put down rates until they finally reach the point where the weaker of the two gives way and goes under the marshal's hammer. That is generally purchased by the stronger company, and the three are then consolidated into one and go under one management, and consolidation, as usual, results from unbridled competition in railroading.

So many Southern railroads have gone into bankruptcy by the workings of this system of competition that about ten years ago the remaining companies formed an association known as the Southern Railway and Steamship Association. I had the honor to aid in its organization and to be elected its president, which position I have held ever since. I have had an opportunity, therefore, to watch something of the general workings of the organization, and can speak with some knowledge on the subject. The organization is frequently denominated the pool, because the different companies undertake to pool the business so as to maintain something like reasonable rates, at least rates which will enable them to keep their roads in fair condition to serve the public, whether the stockholders get dividends or not.

Our plan has been in the main to divide the freights and not cut each other's throats by ruinous competition. Take the cotton freights of Atlanta as an illustration. There are seven railroads centering in Atlanta. If we undertook to compete actively and to cut rates every day for the control of the cotton none of the companies would make a dollar by the transportation of it. Instead of that, we agree between ourselves that each company shall have a certain per cent. of the whole amount of cotton to be shipped out. The railroad which has the best facilities for the business, and which has usually carried the most cotton, gets a larger per cent. than the road having inferior facilities that has carried less.

In practice we try each to carry our proportion of the cotton at the rate agreed upon. If one of the companies gets more than its proportion the general commissioner gives notice of that fact, and the company being in excess at once advances its rate to a higher point and the shippers drop over to the other roads that are carrying at the agreed rate. In this way we get a reasonable but really a low rate upon cotton which is sent to Eastern and foreign markets from Atlanta—a rate at which our shippers do not complain.

But it may be said that this places the shipper at the mercy of the pool, and that they may put up the prices to any extent they please and make them exorbitant. The reply is that in practice there has been no such difficulty, and I have never heard a complaint during the ten years that the association has been in existence that the rates fixed were exorbitant. The tendency of all railroad business is to constant reduction of freights; and notwithstanding our efforts to keep freights at a reasonable rate from Atlanta, and from all the other Southern cities, the freights charged by the pool are about one-third lower than they were ten years ago, and nobody complains of them as exorbitant. The association covers the territory between the Ohio and the Atlantic and reaches to the Potomac, and includes all the steamship lines between the Southern cities and the Eastern cities. Assaults have been made upon it on the ground that the association tends to monopoly, but in practice the results have been so favorable that opposition to it from merchants and other interested parties has well-nigh ceased.

I state to the Senate and to the country very frankly that the very object had in view by the companies in the formation of the association was to prevent destructive competition. And just in this connection let me say that unbridled competition, frequent railroad wars, and the cutting of rates at short periods are most detrimental to the merchants and to the business men of the country generally. You may dissolve the Southern Railway and Steamship Association and say that the railroads shall keep up unrestricted competition with one another as long as they are able to fight. While you may have the power to put penalties on us by law to prevent pooling, you have not the power to prevent us from meeting and saying each to the other, we will not charge more than a certain rate, or we will not charge, say, on first-class freights from New York to Atlanta less than a reasonable rate, say $1 per hundred pounds. While we could make this agreement as to maintaining rates, somebody would frequently violate it, as members of the Southern Railway and Steamship Association may do, though it has seldom been done.

But if there is no association and no common arbiter to which the different companies can appeal, the result would frequently be a railroad war and a cut of rates. How will this work? Will it be best for the interest of our merchants and traders and business men generally, or will the wars unsettle business and discriminate most unjustly between different companies engaged in the same branch of business?

Let me show you how it works in practice.

We have two large wholesale dry-goods houses in Atlanta. The Messrs. Moore & Marsh and the Messrs. Kiser. Frequently there is a dispute among their friends as to which firm sells the most. They are all very honorable, high-toned gentlemen. They are the leading houses of our city in their line and do a large business.

We will suppose the Southern Railway and Steamship Association to have been dissolved, and that the railroad lines are left to settle the question between themselves by the rule of unrestricted competition, which will result in frequent wars of rates.

The Messrs. Kiser go to New York at a time when all the roads, by agreement among themselves, are maintaining rates. They buy largely and lay in a very heavy stock of goods for their wholesale house in Atlanta. They then go around to see the different railroad agents in New York, and inquire what they will carry the goods to Atlanta for. It happens to be a time when all the lines are maintaining the rates agreed on among themselves, and the agent of each line answers, the rate on your goods will be a dollar a hundred pounds from New York to Atlanta. Being unable to get the freight for less, they pay the $1 per hundred pounds and their goods are shipped. Two weeks later the railroads disagree; some one has not acted fairly; a war of rates breaks out, and cutting begins.

At this time the agent of the Messrs. Moore & Marsh goes on to buy a large stock for that house. Having made the purchase, he goes around to the office of one of the transportation lines and asks the agent what he will charge to carry his goods to Atlanta.

The agent replies, "We are now cutting rates. The regular rate of freight agreed on would be a dollar a hundred, but I will take your goods for 75 cents a hundred." The merchant then goes to the next agent and he agrees to carry them at 60 cents. The third agrees to carry at 50 cents per hundred pounds, and the trade is closed with him and the goods are shipped, and the Messrs. Moore & Marsh receive their freight from New York paying 50 cents per hundred pounds, while two weeks before the Messrs. Kiser, who bought at a time when the railroads happened to be maintaining rates, were compelled to pay $1 a hundred.

Now the Messrs. Kiser have paid on their large stock from New York to Atlanta just double the amount that the Messrs. Moore & Marsh paid upon theirs.

This is certainly not a desirable state of things when both houses are selling at close profits. It tends to derange business, it is inequitable and unjust as between the different commercial houses; it keeps everything in a feverish state of excitement; merchants do not know when to buy or how heavily to buy, as they do not know when the railroads will maintain the rates and when they will not. But it is a state of things you can not prevent by any law you can pass as long as the system of unbridled competition exists, any more than you can prevent Messrs. Moore & Marsh from selling calico at 8 cents per yard. I presume you will not make it penal for a railroad company to carry goods for less than reasonable charges; you can not make it penal for the railroads to charge a reasonable rate of freight; you can not by law regulate the fluctuations and uncertainties that must always follow competition, resulting as it does frequently in wars of rates between the different companies.

This system works injustice both to the merchant and the purchaser. What the merchant wants is a uniform system, where every man will be charged reasonable prices and no more, and where everybody is charged alike, and that is right. But, as matters now stand in the transportation world, you can get that only under the pooling system. There is no other possible way to reach it in practice. As there has been some sharp criticism of the Southern Railway and Steamship Association, as there must be about the management of all great interests of that character, I want to read here what a very wise and very able man, who is no way connected with the South or with the association, says on the subject—a gentleman who has spent many years of his life in studying the railroad problem, a gentleman who is one of the oldest railroad commissioners in America, a man of high character and distinguished ability as well as of a distinguished family. I refer to Hon. Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts. But before I quote his remarks, I beg to state that he is a member of the railroad commission of Massachusetts, which I think has the best system as administered in that regard of any State in the Union. The main object of the Massachusetts system, as stated by her able Senator the other day, seems to be to throw everything open to the light of day, and when that is done the system regulates itself, and the commission, which has very little power except the power to report to the Legislature, has no trouble in keeping the peace between the railroad companies and the people. Mr. Adams and the commission to which he is attached have, I think, managed the system admirably well in that State.

But I was about to quote the remarks of Mr. Adams in his book on the origin and problem of railroads, in which he discusses the merits of the Southern Railway and Steamship Association, the pooling system, and the system of unbridled competition. I will ask the Secretary to read his remarks, with my comments made on another occasion and in a different forum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

He discusses the railroad problems ably, looks into the whole question, reviews the French system, the English system, the Belgian system, and the German system, and then the American system. Then he refers to the many devices that have existed in the North to prevent the cutting of rates, by those in the West also, and everywhere in the United States, in fact; and he sums it all up by saying in substance that the Southern Railway and Steamship Association has come nearer solving the railroad problem than any other device on earth. After discussing the Vanderbilt power, the Jay Gould power, and the different powers and systems that have been devised to solve the railroad problem, he says (page 197, Railroads: their origin and problems):

"But however this may be, it is a question of the future, and certainly has no immediate bearing on the existing combinations. Of these, the only one that seems entitled to any thoughtful consideration is the Southern Railroad and Steamship Association. So far as the public is concerned, everything essential as a safeguard against abuse seems in the case of that association to be provided. It is a complete, but not a secret combination. It exists in the full light of publicity. The purposes for which it was organized are openly avowed, and its every transaction is, or may easily be made, matter of general observation. To secure this result it would only be necessary to give it legal recognition. By its originator it is confidently claimed that if properly developed and recognized by legislation, it would afford a complete and practical solution of the American railroad problem. Whether it would or not, it is certainly a great advance on any other form of solution which has yet been suggested. It is at once far more philosophical, more practical, and more in consonance with American political usages and modes of thought. Indeed, it is not easy to point out any respect in which it might not fairly be accepted as the natural outgrowth of American railroad development as it has gone on up to this time. The difficulty with all of the many other solutions which have from time to time been suggested has been that they disregarded what had gone before; they were none of them in the nature of a logical sequence or natural outgrowth."

Thus, Mr. President, you see that Mr. Adams gives his sanction to our association as the very best that has been devised, and pronounces it as entitled to more favor than all the rest of the combinations or associations he has discussed; and says it is confidently claimed that it only needs legal recognition to solve the problem. In other words, we meet and agree that we will not cut rates; that we will carry freights at a reasonable price, and that one merchant buying in New York shall have his goods delivered in Atlanta as cheaply as another. There is no legal sanction for that contract. What he means by legal sanction is that the law should come in and say when we make this agreement among ourselves we shall carry it out.

The Massachusetts railroad commissioner, probably the ablest and most distinguished in America, gives us the credit of having devised the wisest solution on earth, needing only legal sanction to make it as nearly perfect as it is possible for it to be.

But Mr. Adams goes further and discusses the questions of combination and competition with a great deal of force. He says (Ibid., page 199):

"Irresponsible and secret combinations among railroads always have existed, and so long as the railroad system continues as it now is they unquestionably always will exist. No law can make two corporations, any more than two individuals, actively undersell each other in any market if they do not wish to do so. But they can only cease to do so by agreeing in public or private on a price below which neither will sell. If they can not do this publicly they assuredly do it secretly. This is what, with all alterations of conflict, the railroad companies always have done in one way or another; and this is what they are now doing and must always continue to do until a complete change of conditions is brought about.

"Against this practice, the moment it begins to assume any character of responsibility or permanence, statutes innumerable have been aimed, and clauses strictly interdicting it have of late been incorporated into several State constitutions. The experience of the last few years, if it has proved nothing else, has conclusively demonstrated how utterly impotent and futile such enactments and provisions necessarily are. Starting, then, from this point—accepting what is and what must continue to be—the fundamental idea of the Southern Steamship and Railroad Association is to legalize a practice which the law can not prevent, and by so doing to enable the railroads to confederate themselves in a manner which shall be at once both public and responsible. This is the railroad side of the question. The other side of the question—that of the public—admits of a statement equally clear. Its essential point, however, is that through this process, and this process only, can the railroad system, as an organized whole, be brought face to face with any public and controlling force, whether of law or public opinion.

"Once let railroad companies confederate in accordance with law, and the process through which this all-important confronting result would be brought about is apparent. The confederation would be a responsible one, with power to enforce its own decisions upon its own members. The principles upon which it could act, as a creature of the law, would be formulated in the law. It could compel obedience, but obedience only to legal decrees, and the question in each case would be whether the decree was legal. At exactly this point the machinery for State supervision would come into play in the form of a special tribunal, like those which have already been provided in England and France or that now being matured in the Prussian Parliament. The field of discussion before this tribunal would be commensurate with the whole subject of transportation by rail, including questions not only of law but of economy. Then at last the correct principles governing railroad traffic would be in course of rapid development. The essential features of what constitutes discrimination and extortion would gradually be formulated into rules; and the moment that is accomplished competition will work equitably."

As I had occasion to say in the earlier part of this argument, this question has undergone a great deal of investigation in England. There is a road there called the Northeastern. The competition was very strong between that and other roads that traverse the same territory.

That competition produced the usual results that follow unbridled competition. What are they? Suppose you provide by law that nothing shall interfere, that it shall go on unbridled. What is the result? That state of things can not last long till the weakest road will become insolvent and will go into bankruptcy and be sold under the marshal's hammer and the strongest road buys it. The strong road is then still stronger, for it has absorbed that competitor and turns it into a feeder. That gun is spiked. The competition goes on and the next weaker one goes under, and so on, and so on, till all the weaker ones have gone under. The last trial of strength has to be between the two strongest, and when one of these goes under the other is left supreme. Then where is your competition? On that subject Mr. Adams says (Ibid, page 207):

"The Northeastern Railway is composed of thirty-seven lines, several of which formerly competed with each other. Before their amalgamation they had, generally speaking, high rates and fares and low dividends. The system is now the most complete monopoly in the United Kingdom. From Tyne to the Humber, with one local exception, it has the country to itself, and it has the lowest rates and highest dividends of any large English railway. It has had little or no litigation with other companies. While complaints have been heard from Lancashire and Yorkshire, where there are so-called competing lines, no witness has appeared to complain of the Northeastern, and the general feeling in the district it serves appears favorable to its management."

Again Mr. Adams says (Ibid, page 208): "There is scarcely a section of the United States which could not tell of an experience very like the English one just referred to. Massachusetts, for instance, could supply a well-known case in point. Of two sections of that State, lying north and south of the city of Boston—the one known as the Cape Ann and the other as the Cape Cod district—the first has from the beginning been served by two rival lines, whose whole history has been one long trial of strength, resulting at last in the absolute ruin of one and in the severe crippling of the other. How many millions of dollars were recklessly squandered in the long course of the struggle it is impossible to compute. While the Cape Ann district has thus enjoyed the benefits of the railroad competition, the southern, or Cape Cod, district has, on the other hand, been served by a single consolidated corporation, the cardinal principle with which has been monopoly. It appropriated to itself a certain district, and that district it undertook to furnish with all reasonable railroad facilities; but within the limits of its own territory it did not propose to tolerate any rival. The result in these two cases, whether in accordance with theory or not, is confirmatory of experience."

Again he says (Ibid, page 210): "The reliance on competition seems to give throughout a false direction to public opinion as respects railroads. They are looked upon as something alien, if not hostile. The public welfare is associated in the popular mind with their misfortunes. On the other hand, the intelligent and peaceful operation of a consolidated company is generally followed by a sense of responsibility on the one side and of ultimate friendliness on the other."

Again he says (on page 214): "Owing to the extremely complicated character of the American railroad system, rendering anything like a territorial division among corporations impossible, results here work their way out slowly. When they do work their way out, however, it is apt to be on a large scale and in a way not easily susceptible of change. So far as any progress has yet been made it is obviously in the direction indicated—the development of Government supervision on the one side and the concentration of railroads to escape competition on the other. The manner, indeed, in which, starting from different standpoints of interest and opposite sections of the country, the Massachusetts commission and the Southern Railway and Steamship Association have unconsciously worked toward a common ground is noticeable. On the one hand, the whole effort of the commission has been to develop a tribunal which, in all questions affecting the relations of the railroad system to the community, should secure publicity and that correct understanding of the principles upon which only legislation of any permanent value can be based, and which is reached through intelligent public investigation. That secured, all else might safely be left to take its own course. A sufficient responsibility would be secured to afford a guarantee against abuse. On the other hand, the fundamental idea of the association, without the realization of which it remains incomplete, is to so confederate the railroad system that the members of it should be amenable to control, and that responsibility should attach to it. Could the two results be brought about the machinery would be complete. The confederated railroad system would confront the Government tribunal, and be directly responsible to public opinion. This is almost precisely the result arrived at in France and in Great Britain, and is that contemplated in Germany."

This, then, is the Southern Railway and Steamship Association, and these are the comments made by one of the ablest men in the United States, who has been longer a railroad commissioner, probably, than any other man connected with the system. And I must say, with all due deference to my friends here, that Mr. Adams's remarks and their speeches are very unlike each other. He shows that unbridled competition leads to the bankruptcy of all the weaker companies and to ultimate consolidation, and that the Southern Railway and Steamship Association would be, with legal sanction, the very best solution of the railroad problem.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I have had read these extracts from the writings of a very able man, who has probably studied the railroad problem with as much or more care than any other man in this country, who understands the practical workings of it, and whose high character entitles him to respectful consideration.

I have now gone through the argument which I desired to submit, and before I take my seat I wish to say in conclusion that a great many good people in this country, as well in the Northern and Western States as in the Southern States, feel that the tendency of the times is to a constant enlargement of the powers of the Federal Government, both in theory and in practice. From year to year we are organizing commissions on various subjects filled by gentlemen who receive from the Treasury of the United States large salaries. We are enlarging the powers and the practice of the Government greatly beyond the point which was recognized as proper for the exercise of these powers by all sections of the Union twenty-five years ago, and we now propose by this legislation to take one of the most far-reaching steps of any that has yet been taken.

As very properly stated by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] a few days since, the internal and interstate commerce of the United States is probably eight or ten times as large as the whole of our foreign commerce, and that runs to an enormous sum.

Now we propose by this legislation that the United States Government, under the plea of regulating interstate commerce, shall take charge of, or supervision over, this immense business.

We may first appoint a commission composed of a small number of persons. In practice it will soon be found that they need numerous assistants and subagents scattered all over this country. The job we are undertaking will be entirely too large for any five, or seven, or ten men, without an enormous retinue of subalterns. What commission at Washington can grasp this whole subject and look into all the details of railroad transportation? It is simply out of the question, and in practice it will soon be found so, and the position will then be taken that it is absolutely necessary to increase the force, and it will grow from one point to another, until the agents of the Government in a few years will be found located in all parts of the Union supervising this immense interest.

At present we propose only to take charge of the railroads. What just reason exists for regulating them that does not apply as well to the internal commerce of the country conducted on the rivers by steamers? And if we regulate all that, then why not appoint a commission to regulate our foreign commerce, over which we have the same power?

While I think a commission with limited powers, as in the case of Massachusetts and Great Britain, the best regulation that the subject is susceptible of, still there is great risk even in that. As between that, however, and more radical legislation, I have no hesitation in favoring the commission. But I think we should consider very maturely before we act whether we are not, in attempting to regulate some evils which now exist, taking steps that will in the end produce greater evils by interruptions and impediments to be thrown in the way of the legitimate commerce of the country. The bill passed by the House of Representatives will, in my opinion, if it becomes a law, result most disastrously to the whole internal commerce and carrying business of the country.

I could under no circumstances give my sanction to a measure fraught with the innumerable evils which I see must result from such legislation as is proposed in that bill. But while I can not support that bill under any circumstances as it now stands, I am prepared to vote for a commission with proper powers of investigation and report, leaving the true regulation of this great class of common carriers where the common law leaves it, which indeed, after all, is the wisest solution; or if that will not do, let us then arm the commission with powers to lay down and enforce some general and just rules as a solution of this great problem. We can never regulate all the details of our internal transportation by legal enactments. If we do we, will cripple our internal commerce to an extent that will be most disastrous to all the great interests of the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SLATER. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is the one pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been agreed to as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it seems like a reasonable thing to say that a railroad company shall not charge more for a shorter distance than for a greater distance for hauling freight, and yet I can not bring my mind to an approval of the amendment upon which we are about to vote. Briefly, I wish to put a practical test of the amendment and its results before the Senate.

Let me take as an illustration a train-load of wheat to be transported 1,000 miles at a rate of 40 cents per hundred pounds, which all agree would be a low rate. A car-load of wheat at that rate transported a thousand miles would earn $80. That is the low rate on the long haul. Now, it is said that no greater rate shall be charged for a short haul than for a long one. The train conveying that wheat would earn for each hundred miles $8 per car. This would be at the rate of eight-tenths of 1 cent per ton per mile of haul. That, it seeems to me, is a very low rate, yet the amendment upon which we are about to vote would authorize the same aggregate rate to be charged for a short haul.

Now, let us take the short haul of one hundred miles. The train conveying wheat for one hundred miles would earn $80 per car, which would be 8 cents a ton per mile; and if it should convey that wheat but ten miles, which would be a still shorter distance, the amendment would allow a charge of 80 cents a ton per mile for transporting that freight.

It seems to me that we can not afford to put into the laws of the United States an authorization to the transporting companies to make any such charges or lay any such burdens upon the interstate commerce of the country. It is an easy thing to discuss a question of this character in general terms, but when we come to apply it to the practical operation of commerce we find very many difficulties in the way.

I said in some remarks that I made on this subject on the 5th of this month, that while I should be very glad to get rid of the principle that is here involved to a reasonable extent, I can see no way at this time to apply the rule of the amendment, inasmuch as our present system as established and enforced compels a general centralization, which requires the surplus products of this country, either manufactures or agriculture, to be transported over great distances. I said further on that occasion that until we change this system by proper legislation and its administration in such manner as to shorten the haul between producers and consumers, the people of the country residing in the remote interior must have the advantage of the lower rate on the long haul.

On another occasion I made some remarks on this subject, from which I will read an extract or two. I then said:

> Another has well said that the unit of profit in railroad management is a car-wheel in motion, and that the unit of loss is a car-wheel at rest. Each represents a proportional amount of fixed capital. The fixed capital is the total cost of the road. The wheel in motion is a worker, earning money to pay interest and meet expenses. The wheel at rest earns nothing, and, consequently, increases the burden that the worker carries. Here we have the entire philosophy of successful railroad management, both as regards the corporations themselves and the people and sections of country which they serve. The wheel which carries freight 1,000 miles has more steady employment than the one that traverses ten miles.

And yet I may say that the pending amendment proposes to give to the wheel working for ten miles the same compensation that is given to the one working a thousand miles.

> Therefore it can afford to work for a lower rate of wages. This means a low rate for a long haul and a higher rate for a short haul. This is the whole story. It discloses the principle that develops regions remote from market and converts waste places into gardens.

Pursuing this subject further, I said:

> Who has been wronged by the application of the low rate to the long haul? Has harm come to the East by it? Why, the millions of people of the Western States, who depend on the practice of this rule to get their vast products to the world's markets, are most generous contributors to the prosperity of the East. They are liberal consumers of everything which the East manufactures. The low rate for a long haul of the manufactured articles of the East promotes consumption in the West. This keeps the Eastern spindles in motion, and they consume the cotton of the South. It keeps the looms in action, and they use the wool of all sections of the country. It fills the furnaces and forges and rolling-mills with orders. It deepens and extends the mines, and creates a market for the product. It fills manufacturing localities with dense populations, and thus secures to the Eastern agriculturist a home market and good prices for all of the products of his farm. In every way it benefits the East. Does it harm the country at large? Look at the balance of trade against Europe in our favor—

Which was larger at the time I made these remarks than now—

> What would it have been but for the enormous crops of the West and the low rate for the long haul which carries them to market? This it was that brought the cattle, sheep, hogs, wheat, flour, corn, and other products from the remote West, and sent them abroad to feed the people of the Old World. This it was that largely made up for our balance of trade, and brought home your bonds and gave us the coin of Europe. No such results would have been realized but for the wondrous development of the West, and that development could not have occurred under the fourth section of this bill—which section contained the proposition embraced in this amendment.

Now, Mr. President, apply to the conditions of the country the change which I advocated in my former remarks, it will bring about a shortening of the haul and a change of the system which now centralizes everything in a few centers, and then let your low rate on the long haul apply to the surplus that must go abroad, and you will have a very complete and perfect system of transportation.

I do not care at this time to occupy longer the attention of the Senate, but I felt that I could not vote upon the pending amendment without explaining in some degree the reasons which will control my vote against it.

Mr. CAMDEN. Mr. President, in the remarks I shall make upon the amendment under consideration I will not attempt to go into the history and growth of railroads further than to repeat in substance what was said by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], that it has been only about fifty years since railroad transportation by steam was first known, and within that time the business of the world has been revolutionized, and the history of that revolution has been more marked in the United States than in any other country. Within that fifty years there has been built in this country 125,000 miles of railroad, and the wealth of production and development created would have occupied centuries at any other period of the world's history. These 125,000 miles of railroad have cost, at a low estimate, for construction, equipment, double tracks, sidings, shops, terminal facilities, &c., at least $40,000 per mile, making five billions of money actually invested. This enormous sum of five billions, or $5,000,000,000, is held by all classes and conditions of people scattered over the whole country, and is not owned and controlled by those engaged in operating and controlling the management of railroads, as is assumed by many. It is true that there are a few noted instances of immense fortunes accumulated in the hands of individuals by the manipulation of railroad interests and railroad stocks, but the number of these conspicuous fortunes, which stand out as fingerboards pointing to mismanagement and oppression in railroad management, are exceptional, and point only to Wall street speculations, and not to fortunes made by earnings in operating railroads.

As a rule railroad investments have not paid well on the money actually invested. It is safe to say that there has been as much unremunerative money invested in railroads as there have been exceptionally remunerative investments, based upon the actual cost of the roads, but the exceptionally remunerative investments attract attention, while the vast amount invested which is either lost entirely through bankruptcy or fails to pay dividends is lost sight of. Just as the few large fortunes made in mining stand out in bold relief, while the thousands who fail and lose all they have are forgotten. As I stated before, the development on this continent in the last half century, or, in fact, I may say in the last thirty years, has been unprecedented; and the wealth created to the people of this country by this railroad development has been greatly in excess of the wealth created to the railroads themselves and to the investors in them. Occupying the position of a Senator on this floor, I recognize the fact that it is just as much the duty of Congress to protect the property of the people of this country represented by one species of property as of another, and to protect property represented by railroad securities as it is to protect the interests of the people invested in any other property, whether it be in lands, in manufactories, in mines, or in the bonds of the Government, for very large amounts of these railroad securities are held by those who may not be able to protect themselves—by families, by minors, by trust estates, and charitable institutions.

The few conspicuous instances of overgrown fortunes resulting from railroad manipulation and railroad mismanagement have tended to create a prejudice in the minds of the people against the whole railroad management of the country, and I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment there are evils existing that ought to be corrected, but it should be done wisely and carefully. The system has grown up gradually under the care and best attention of the very ablest men in the country, men who have devoted themselves faithfully and honestly to the study of these railroad problems, and while this study was directed mainly to the interests of the railroads they meant to study and advance also the interests of the people who were their patrons, because, on general principles, it was their interest to do so. As this railroad system and its management has grown and perfected itself gradually without legislative restrictions, so must we arrive at a system of legislative restrictions and control gradually and carefully, otherwise we might disarrange and confuse the greatest and most largely distributed property interest of this country.

Entertaining these views I favor a railroad commission, with a few general rules laid down for their guidance, as a starting point in this undertaking, rather than any legislation prescribing arbitrary and inflexible rules of law to be applied to their government all at once. It is not reasonable to suppose that Congress could safely overturn at once, with its imperfect knowledge of railroading, the rules and principles that able men who have devoted a lifetime to the practical study and operation of railroads have established, without doing more or less violence to the railroad system and to the people.

In my judgment, many of the evils complained of against the railroads are the result of unwise and undue competition between the roads, which forces them to do things which are unnatural and unhealthy in a business point of view, and I believe that careful and progressive legislation will result in great advantage to the railroads as well as to the people by protecting the roads from the necessities of their own errors, for in nine cases out of ten the unwise action of one road in making undue discrimination forces all the other competing roads not only to do the same thing and to adopt for the time being the same policy, but even at times to go to a further extreme in the same direction.

It is now a well-established principle in railroading that the movement of car-loads of freight costs the railroad so much per ton per mile on the average. This amount is ascertained and known by each road with almost mathematical exactness. We may assume, if you please, for illustration, that this cost is at the average rate of 1 cent per ton per mile for all the freight hauled over the whole line of road, and it is equally well known that long hauls can be made at somewhat less cost in proportion than short hauls. It is, therefore, a fundamental principle in railroading that the average rates of tonnage per mile must be kept up to a point necessary to yield the road a fair profit on its capital from its gross business. Now, when a road takes its through freight from competitive points on a long haul at less than it can afford to do the business per mile and make a profit, or at less than it can afford to do the business and pay actual expenses, it must make up the deficiency on its average business from non-competitive points between the starting place and the market to be reached, and the lower it is forced to take through freight the higher it must charge on its local freight.

This is the result of competition forced upon railroads by themselves rather than their voluntary action. For it is fair to presume that railroads as a matter of business would not of choice discriminate unjustly between shippers, but would equalize rates to a reasonable extent to produce the average earnings per mile required if they could follow out their own judgment of what would be equitable and fair and their own inclinations to do it.

Among the rules that may be safely laid down for the guidance of the commission I favor the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, which embodies the principle that railroads shall not charge a greater amount for a short haul over the same road in the same direction than it does for a longer haul. And I do it not only in the interest of the people, but in the interest of the railroads themselves, as a means of enabling the railroads to do the very thing they would do from choice if they had the power to regulate it. This amendment seems to have been misunderstood by the Senator from Georgia or is misunderstood by me and, I think, by the Senate. The Senator from Georgia assumes that the amendment means that it shall be so much per mile instead of so much per hundred pounds or so much by the car-load, and the illustrations given by the Senator with so much force are not applicable to the meaning of this amendment or to the same provision in the Reagan bill.

This amendment means, as illustrated by the Senator from Georgia, that if a car-load of freight was shipped from a hundred miles north of Marietta, Ga., to Atlanta, at $40 per car, the rate from Marietta to Atlanta, which is less than one-half the distance, shall not be more than $40. Or, if a car-load of freight was shipped from twenty miles north of Marietta to Atlanta at $20, that the rate on a car-load shipped from Marietta to Atlanta should not exceed $20. And so on from Atlanta, Ga., via Marietta, to the farthest point on the through line. Or, taking Atlanta as the point to be reached, a point twenty miles distant shall not be charged a greater rate for a car-load than is charged on a car-load from a point thirty miles distant, and the point thirty miles distant shall not be charged a higher rate on a car-load than is charged from a point fifty miles distant, and so on to the end of the line.

To illustrate it more forcibly: If the seat of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], which is on the middle aisle of this Chamber, represent a distant competing point for freight which is to be transported to a market represented by the seat of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], which is on the extreme left of the Chamber, and the seat of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] represents one-third of the distance between the two points, and the seat of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] represents another one-third of the distance between the two points, then a car-load of grain, or flour, or live-stock starting from a point represented by the seat of the Senator from Georgia comes up one-third of the distance to the point represented by the seat of the Senator from Missouri and there another car-load is taken on, it shall not be charged a greater amount for the two-thirds of the distance than was charged for the whole distance; and passing on up another one-third of the distance to a point represented by the seat of the Senator from Tennessee and there takes on another car-load, it shall not be charged a greater amount for the one-third of the remaining distance than was charged for the last car taken at two-thirds of the distance, which would be transported double the distance of the last car.

This gives the railroad a very large margin of discretion in fixing their local rates. As was stated by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON], and by other Senators, it would enable railroads to charge as much for one-half the distance as for double the distance. But this is not complained of to any great extent by shippers; the people are willing to pay the roads fair prices. As a general thing complaints are not that rates are too high. But what is complained of, and what shippers consider unfair discrimination, is the fact that in some instances shippers engaged in the same business, situated at points more distant from market than those nearer the same market, should have freight pass by their own doors at a lower rate than they are paying to reach the same point of destination. This, too, is of vital importance to many shippers, as many heavy articles which are produced at close margins of profit might enable the more distant shipper to undersell and drive from the market the manufacturer or shipper who is nearer the market.

This also results in driving manufactories to the important centers of railroad competition in order to get cheap freights, to the detriment of the towns better suited for the same manufactories, but lacking in railroad competition, to insure better rates given to more favored points by competition.

I desire here to say in reply to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that shippers do not complain of the cheap rates given to the long hauls from the West. They have no objection to that. What shippers occupying a middle position do object to is that the far-distant shipper shall ship the same class of freight past their doors at a less rate than is given the nearer shipper.

In my judgment there can be no good reason assigned to justify railroads in making these discriminations, and I do not think they do make them from choice, but from necessity, to bring up their average earnings.

There can be no more reason for a railroad charging more for half the labor than for twice the amount of labor than there would be for any other interest governed by the rules affected by machinery and labor, or than there would be for charging more for making one plow than for making two plows, or for a cart to charge more for carrying a load half a mile than it would for a mile over the same road; or for a hod-carrier to charge more to carry brick to the first story of a house than he would to carry the same brick to the second story over the same ladder by which he reached the first story. The cost of transportation to a railroad is measured by the wear and tear of the road and equipment and the expenses per mile for fuel and labor in moving the train; and there is no theory that I have ever seen advanced that satisfies my mind that these physical conditions are varied to any great extent per mile in proportion to the distance.

I am, therefore, fully persuaded that this is a wise provision to be inserted as one of the rules to govern the action of the commission, and I shall vote for it.

I believe this amendment will go further to correct the evils complained of by the people than everything else that can be placed in a bill regulating interstate commerce, and it is also in the interest of the railroads. What the people want is an approximate uniformity in rates. They do not care to the same extent about what the rates are. They are willing that the railroads shall have paying rates; but they do complain of one section getting cheaper rates at the expense of another section, which is charged higher rates to make up the deficiency produced by the cheaper rates.

The criticism of the Senator from New Jersey, that this amendment can only reach railroads that pass into or through more than one State and can not affect freights carried by roads wholly in one State is true, but the argument does not furnish a reason why Congress should not pass rules regulating interstate commerce. The argument of the Senator means that the New York Central or the Erie Railroad might carry freight coming from beyond their State lines through the State to New York at nominal rates, and make the shippers along the line of its road in New York pay the transportation for shippers outside of the State. This is a very extreme view to be taken, and it is not to be presumed that railroads would voluntarily brave public opinion to do such acts of injustice or that the Legislature of the State of New York would permit it. It is rather to be presumed that if the Congress of the United States makes fair and just rules governing interstate commerce to be carried out by a railroad commission, the roads not controlled by the laws relating to interstate commerce would adopt the same principle as applied to their local shippers. Public opinion would require it, and the Legislatures of the States would, when necessary, place their States in accord with the national legislation affecting interstate commerce.

Mr. BROWN. My friend the honorable Senator from West Virginia states that either he does not understand the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] as amended by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] or that I do not. It is very true we do not understand it alike.

I wish to refer to the bill passed by the House of Representatives and see what its language is; also to the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon to the bill now pending. It seems to me there is scarcely any reason for dispute about this question. It is very true, if it should pass into a law, that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon would embrace the cases suggested by my friend from West Virginia; but it is not true, I think, that those are all the class of cases that it would embrace. It would also embrace the class of cases mentioned by me in my remarks yesterday evening.

The fourth section of what is known as the Reagan bill reads as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance, which includes the shorter, on any one railroad or pipe-line; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road or pipe-line in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

It seems to me if that provision means anything it means that a railroad company engaged in the transportation of property shall in no case charge or receive a greater compensation for carrying the same kind and quality of freight a shorter distance than it charges for carrying a longer distance. Now let us see what the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is. It reads:

Or shall charge or receive any greater compensation for transporting a similar amount and kind of property a shorter distance than for a longer distance over the same line of road and in the same direction.

And then the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi has been added:

But this provision shall not be construed to legalize the charging as much for a shorter as for a longer distance in any case.

That clearly, if I understand it, prohibits any railroad company from receiving a greater compensation for carrying a similar amount and kind of property a shorter distance than it charges for a longer distance, and in every case where the same property is carried a shorter distance and more charged upon it than is charged for a longer distance, or where it is carried a longer distance and less charged than is charged for a shorter distance, it is a violation of the rule.

As I have stated, I admit that the instances mentioned by my friend from West Virginia fall within the rule of prohibition, should it become a law, but the case that I supposed falls equally within it, and there are hundreds of other cases that have not been enumerated here which fall within it and the range of the whole transportation business of this country.

I supposed this case: A cargo of corn carried from Marietta to Atlanta, Ga., twenty miles, on the Western and Atlantic Railroad, to be put at the rate of $5 for the local freight. Then I supposed a like cargo of corn carried from Kansas City, Mo., to Atlanta, a thousand miles, for a lower rate of freight; and I showed that if you charged the same rate on the car-load of corn from Kansas City to Atlanta that you charged from Marietta to Atlanta it would cost $250 freight to carry three hundred and fifty bushels of corn a thousand miles. Then I supposed that a car-load of freight be carried twenty-five miles, or at the rate of twenty-five miles, for $4, the distance between Kansas City and Atlanta being a thousand miles, and the carrying the car-load at $4 for every twenty-five miles, when it reached a point five miles above Marietta on the Western and Atlantic Railroad it would travel the last twenty-five miles over the Western and Atlantic for $4, while the car-load of local freight from Marietta to Atlanta, five miles less, would pay $5. If that does not violate this provision of both the Reagan bill as passed by the House and the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon then I confess I do not understand the meaning of the English language. If you carry the same car-load of corn twenty-five miles from a point five miles above Marietta to Atlanta for $4, and charge $5 for carrying it from Marietta to Atlanta, twenty miles, you would surely have charged a less rate for carrying the like freight a longer distance.

I cited this to illustrate the numerous instances that might be mentioned where the passage of such a law as this would be extremely mischievous. The trouble is it embraces so much more than its advocates seem to understand it to embrace that they fall into the error of supposing that the construction put upon it would only embrace the extreme cases they mention. For these extreme cases neither my friend from Oregon nor my friend from West Virginia needs this amendment at all.

I believe my friend from Oregon mentioned an incident where the Union Pacific carried a car-load the whole length of the road for $200, and charged $400 for carrying it a shorter distance than the whole length. He does not need his amendment to meet that case, because the body of either of these bills, if passed, declares that such a charge for a short haul would be an unreasonable charge. It is true it would fall within the amendment if the amendment should prevail; but the case I put would also fall under it. While it would not be the glaring case of injustice mentioned by the Senator in the instance stated by him, still it would be a case of carrying a car-load of corn for a greater rate for a shorter than for a longer distance. I think he would accomplish his object by proceeding against the company under the provision that the company shall not charge unreasonable rates, without embarrassing the through commerce of the country in the case supposed by him.

I believe this is all the reply I desire to make to my friend from West Virginia.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have no purpose to make any extended remarks, but as I intend to vote against this amendment I desire briefly to state the reasons why.

I have no delicacy whatever in voting to undertake—I do not precisely say to what extent—the regulation of commerce between the States by rail as well as otherwise. These great corporations are a product of modern civilization and an immense factor in the progress of the race; but we are to remember that they have extraordinary powers. They have eternal life given them by the law, the power to acquire, and the right to hold to all eternity what they may acquire, in which respects they surpass any power held by private individuals or any power ever held by the nobility of any nation.

I do not accede to the apparent claim of some gentlemen that they may be trusted so always to govern themselves as to act in harmony with the rights and best interests of the people. I believe they are quite as likely to trespass as individuals are. We have precedent enough for the regulation of them in the conduct of many of the States. In my own State we have a railroad commission, which has given great satisfaction and been of very great use there. Its duties cover a multitude of details with regard to the construction and management of railways, the manner of crossing highways, for example, the manner of crossing streams, the nature of their bridges, the sufficient accommodation for passengers in their cars, the nature of the signals to be put up at the crossing of highways and the crossing of other railways, the manner in which they shall cross navigable streams, halting before drawbridges. Scores of provisions in our statutes show that our Legislature has undertaken to assist in the government of railways notwithstanding the assumption of supreme wisdom on their part, and it has been for the good of the people. Some years ago a railway train plunged into an abyss there, through a drawbridge being left carelessly open, and twenty, thirty, or forty lives were lost. That led to the beginning of legislation in our State on the subject, and the work has proved beneficial to the people and satisfactory.

Now, there prevails throughout the country a very considerable degree of uneasiness in regard to what are alleged to be the encroachments of railways. It is, I take it from reading and observation, the general judgment of the men wisest in these matters that it is time for the Federal Government to take some position with regard to the regulation of commerce between the States. It is useless, however, in my judgment, to undertake to go into details, as some seem to desire; it is unwise to attempt to cover the whole ground now; and therefore, as a member of the Railroad Committee, and I might say perhaps of the subcommittee that assisted in preparing this bill, I accepted for myself the general judgment of the men wisest in these matters, who decided that we should begin with what we are generally agreed upon; that is, that there should be a national commission, and that we should progress slowly, tentatively, acquiring whatever information is necessary to wise legislation that it may be possible to get through that commission.

It is possible we may proceed some time or other—yes, we must proceed to consider the matters proposed in what is known as the Reagan bill; but we are not agreed upon that; we are very far from being agreed upon it. We shall perhaps come nearer to a unanimous judgment, or there will be a decided majority for something or other, it may be, within two or three or four years after we shall have thoroughly informed ourselves through a commission. Some gentlemen will say the commission has too limited powers and is likely to be of little practical use. Anything that affords a vent for the popular dissatisfaction, or a tribunal to which it may appeal, before which it may lay its grievances, and by which commission those grievances may be formulated and well stated to the public, is a relief and is wise legislation; and some things, it is possible, that are now matters of common complaint and criticism may be dissipated entirely by such thorough investigation and collation of facts as a commission might be able to lay before us.

Many who now, without any such relief and in the continued silence of the Federal Government, would continue to organize and agitate, could then go before the commission and make their arguments, present their facts, and make their appeals, and insist that they be laid before the Federal Government. That of itself, supposing the object of the commission to be nothing but the collation of facts and the giving of advice, will provide a popular relief and a popular satisfaction.

What I might do with regard to the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon, if driven to a final conclusion upon it now, I do not say; I am not quite able to say. I can not for my life, however, see why a railroad company which gets its enormous powers for the benefit of the people has a moral right to charge less for carrying goods 1,200 miles than it charges for carrying them a thousand miles. I do not see how it can be made just that goods shall be carried past my town of Hartford to Boston for less than they can be carried to Hartford, and that the cheapest way shall be to let the goods be carried first to Boston and then brought back to Hartford. It is very difficult to make us concede that there is no possible remedy for this.

So, then, while I perceive that our Western friends are willing that we shall suffer in this way, we do not feel quite as they do about it. I say, however, that I am not ready to take up, consider, and vote upon some or at present any of the various remedies proposed, some of which are contained in the Reagan bill. I would rather wait for such information as the commission might be able to lay before us.

Let me say, speaking in regard to the short-haul matter, that it is practically within the power of great railroads and combinations of railroads now, I may say, to depopulate certain localities, to carry business around them, to destroy them as centers of manufacturing and business in general. I have known in my own town a large wholesale concern compelled by the railroad necessities to transfer its main office of business to the city of Boston. I am not willing to concede that these great servants of ours, beneficial as they are to modern civilization, shall have within their power the possibility of crushing out a man or a locality. I do not think it demanded by any of the supposed necessities of trade. I think we are likely to carry to an excess the doctrine of laissez faire—let it go; let them slide; leave all to competition; competition is the solvent of everything. We know, sir, that it is not by any manner of means.

These great corporations assume to themselves a power which in my opinion abstractly they have no right to exercise. But I shall be led off into a general discussion of matters that I would rather wait for until this commission shall have had a year to act. That we shall be compelled to do something, I have no manner of doubt; that we ought as a Federal Government to do something, I have no manner of doubt; and that we have the constitntional power to do something—I do not say how much—no man can possibly question. We have barely touched the exercise of it, but we have done enough to show that we assume the power, as the Government did in the case of the New Jersey railroads, where it provided for the right of a railroad to carry passengers, freight, &c., upon reasonable terms, and conferred the right to make connection with railroads outside of the State, which destroyed the famous New Jersey monopoly, by which all of us in the East paid a dollar to the support of the State of New Jersey every time we came in this direction. And again, we have virtually asserted our right to a certain control over interstate commerce by the law concerning the transportation of cattle.

For the present I coincide with the Railroad Committee in saying that we ought to begin with what is very generally demanded by the best students of this great question, a commission with comparatively limited powers to study the subject carefully, and proceed as may seem best afterward. So I shall be compelled now, standing by my committee, to vote against this amendment of the Senator from Oregon, without committing myself precisely to what I might do if I considered it in place now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon as amended on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi. Upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 11, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—11.

Camden,	Fair,	Slater,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Kenna,	Vance,	Voorhees.
Coke,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,

NAYS—32.

Allison,	Frye,	Jackson,	Platt,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Butler,	Hale,	Lapham,	Ransom,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Mitchell,	Sheffield,
Conger,	Hawley,	Morgan,	Sherman,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Walker,
Dolph,	Ingalls,	Pike,	Wilson.

ABSENT—33.

Aldrich,	Farley,	Lamar,	Plumb,
Bayard,	Garland,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Beck,	George,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Blair,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Bowen,	Groome,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Call,	Hampton,	Miller of Cal.,	Williams.
Colquitt,	Hill,	Miller of N. Y.,
Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Palmer,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Pendleton,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move to amend, in line 7, section 4—I am using the original print of the bill; I do not know whether the print before the Secretary is the same—after the word "under," by inserting "substantially;" so as to read, "in a like business, and under substantially similar circumstances and conditions."

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In the next line, after the word "conditions," it seems to me there ought to be some word introducing the element of time. The clause as it now reads is:

> For doing for him, in a like business and under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, a like service.

It does not seem to have any limit as to time. That is, if a greater charge were made for a like service rendered next week than was made for one rendered to-day, it might be subject to the restrictions of the bill. That certainly is not the intention. I move therefore to insert the word, for want of a better one, "contemporaneously" after the word "conditions," in line 8 of section 4; so as to read, "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions and contemporaneously, a like service."

Mr. ALLISON. That is, at a particular time.

Mr. HARRISON. About the same time, I would intend to mean; not that they should be punished for adopting a different rate a week apart. Unless there is some objection suggested to the use of that word, I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 8, after the word "conditions," it is proposed to insert "contemporaneously."

Mr. CULLOM. I believe I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In the same line the conjunction "and" is used. I think it should be "or." The intention of the bill evidently was to describe two offenses here. The first is "directly or indirectly, by any rebate, drawback, or other device," collecting a greater compensation; and the second is——

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, to strike out, on line 8, the second word "and" and insert "or;" so as to read, "or if any such transportation company shall neglect," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In the same section, in line 8, it will be noticed that the provision reads as follows:

If any such transportation company shall neglect or refuse to furnish the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of interstate commerce freights to one person that is at the same time furnished to any other person for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of such freights of the same class.

I move to insert, after the word "class," the words "and under substantially similar circumstances."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In the first section of the bill, line 6, I move to strike out "five" and insert "nine;" and in line 8, after the word "Senate," to insert "one of whom shall be selected from each judicial circuit in the United States."

The object of my amendment is that these commissioners shall be distributed over every portion of our country, in order that they may properly listen to, hear, and correct inequalities and injustice in each particular locality. I think it will be almost impossible for this to be done with five commissioners. Necessarily a portion of these commissioners will be compelled to remain here in Washington nearly all the time, and it seems to me that if this matter is worth regulating at all it is worth having a sufficient number of men to compose the personnel of the commission, to hear and decide all the complaints that may come before them. It is certainly the most important question that can be placed in the hands of any number of men. Then, as provided under this bill, they will have very large powers, at least compared with the existing laws on our statute-book in reference to interstate commerce. Therefore I think the number ought to be increased, and I am rather fortified in this by observing that the bill which was passed by the House of Representatives, I think in the Forty-third Congress, provided for nine commissioners.

I submit these suggestions to the Committee on Railroads, and to the chairman of that committee, with a view to ascertain what particular reasons led the committee to limit the number to five persons.

Mr. CULLOM. The committee in the consideration of the question of number only arrived at the number specified in the bill as a sort of compromise between the number fixed in the House committee bill, which was finally voted down, which provided for only three commissioners, and the number nine that had been suggested in previous bills, as the Senator from Iowa has stated. We believed that five commissioners, with the sort of clerical force that might be needed to carry on the work, would be able to do the work of the commission fairly well.

So far as I am concerned, as one member of the committee, I am not very particular which number is selected. I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa that it is a very important work, and we have a very large country over which the work has to be supervised. We considered the question of expense somewhat in the determination of the number. This and the other considerations I have mentioned were the only ones that entered into determining the number specified in the bill.

I am willing, without taking up the time of the Senate, to leave it to the judgment of the Senate to fix whatever number may be deemed proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6 of section 1 it is proposed to strike out "five" and insert "nine."

Mr. INGALLS. Let the remainder of the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The remainder of the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 8, after the word "Senate," it is proposed to insert:

One of whom shall be selected from each judicial circuit of the United States.

So as to read:

To be known as the Interstate-commerce Commission, which shall be composed of nine commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one of whom shall be selected from each judicial circuit of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa will be adopted. Considering the magnitude of the interests which are involved and the vast relations which are to be adjusted it is evident that a commission of nine would be quite small enough for the objects that are contemplated by the proposed statute. The distribution also meets with my approval. I can think of no arrangement that would be more satisfactory to all the interests that are involved. It appears to me, however, that it might be well to provide that one or two of the commissioners should be men practically familiar with the operation of railroads, but upon that I have no further suggestion to make.

Mr. HAWLEY. I doubt the wisdom of the amendment. I think it will be considered that we are making an unnecessary, cumbersome, and expensive commission. We shall be dividing responsibility. They will not be able to act as a body very often. You can get five men together—everybody knows how it is with committees—much more easily than you can nine. I do not believe that the commission will be as effective. I do not care from what section of the country they may come; I care more about what the character of the men shall be.

There is some wisdom in the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas that one should be a man familiar with railroad affairs; but I think we can trust something to whatever Executive will have the appointment of the commission. In my State, where we have three, it is provided by law that one shall be an engineer, one shall be a lawyer, and one shall be a business man, but none of them shall have any pecuniary interest in railways, as stockholder, officer, or in any other way whatever. It is possible that some provision of a similar character in regard to the five might be useful; but, as I say, I am quite willing to leave the appointment to such Executive as may have it in charge. However, I distrust very much the wisdom of a commission of nine. The expense will be some objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 15, noes 18; not a quorum voting.

Mr. BECK. There is no quorum, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no quorum present.

Mr. BECK. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the amendment. I hope we shall get the bill a little further along before we adjourn so that I can ask to take up the House bill. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that if the Senate will remain here long enough to complete this bill so that I can ask to take up the House bill from the table I shall not be disposed to ask the Senate to stay longer; but I should like to do that much, so that the bill may be printed as amended before we consider it again.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to going through with this so-called bill. I should be very glad to stay until we can perfect it, as it is called, and have it printed, so that we can see it Monday morning, so that the motion may be acted upon to take up the House bill and have that bill open to amendment. I am one of those who propose to vote for a good deal that is in the Reagan bill. I expect to offer some amendments to that measure; but I do not care anything about this thing, which I regard as nothing. Let it be made as perfect as it can be made to-night. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn, and the yeas and nays are called for upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. Is the call seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GROOME. I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Allison,	Conger,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Beck,	Garland,	Kenna,	Slater,
Brown,	Gibson,	Manderson,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Mitchell,	Wilson.
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Morgan,
Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Pugh,

NAYS—20.

Blair,	Frye,	Maxey,	Sawyer,
Camden,	Hampton,	Morrill,	Sheffield,
Coke,	Hoar,	Pike,	Sherman,
Cullom,	Jonas,	Platt,	Vance,
Dolph,	Lapham,	Saulsbury,	Van Wyck.

ABSENT—34.

Aldrich,	Farley,	Lamar,	Plumb,
Bayard,	George,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Butler,	Groome,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Call,	Hale,	Mahone,	Vest,
Colquitt,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Voorhees,
Dawes,	Hill,	Miller of N. Y.,	Williams,
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Palmer,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Pendleton,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. It will be necessary for some changes, which I have indicated to the clerks at the desk, to be made in the following lines, to correspond with the amendment just agreed to. I ask that the amendment I now offer may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa further moves to amend the first section of the bill. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 10, it is proposed to strike out the words "one," "three," "and five," and to insert in lieu of the word "five" the word "six;" so as to read:

The commissioners first appointed under this act shall be appointed for and continue in office for terms of two, four, and six years, respectively.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that be reported once more. It sounds a little obscure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 9, after the word "shall," it is proposed to insert the words "be appointed for and;" so as to read:

The commissioners first appointed under this act shall be appointed for and continue in office.

And in line 10 it is proposed to strike out the words "one," "three," "and five," and in lieu of the word "five" to insert the word "six;" so as to read:

Shall continue in office for terms of two, four, and six years, respectively.

Mr. ALLISON. That is, three of them will be appointed for two years, three for four, and three for six.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill does not say so as amended. The commissioners first appointed under this act will be nine. They are to continue in office under the terms of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa for two, four, and six years, respectively.

Mr. ALLISON. Three of whom.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it read, "three of whom shall be appointed for two years, three for four years, and three for six."

Mr. ALLISON. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa modifies his amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it read, "three of whom shall be appointed for two years, three for four, and three for six years, respectively."

Mr. INGALLS. Now how does it read, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not read yet.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall prepare a further amendment in a moment.

Mr. INGALLS. I suppose that "1884," in line 12, should be changed to "1885."

Mr. HARRISON. That has been done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was done.

Mr. INGALLS. Lines 22 and 23, at the end of the section, provide:

And not more than three shall belong to the same political party.

Has that been changed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has not been changed.

Mr. INGALLS. Under this provision of the bill we should be obliged to have three Republicans, three Democrats, and three Prohibitionists or three Independent Republicans.

Mr. ALLISON. In the first section, line 8, after the word "Senate," I move to strike out all down to and including the word "years," in line 14, as follows:

The commissioners first appointed under this act shall continue in office for terms of one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, the term of each to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed for terms of five years.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Three of the commissioners first appointed under this act shall continue in office for terms of two years, three for four years, and three for six years, the respective terms to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. There is one other amendment to be made in line 22.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 22, I move to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to read:

And not more than five shall belong to the same political party.

That is, I move that provision, if it is a wise thing to put in at all.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to inquire why not put in "when appointed?" Would a change of politics in the estimation of the Senator work a forfeiture per se?

Mr. ALLISON. I shall have to remand the Senator from Michigan for information on that point to the committee who have inserted this provision. I merely change the provision in order to make it conform to the amendment already agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to propose an amendment to section 6. It will be noticed that by section 6, if any transportation company neglects to pay the damages which the commission may find to have accrued to an individual or to desist from further violation of this proposed act, it is made the duty of the commission "to certify the facts to the district attorney of the United States for the judicial district in which the act complained of occurred." The section then provides that it shall be the duty of the district attorney, at the request of the complainant, to commence proceedings in the name of the complainant to recover any damages he may have sustained.

In the first place, the district where these acts occur may happen to be a district where the United States circuit court would not have any jurisdiction unless it is affirmatively conferred. That jurisdiction might depend upon the question of citizenship. It might be that the difficulty occurred in the State of Indiana as between a corporation of Indiana and a citizen of Indiana. There is nothing in the bill which gives jurisdiction, and yet it requires the report to be sent to the district attorney, while it may turn out to be a case where if the district attorney were to begin the proceedings provided for in the bill he would be sent out of court on a question of jurisdiction. If it is right that the proceedings should be begun there, then we ought by an amendment to confer jurisdiction without regard to citizenship upon that court.

Senators will notice that there are two things spoken of in the introductory part of the section, namely, a failure to pay damages which are found, and a failure to comply with the request or a persistency in continuing the transgression. The district attorney is only authorized to bring a suit for damages under the section as it stands. He is not authorized in the name of the complainant to bring a suit for a mandatory injunction, or for an injunction, or for some process that will compel the transportation company to cease from some illegal discrimination.

I therefore propose the amendment which I send to the desk. It is intended to give the district attorney discretion to commence a suit in the nature of an injunction simply, or a mandatory injunction, or any other form of equitable relief that may be necessary. It is intended to confer jurisdiction upon the court to whom the report is required to be made without regard to citizenship, and it contains a further provision that the district attorney shall have some compensation for what he does. I have believed that to load upon the district attorneys of the United States all this litigation without any provision of law in the world for giving them any compensation for it would result in having a very slipshod and inefficient prosecution of these cases.

In the amendments I have proposed, as well as in this one, I have tried to follow the general scope of the bill. I thought at one time of suggesting some more important charges, but waived that suggestion with a view of assisting in perfecting the bill, thinking it was probably the best we could do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 6, line 11, after the word "him," it is proposed to insert:

Or to compel the transportation company to comply with the provisions of this act, or both; and the circuit court of the United States for said district shall have jurisdiction to try said cause without regard to the citizenship of the party. Costs shall be awarded as in other cases, but in case judgment is rendered against the defendant the court may, in its discretion, allow to the district attorney a reasonable fee for prosecuting said cause, to be taxed as part of the costs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. I now ask leave to withdraw the amendment that I offered by way of substitute, so as not to encumber the proceedings, with a view of offering as a substitute the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays not having been ordered upon the amendment the Senator has a right to withdraw it. The Senator from Oregon withdraws the amendment indicated by him.

Mr. VAN WYCK. At the end of section 8 it is provided that "a majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business." I move to amend by adding "except as hereinafter provided," because at the end of section 9 it is provided:

The commission is hereby authorized to conduct investigations in such portions of the United States as it may deem necessary, and for that purpose may delegate the powers conferred by this section to any member or members of the commission.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to the addition of those words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to hear again what is supposed to be the exception.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. VAN WYCK.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska what the exception is supposed to be.

Mr. VAN WYCK. At the end of section 9 it is provided that—

The commission is hereby authorized to conduct investigations in such portions of the United States as it may deem necessary, and for that purpose may delegate the powers conferred by this section on any member or members of the commission.

I have no doubt that means that less than a quorum may transact business.

Mr. DOLPH. That is not to be the action of the commission. That is merely a commission to take testimony which is to be submitted finally to the whole commission. I am opposed to the amendment, because it seems to suppose a case where a minority of the commission may act.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Is not such an investigation, to be made under the direction of the commission, a part of its business? You first provide in section 8 that a majority of the commission shall be necessary to constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

Mr. DOLPH. No action of the commission is contemplated in section 9, any more than taking testimony before a notary public or a subcommittee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 23, noes not counted.

Mr. HARRISON. In line 29 of section 6 there is an inaccurate expression, which ought to be corrected:

Any such transportation company or any person or persons that shall violate any of the provisions of this act not herein specified, or that shall in any manner attempt to obstruct the enforcement of its provisions, shall be deemed guilty of, &c.

The "not herein specified" evidently refers to the section, and I move to strike out the word "herein" and insert "not in this section;" so as to read, "any of the provisions of this act not in this section specified," &c.

Mr. CULLOM, What does the Senator want to strike out?

Mr. HARRISON. You have here the words "herein specified." What does the Senator understand them to refer to; to the whole act?

Mr. CULLOM. They are intended to refer to the section.

Mr. HARRISON. Then the amendment I propose "not in this section specified" would be better language.

Mr. CULLOM. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves to amend by striking out "herein" and inserting "in this section;" so as to read, "that shall violate any of the provisions of this act not in this section specified."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise for the purpose of suggesting to the Senator from Illinois, if there be no other amendments to the Senate bill to be acted upon this evening, that he ask for an order that the Senate bill as amended be printed. There are no copies of the original bill that I can obtain from the document-room, nor have I one in my files, but I desire to see the bill in print as amended by the Senate, and I suggest to him the propriety of having it so printed by Monday morning.

Mr. PUGH. Before the vote is taken on that motion I desire to offer an amendment to the second section, to which, I suppose, there will be no objection.

It will be remembered that in the beginning of the debate upon this bill the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] objected to the second section because it amounted to a delegation of all the power Congress had over commerce between the States. I have an amendment that I have shown to the Senator in charge of this bill and the Senator from Arkansas and they say it meets the objection, and I now offer it. It is to amend section 2 by striking out all after the word "have," in the first line down to and including the word "power" in line 7, and inserting other words, so that the first paragraph will read:

That the commission hereby created shall have and exercise the powers and discharge the duties defined and granted in this act pertaining to the methods of regulating the operation of all transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce.

That limits the powers of the commissioners to those defined in the act itself, and does not leave it open to the objection of the Senator from Arkansas, that under the second section their powers go beyond those defined in the act and amount to all the powers Congress has over commerce between the States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, after the word "have" in line 1, it is proposed to strike out:

Supervision over all matters pertaining to the regulation of commerce among the several States and Territories and the methods of operation of all transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce, and it is hereby made the duty of said commission to enforce the provisions of this act by all lawful means within its power.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And exercise the powers and discharge the duties defined and granted in this act pertaining to the methods of regulating the operation of all transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. CONGER. That may be giving a power that the bill I suppose does not contemplate giving—the power to regulate all transportation companies, including companies owning vessels on our rivers and lakes. I do not propose to vote for any proposition that will give control to this railroad commission of all persons engaged in the transportation of commerce between the States. It does not need any such provision for transportation companies on the water, and it would be a very serious thing if any such powers should be given to control companies or individuals conducting water transportation. The power is already given in this bill, I am told. If the amendment does not give the commissioners any power that the bill already contains, it is useless; and if it does give any, it extends to water transportation.

Mr. HOAR. Every section of the bill provides for "transportation companies," not for railroads, so that the Senator's objection applies apparently to the whole bill.

Mr. CONGER. If it relates to water transportation the bill needs considerable revision. It relates, I know, to that kind of transportation which is part water and part land; but transportation companies by water, pure and simple, I had not supposed anybody believed were embraced within the provisions of this or any like bill.

Mr. ALLISON. It provides for all transportation companies in the United States engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. CONGER. It purports to appoint railroad commissioners. Every analogy and every reference has been to the system in the States of railroad commissioners.

Mr. CULLOM. The thirteenth section of the bill defines what the term "transportation company" means, and it includes railroads and vessels that may be used for transporting freight in connection with railroads. This is its language:

That the term "transportation company engaged in interstate commerce," as used in this act, shall be deemed and taken to mean any corporation, company, or individual now owning, operating, or using any railroad or railroads, or any vessel or vessels, in whole or in part, or that may have the right, license, or permission to operate, use, or control any railroad or railroads, or any vessel or vessels, in whole or in part, provided said corporation, company, or individual is engaged in the business of transporting freights or property of any description by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, from one State into another State or Territory of the United States, or from any Territory into any State or any other Territory.

Mr. CONGER. For the present let the amendment be printed, and I propose now that the Senate adjourn. If this bill is intended to give power or control over water transportation on rivers and lakes independent of railroad connections, to cover our whole coasting trade, it is time we came to a halt and strangled the bill or amended it. I have voted for different provisions of this bill with the understanding that it applied only to railroad transportation or where railroad companies had vessels of their own forming part of the same through route by land and water, and therefore belonged to the same company, the communication being part water and part rail.

Mr. CULLOM. I can not see that the amendment now proposed covers the point suggested by the Senator from Michigan. If the Senator will look at sections 12 and 13 of the bill, he will see that they are the only ones which have any reference to carriage by water in any way, and it depends on whether those sections remain as they are whether the point he makes can be sustained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH].

Mr. HARRISON. I would suggest to the Senator from Michigan that this amendment does not affect the question that is in his mind in the smallest degree. It simply takes out of the bill those general terms which profess to confer on this commission the general supervision of the subject, and says they shall exercise such powers as are conferred by the bill. It uses the words "transportation companies," but that is the term used throughout the whole bill, and we have a definition of it—section 13. So if this amendment is adopted and the Senator thinks the scope of the bill includes some case he would want to leave out, his amendment should be addressed to section 13, the definition. This does not affect that question in the smallest degree.

Mr. CONGER. Where is this amendment proposed to come in?

Mr. HARRISON. In section 2.

Mr. CONGER. Section 12 provides:

That the route of any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce shall include all the railroad and water routes in use by such company, whether owned by said company or used by it under license, lease, or permission otherwise given.

That makes what water communication there is a part of the route, a means of transportation, and property which a railway company acquires by putting boats on the water as part of its through communication from one point to another. As I understand the amendment, it confers absolute power on this commission over any transportation company which may be entirely by water.

Mr. PUGH. The power of the commissioners——

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have the amendment printed with the others. I understand a motion will be made to print, and I will wait for that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. PUGH. The subject-matter of the jurisdiction of the commission is stated in the second section, as originally framed, to be railroads or transportation companies. If the Senate desire to enlarge that subject-matter so as to embrace water ways it can do so, as suggested by the Senator from Indiana, in another section, which defines the extent of the jurisdiction. My amendment to the second section simply confines the commissioners to the powers and duties granted and defined in the act wherever found. It is no grant of power except the powers specified in the different sections of the act. It is a limitation of the powers of the commission. If it is desired to restrict or enlarge the powers, it must be done by amending other sections.

Mr. HOAR. I want before the Senate adjourns to-night to call the attention of the Senate and the Senator who has the bill in charge to a question which may possibly have been discussed; but I wish to understand more distinctly than I do what is the Senator's answer to the proposition that he has given judicial power to a commission not appointed for the constitutional tenure of good behavior. I understand that the fifth section of the bill authorizes this commission to inquire into extortion or unjust discrimination and then to assess the damages, and the damages when they are assessed are found to be absolutely due; but while the payment of those damages is only enforced by a decree of a court, the finding of the commission is conclusive upon the court.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill does not give the commission any absolute power whatever so far as the finality of any finding that they may make is concerned. It runs upon the theory that if a shipper makes a complaint against a transportation company to the commission, the commission is called upon by the bill to inform the corporation or transportation company of the fact and ask it to settle. If the corporation or transportation company fails to do so, the commission are authorized under this bill to proceed to investigate the question and determine so far as they have any power to do it the amount of damage, if any, that the shipper has sustained by virtue of any extortion or unjust discrimination. When they have done that, it is their duty under this bill to notify the transportation company that they are expected to settle that damage within a given time specified by the commission; but there is nothing in the bill anywhere that requires the transportation company to do so unless it chooses; and there is nothing in the bill anywhere that makes their finding as a matter of fact evidence in the court if the transportation company refuse to settle; but the shipper is to go to court finally for the adjudication of the case.

Mr. SHEFFIELD. The Senator will allow me to ask if when the action is brought by the district attorney the finding of the commission would not be assumed to be substantive facts? It is a condition precedent to sustaining the action that the shipper has proceeded before the railroad commission; and in that way the finding of the railroad commission goes before the jury as persuasive evidence of the facts alleged in it.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not understand that under this bill the findings could go before the court at all, but it is the duty of the commission to turn the subject over to the district attorney, and the presumption is that the testimony taken by the commission in the investigation that the commission has made, when placed in the hands of the district attorney, will be of great service to him in the prosecution of the case, he thus having a knowledge of the witnesses and what they have testified to. But the testimony before and the finding of the commission would not absolutely be evidence before the court at all under the rules of evidence.

Mr. SHEFFIELD. I do not think the Senator has met the point precisely which I stated; and that is, that going before the commission and the commissioners investigating the case and making a finding upon the facts and assessing the damages are conditions precedent to going to the district attorney and having him institute legal proceedings. These being conditions precedent, when he came into court he would have to show those facts to entitle him to maintain his action. The showing of those facts in court coming to the knowledge of the jury would operate to influence the minds of the jury whether the facts as so presented were or were not strictly legal evidence.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I do not think I understand the point of the Senator. At the same time I do not understand that under the provisions of this bill the district attorney would be controlled by what the commission had done; neither would the facts found by the commission necessarily go before the jury. Probably the finding of the commission would not be allowed to go before the jury under the rules that govern the admission of testimony.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH].

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 33.

Mr. CONGER. May I make a parliamentary inquiry? If this be now inserted by a vote of the Senate, can it be afterward stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the bill reaches the Senate the question then will be on agreeing to the amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. There are several amendments that I think should be made to sections 1, 2, and 3, and they may modify and correct my idea on this question. I will not call for a further count now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No further count being insisted on, the amendment is agreed to. If there be no further amendment the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the bill as amended be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. If there are no other amendments to be made to this bill, I desire now to ask leave to take the House bill from the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not very well advised as to the rules of the Senate either in Committee of the Whole or out of it, but I think it is in order for me to move to take up the House bill, and then I shall ask to offer this bill as an amendment to it, striking out all after the enacting clause, and then I want to have the Senate bill printed.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator will have to pass from the consideration of the Senate bill when he asks the Senate to consider the House bill. Hence I was going to suggest to him that he ask the Senate now to order the Senate bill as amended to be printed, so that it will be on our desks on Monday morning. Then the Senate can, by unanimous consent or by a majority of the Senate, take up the House bill for consideration.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to make the motion that the bill as amended be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks for an order that the bill as amended may be printed for the use of the Senate, so that it will be on the desks of Senators on Monday next. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. CULLOM. Now I move to take up the House bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. This bill is still in committee. When it is reported to the Senate some of us, I presume, will ask for further action on some of these amendments. I know there is one amendment that has been made upon which I desire another vote. The bill is not complete yet. We can not tell precisely what shape it will be in. Let the bill be reported to the Senate, and give us a chance to look at the various amendments.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Connecticut will allow me to make a suggestion. The Senator from Illinois, as I understand, proposes to take up the House bill, so that that will be the unfinished business on Monday. It is this bill he proposes to move as an amendment to the House bill. It will stand in parliamentary consideration just as if anything else was proposed. All this has merely enabled the Senator from Illinois to get the general sense of the Senate about the frame of this bill; but it being in the Senate or out of the Senate, and having been amended again or not amended, will make no difference—it will stand just as if the Senator had written in his room a bill which we had not amended at all, which we had never heard of, and bring that in as an amendment. Then it would be in order to move to amend the substitute by striking out, or by striking out and inserting, or by adding. So the whole matter will be before the Senate just as much as it would be if the Senate bill had been carried further.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the original House bill also will be open to amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent to take up the House bill, so that it may be left as the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois what he proposes to do after we take up the House bill, because if the House bill—at least I so understand our rules—is substituted for this bill——

Mr. CULLOM. No; I want to substitute this bill for the House bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I mean if the consideration of the House bill is substituted for the consideration of this bill, then, unless we have some understanding, every provision of the House bill will be open to amendment and consideration in the Senate before we reach the substitute which we have already perfected now in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CULLOM. I so understand it, and I do not know any possible way to prevent it if I wanted to do so.

Mr. HARRIS. There is none.

Mr. ALLISON. There is none unless we have some understanding about it.

Mr. HOAR. You can not get that.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. HARRIS. There can be no difficulty about this question. It is perfectly competent for the Senator from Illinois to move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the House bill or any bill upon the Calendar. When it is taken up it is certainly amendable, and the Senator from Illinois, or any other Senator, can move the Senate bill as a substitute for the House bill. When he has so moved, then it is competent for any Senator to move any amendment to the text of the House bill, or any amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois as a substitute; and these amendments, whether offered to the House bill or the Senate bill, will have to be acted upon before the question can be taken upon adopting the substitute for the House bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I so understand.

Mr. HARRIS. There can be no difficulty about it, and it is perfectly in order for the Senator from Illinois to move now, if he chooses to do so, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to ask him a thing I have been endeavoring to get at for some time? I ask what progress then have we made with the last bill?

Mr. HARRIS. We have been arriving at the conclusions of the majority of the Senate as to the merits of the various propositions contained in the Senate bill.

Mr. BECK. But that bill is now to be withdrawn from the consideration of the Senate as if it had never been up, as I understand, before the House bill can be taken up.

Mr. HARRIS. I can only repeat that if the Senator from Illinois or any other Senator chooses to move to take up the House bill and proceed to its consideration it is in order to do so, and then——

Mr. BECK. But he can not get it up without a vote.

Mr. HARRIS. A majority of the Senate can take it up. The result is that the Senate bill will lose its right of way as unfinished business, and then the Senate bill may be offered, if any Senator chooses to offer it, as a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. FRYE. That is precisely what I did last session with the bill touching the merchant marine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the motion of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CULLOM. I have two motions; one is to print the bill that the Senate has been considering as amended——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order has been made.

Mr. CULLOM. Then the motion now is to take from the table the House bill for consideration, so that it may be left as the unfinished business of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent to do that.

The PRESIDING OFIFCER. The Chair is informed by the Chief Clerk that the bill is not on the table, but is on the Calendar. Then the motion is to proceed to the consideration of the House bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. It is perfectly competent for a majority to order it, but I have no doubt that the Senator can get unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to regulate interstate commerce, and to prohibit unjust discrimination by common carriers. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CULLOM. Now allow me to say a word, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. Some honorable Senators have seemed to feel that I have been consuming the time of the Senate unnecessarily or insisting upon doing so. This has been a source of some embarassment to me; but I have felt that it was my duty to pursue the course I have taken, for the reason that the Committee on Railroads reported the Senate bill as its best judgment upon the subject. As has been said by many distinguished Senators it is an exceedingly important subject, and one involving a great many important questions. I have felt that a reference of the bill back to the committee with the House bill would, when the time came for the consideration of the two bills together, not facilitate a final disposition. The committee would be just as much in the dark as to the sense of the Senate upon very many of these questions as they were before the original report was made. My purpose has been to hold to the consideration of the bill we reported until, as the honorable Senator from Tennessee says, we could get the sense of the Senate upon these important questions, so that we might know where we were. That is my excuse, if any is needed, for asking the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the Senate bill as long as we have done.

Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senate bill, as amended, be made an amendment to the House bill, striking out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and inserting it as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the House bill was taken up the Senate bill dropped back to its place on the Calendar. The Senator from Illinois now moves that the House bill be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the Senate bill.

Mr. INGALLS. No, not that. He can not insert the Senate bill after the title of a House bill.

Mr. CULLOM. Inserting the following words, being the words of the Senate bill.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Senate will give unanimous consent that that document with which we are so familiar shall not be read from the desk at this time, but that the motion may be treated as pending.

Mr. CULLOM. That is all I desire to-night.

Mr. HOAR. The motion is that these words be substituted for the House bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment I offered be dispensed with for the present, so that it may be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has there been any order made to print it?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the Senate bill be printed together with the House bill and the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. The House bill has been printed.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 17, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not desire to interfere with the morning hour, but I call for the regular order, as my object is after the morning hour to proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GIBSON. My attention has been called to a series of telegraphic publications in the morning papers this morning and yesterday morning, which report me as having indulged in a number of very harsh and unjust criticisms of a member of this House, as well as having made other foolish speeches in connection with the legislation of this body. I do not desire to be put in such a position nor to do any gentleman in this House injustice.

Those publications have reference to a conference held between a few of my friends and myself in the city of Wheeling, the capital of our State, at which we undertook to advise with one another in reference to legislation now before this body. At that conference the question of tariff was spoken of, and, as a matter of course, the name of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania was mentioned. To talk of the tariff without mentioning his name would be like the play of Hamlet with the name of the melancholy Dane left out.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. It is that the gentleman from West Virginia is not discussing a question of privilege. He states that he is speaking in reference to a communication made to sundry papers not affecting the integrity of any member of this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not discovered anything in the statement which entitles the gentleman to take the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman is proceeding to state it.

The SPEAKER. It seems to be a personal explanation, which the gentleman has the right to make with the consent of the House.

Mr. GIBSON. I hope no gentleman will dissent to my doing justice to a member of the House as well as myself.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed to make his explanation. The House will please be in order. Does the gentleman from Maine object?

Mr. REED. Not at all. I said it was important we should hear. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to say when the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was mentioned, so far from making any unjust or unkind allusion to him I declared on that occasion however much I might differ from him in his political views on some things, that his long record had taught us to respect his capacity and integrity. [Applause.] The papers published in Wheeling on the next morning declared that so far from attacking him, one said I had defended him and the other that I had no war to make upon him.

Further than that I desire to make another correction. Some of these reports undertook to state that I said in that conference I had had an interview with Mr. Cleveland in which our views had clashed. [Cries of "Hear!" Hear!" on the Republican side.] I want to say in that connection that I referred to the fact of the fight made in West Virginia, and that I believed if our Democrats there were harmonious the State would be recognized by Mr. Cleveland in his incoming administration.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the annual report of the receipt and distribution of public documents by the Department of the Interior; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

SANTIAGO RAMIREZ GRANT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of the United States surveyor-general for New Mexico in the case of private land claim No. 136, in the Territory of New Mexico, known as the Santiago Ramirez grant, Harvey E. Easterday, claimant; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SAN MATEO SPRINGS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico, known as the San Mateo Springs tract, the heirs and legal representatives of Santiago Duran y Chaves, claimants; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MOVABLE DAMS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, forwarding communication of the Chief of Ordnance in relation to estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year 1886 for a milling-shop at Springfield armory, Massachusetts, and for a set of officers' quarters at New York arsenal; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PASQUOTANK RIVER, NORTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers in relation to the results of a preliminary examination of Pasquotank River, North Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

HARBOR AT HYANNIS, MASS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers in relation to the results of a survey of the harbor at Hyannis, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

IRON AND STEEL TESTS.

The SPEAKER, as required by section 3795 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, laid before the House the following resolution of the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the tests of iron and steel and other materials for industrial purposes by Maj. F. H. Parker, commanding the Watertown arsenal, transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of War on the 3d of December, 1884, be printed, and that 3,500 additional copies be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House, and 500 copies for the use of the War Department.

BOEUF RIVER, LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers in relation to a preliminary examination of the outlet of Boeuf River, in Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

AGATE AND BURLINGTON BAYS, MINNESOTA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers in relation to the results of a survey of Agate and Burlington Bays, Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

INDIAN SCHOOLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to an appropriation of $25,000 to purchase property for Indian school purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RETURN OF A BILL FROM THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will also ask the House to consider at this time a resolution in relation to the return of a bill from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to return to the House the bill (H. R. 1004) relative to the Chinese indemnity fund.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there is an error in the engrossment of the bill, and this request for its return is made with a view to its correction.

The resolution was agreed to.

OREGON LAND-GRANT FORFEITURE.

The SPEAKER announced as the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 181) to declare the forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon, Mr. COBB, Mr. HENLEY, and Mr. PAYSON.

QUARANTINED NATIONAL LIVE-STOCK TRAIL.

Mr. MILLER, of Texas, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7971) to establish a quarantined national live-stock trail, and to regulate commerce between the States as to live-stock; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

APPLICATION OF EIGHT-HOUR LAW TO LETTER-CARRIERS.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Labor, to whom was referred the following resolution—

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General of the United States be respectfully requested to report to this House whether in his opinion section 3738 of the Revised Statutes, with reference to eight hours' employment constituting a day's labor for all laborers, &c., employed on behalf of the United States, applies to letter-carriers of the United States—respectfully report that on December 15, A. D. 1884, the House passed a resolution asking the Attorney-General to give his opinion as to the application of section 3738 of the Revised Statutes to letter-carriers. The Attorney-General replied that his authority for giving official opinions is limited to calls made by the President or the head of an Executive Department. This is, no doubt, the correct view of the law governing the office of Attorney-General.

In order to secure an official legal opinion upon the important question as to whether letter-carriers came within the provisions of the eight-hour law your committee recommend the passage of the resolution above recited with an amendment. The resolution calls for the opinion of the Postmaster-General. Your committee think a legal opinion by the law officer of the Government would be more satisfactory and conclusive, and believing that the Attorney-General would promptly reply to a request for such an opinion made by the Postmaster-General, recommend the adoption of the resolution in the following form:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be respectfully requested to ask the Attorney-General for his opinion whether section 3738 of the Revised Statutes, with reference to eight hours' employment constituting a day's labor for all laborers, &c., employed on behalf of the United States, applies to letter-carriers of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Permit me to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the language uniformly used when attention is called to a subject of this character is that this officer be directed to make the application.

Mr. HOPKINS. The committee adopted the phraseology of the resolution reported to them.

Mr. COX, of New York. That was my mistake in the original resolution, and I hope it will be corrected here.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the word "directed" will be substituted for the words "respectfully requested."

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee on the original resolution.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 38, noes 3.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not know whether the House will listen very patiently to another explanation under a question of personal privilege this morning, but in justice to myself I deem it proper that I should make a very brief one. I wish to state, however, in the outset, that I have not held any conference with President Cleveland nor been discussing the tariff, as has been charged against the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON]. [Laughter.] It is a less important matter than that; but it is of interest to me and of some concern too, I think, to this House and the country.

In a newspaper published in this city on yesterday there appears an article under the head of "Queer purchases—how the contingent expenses of the House are created," &c., containing a paragraph which upon its face does me the greatest injustice; for, although it embraces no direct charge against me, it does give reasonable ground for an inference that I had improperly expended public money in the performance of an official duty. I wish the Clerk to read so much of this article as is marked in the paper which I now send to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUEER PURCHASES—HOW THE CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE HOUSE ARE CREATED—A PENCHANT FOR PAPERS—THE KIND OF LITERATURE DEVOURED BY THE LEGISLATIVE SOLONS—THE POPULARITY OF FARMERS' ALMANACS—OPERA-GLASSES GALORE AND PLUSH BOXES IN PROFUSION.

The report of the contingent expenses of the House shows a number of curious purchases during the last session. For instance, when the remains of the late Representative Haskell, of Kansas, were taken home the Congressional escort spent more than $7 for newspapers with which to while away the tedium of travel. They had any number of lunches and extra meals. They also soothed their nerves with the fragrant weed, a bill of $14 for cigars being paid.

Fruit was also bought to please their palates. In addition to numerous specified purchases of the committee going and coming there is one which for convenience, perhaps, is worded this way: "Expense account from Indianapolis to Washington, $43.37." The way that outlay is worded would seem to suggest that some members of the funeral party were thirsty. An undertaker's firm charged $3 for opening and closing the glass case of the coffin. A number of clocks were bought during the session. They must have been good ones. The prices paid were between $20 and $40, the latter being most frequently paid.

A terrestrial globe was bought for $75, but it is not stated to what use it was put. Perhaps it was purchased because of its being symbolic of a desire on the part of members of the House to possess the earth. A Colton's General Atlas came into the possession of the House in consideration of the sum of $20. At the funeral of the late E. W. Mackey twelve sashes were bought for $108, ten pairs of cotton gloves for $5, and twenty-four pairs of kid gloves for $48. Similar expenses attend all the Congressional funerals. James Wormley got $202 for furnishing a lunch at one of the funerals.

For one month there were fifty-two dozen towels washed for the bath-rooms at an expense of $26. The charge for laying out a body at a Congressional funeral was $10. Hon. CASEY YOUNG's expenses as a member of the committee that investigated the Hot Springs, outside his transportation there and back, amounted to $125.

Mr. YOUNG. I have no knowledge, Mr. Speaker, of the items of expenditure alluded to in that article outside of so much of it as refers to those alleged to have been made by me. It may be true in that respect or it may not. I do not undertake to say how that is, but so far as it refers to me there is nothing connected with the Hot Springs investigation that authorizes any such statement. When I first saw the article I was of course surprised, and this morning I called upon the proprietor of the paper which contains it, and with him went to the office, and had a conversation with the reporter who wrote the article. I was informed by him that he ascertained the facts upon which it was based in relation to myself from the Clerk's report of the expenditures of the contingent fund of the House. I then called at the Clerk's office and obtained the report referred to, which I now have before me. In it I find nothing that could by any possibility, as I think, authorize a statement of this character.

I was under the impression at first, and I am still of that opinion, that it was not the purpose of the reporter to do me any injustice. It is one of those mistakes, I must conclude, into which gentlemen of the press, in the hurry of their vocation, sometimes quite naturally fall. I ask that the Clerk read so much of the report as is embraced in pen marks, with this explanation: When the resolution passed the House authorizing the committee to proceed to Hot Springs to investigate the Government work at that place, thanks to the vigilant guardianship of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who always looks carefully to the expenditure of the public money, only $1,000 was appropriated to pay the expenses of the committee in the prosecution of the investigation with which they were charged by the House.

The investigation was made by a subcommittee of three of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department; and we took with us a Government engineer, a stenographer, and a clerk of the committee, making in all six persons. We proceeded to Hot Springs, remained there for one week, or nearly that length of time, in the investigation of the matters embraced in the resolution under which we were acting. My colleagues on the committee, Mr. STORM, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. PAYNE, of New York, had some important matters before the House that they expected to come up which necessitated their immediate return. The investigation was not completed. It was important, to enable us to make an intelligent report, that a resurvey and a measurement of the work should be made. I was requested by the committee to remain at Hot Springs with the clerk long enough after the departure of my colleagues to have that done. I accordingly remained for two and a half days after the committee left, having the work remeasured and the estimates made over again.

In order that the expenses of the committee might not exceed the appropriation we took with us no sergeant-at-arms, and the money was placed by the clerk in the hands of my colleague, Mr. STORM, who superintended and directed all the expenditures. When he left he placed in my hands the sum of $150 to pay my own expenses and those of the clerk back to Washington. Out of that, for hotel bills, transportation on the cars, and other absolutely necessary expenses, I expended $125.50. The remainder I turned over to Mr. STORM when I returned to Washington. And this statement published in the report of the Clerk of expenditures of the contingent fund shows that every dollar that went into my hands was expended legitimately and properly in the prosecution of the work with which I had been charged by the House and the committee. I now ask the Clerk to read so much of the report as refers to the expenditures made by me.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. YOUNG. I have never found it necessary before in a public service extending over a period of more than ten years to trouble the House with any personal explanation. Perhaps it was not absolutely necessary that I should have done so now, but I thought it was due to myself and due to the House that I should say something in refutation of this article to which I have called attention. I have always been treated with great kindness by the gentlemen of the press; often they have done me more than justice. And I am satisfied in this instance it was not intended to misrepresent any fact to my prejudice. Yet by this statement going abroad the inference would be fully authorized that I had been guilty of some improper conduct.

I desire to say further, in justice to my colleagues on the committee and myself, that I venture to say no investigation ever ordered by this House was so cheaply done as that by the committee sent to investigate the Government work at Hot Springs. There is not a charge for a lunch, for a boquet, for a pair of gloves, for a bottle of wine, for a cigar, or even for a drink of whisky or a glass of beer. [Laughter.]

I hope I shall be pardoned for calling attention to the fact that we traveled twenty-five hundred miles in going to and returning from Hot Springs, where we remained for nearly a week, remaining in session until late at night every day we were there; that there were six persons in the party, and the total expenses of the trip only amounted to $580 exclusive of the pay of the stenographer, a matter with which the committee had nothing to do, he being appointed by the Speaker to attend us.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. There has been too much time occupied this morning, and I feel like testing the sense of the House as to whether it is desired to dispense with the morning hour, so that we may proceed immediately to the consideration of appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] moves to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. KEIFER. Will my colleague on the committee allow me to dispose of a short matter from the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. BURNES. I yield to my colleague.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. I report back from the Committee on Appropriations the bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments; and I shall move, as instructed by the committee, that the House non-concur in those amendments.

The Clerk read the amendments of the Senate, as follows:

On page 2, line 12, strike out "and officers on increased rank."
On page 2, line 13, strike out "$9,525," and insert "$8,898.50."

Mr. KEIFER. These amendments should go together. If one is concurred in the other ought to be concurred in. If one is non-concurred in the other should be non-concurred in. The pay of professors at the Military Academy is fixed by law. If these amendments are adopted it will have the effect, as I understand it, of carving out of the pay of each professor about $60 a year. In other words, the bill would not appropriate as much money, as we understand it, as the law would give those professors; and not being appropriated, of course it would not be paid.

Section 1336 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

SEC. 1336. Each of the professors of the Military Academy whose service at the academy exceeds ten years shall have the pay and allowances of colonel, and all other professors shall have the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonels; and the instructors of ordnance and science of gunnery and of practical engineering shall have the pay and allowances of major; and hereafter there shall be allowed and paid to the said professors 10 per cent. of their current yearly pay for each and every term of five years' service in the Army and at the academy: Provided, That such addition shall in no case exceed 40 per cent. of said yearly pay; and said professors are hereby placed upon the same footing, as regards restrictions upon pay and retirement from active service, as officers of the Army.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, this law provides for officers of increased rank receiving the longevity pay of that rank. This being the law, it was the judgment of the committee that it was best to non-concur in this amendment and to ascertain if there was any reason why we should undertake to affect a law that has been a long time in operation by merely refusing to appropriate the sum of money necessary to carry it out. My motion is to non-concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were non-concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to resume the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7857) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the House was last in committee it rose, not having a quorum present. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] insist on a further count?

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, let us pass on from that.

The CHAIRMAN. If a further count is not insisted upon the Clerk will read the pending bill.

The Clerk read the last paragraph of the bill, as follows:

For expenses which may be incurred in the acknowledgment of the services of masters and crews of foreign vessels in rescuing American seamen or citizens from shipwreck, $4,500.

To meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended under the direction of the President, pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

For the payment, under the provisions of section 1749 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, of the widows or heirs at law of diplomatic or consular officers of the United States dying in foreign countries in the discharge of their duties, $5,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to invite the co-operation of the Governments of the American nations in securing the establishment of a commercial league by and between the said nations, to be known as the "Customs Union of America," the arrangement of a common basis of import duties from other countries than those which may compose said league, and that the commercial intercourse among the people of all the American States may be freed from the payment of any customs or other dues whatever; and that a common system of weights and measures may be also established for the purpose of facilitating such intercourse.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that that amendment had better be reserved until we can have an opportunity to understand fully what it means.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; but I suggest that the amendment had better be reserved for the present.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of a speedy passage of the appropriation bills I feel called upon to make the point of order upon this amendment. The subject itself may be a very proper one to receive the attention of the House, but the Senate have deliberately advised us that they will agree to nothing on the appropriation bills in the nature of legislation, and any attempt of this kind will only lead to a controversy which we ought to try as far as possible to avoid. I am perfectly willing to hear the gentleman for a brief time upon his amendment, but I feel that we ought to try to dispose of two of these appropriation bills to-day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, this proposition does not involve the expenditure of a single dollar. The sole purpose of it is to enable us to obtain more extended foreign markets for our own products. Almost every one who has thought upon the question has reached the conclusion that it is absolutely essential, in order to bring about the prosperity of this country again, to secure employment to idle hands, to put our mills and factories in operation, and in order to increase the present low price of farm products that we shall find additional foreign markets. Every one who alludes to this subject in debate on this floor avows himself emphatically in favor of devising means for the extension of our commerce. Yet, strange as it may seem, measures presented for the accomplishment of that object are often strangled in committees to which they are referred by non-action, and when we do get a measure before the House, no matter how faultless it may be, efforts are made to strike it down by points of order. This is amazing. Here is a proposition which, in my judgment, will more effectually accomplish the end we have in view than any other plan that can be devised, much more effectually than reciprocity treaties, for the reason that under the most favored nations clauses of existing treaties between the southern and European countries the same advantages offered us can be secured by them, thereby lessening the value of the privileges obtained by means of such reciprocity treaties. It is contended by some that we can not compete with Europe in the South American markets because of the low wages and the abundance of capital in European countries. Now, here is a proposition which secures to American products a free market protected against European competition. If the southern countries will enter into such a commercial league as I propose, a union similar in its nature to the German Zollverein, we shall secure such exclusive privileges and advantages as will give us control of the rich southern markets.

If you will look at the statistics for 1883 you will find that England is sending to Peru ten times as much of her manufactured products as this country sends there; yet the principal seaport of Peru (Callao) is on the coast-line with San Francisco, at a distance of about 2,100 miles, while England, in order to reach that market, has to brave the perils of the Atlantic and around Cape Horn for a distance of 11,604 miles, or else break bulk and pass across the Isthmus of Panama at a distance of about 6,000 miles, yet she monopolizes that market. I mention but one of the southern countries as an illustration of the situation with reference to all. This proposition simply authorizes the President to invite the co-operation of Mexico, Central and South American states for the purpose of establishing a commercial union between them and the United States with common customs duties against all other countries. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will withdraw his point of order. If the proposition does no good it can not possibly do any harm.

Mr. RANDALL. The idea that the carrying out of the proposition is not going to cost the Government any money is a curious one to my mind. I have never known any proposition of this character that did not cost a good deal of money. But the cost is not the controlling consideration with me in this case——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I say again that it will cost nothing—nothing but a few postage-stamps.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, Mr. Chairman, if it were to cost thousands of dollars I would not object to it if I believed it was going to accomplish the desired result. But a proposition of this sort ought not to come from the Committee on Appropriations. There is a committee in this House—there are more committees than one—charged with matters relating to this general subject, and, for my part, my present desire is to get the appropriation bills passed. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] can, I believe, get unanimous consent at any time to consider his proposition in the House. I make my point of order because I do not want to create a difficulty on the appropriation bill by raising the question of new legislation if it can possibly be avoided. I must therefore insist upon the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to say to the gentleman that I am satisfied that his point of order is well taken, but I trusted that his desire to extend the markets for our manufactured products as well as our other products might induce him to withdraw the point.

Mr. RANDALL. I have already told the gentleman that, so far as I am concerned, he shall have unanimous consent at any time for the consideration of his proposition in the House.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Chairman, I feel it my duty to correct the statement which has been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that legislation relating to the encouragement of our commercial and postal facilities has been strangled in committee. The first bill on the special Calendar for the encouragement of the American merchant marine provides for that object, and is ready to be called up.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I made no remark applicable to the bill the gentleman [Mr. HUNT] mentions. The gentleman from Louisiana misunderstood me. I intended no reference to the committee he represents.

Mr. BURNES. The gentleman from Illinois having conceded that the point of order is properly taken, I apprehend there is nothing before the committee, and therefore we might as well proceed with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the question, but dislikes to cut off gentlemen who desire to have a hearing.

Mr. RANDALL. I want the point of order decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state very briefly that, with regard to these points upon which he has been called to decide, he has had in view the prerogatives of the House as against the executive department that trenches upon our rights to fix customs duties, as against the Senate that is grasping the power over the national purse, and as against the privileged committees of the House that have been rendering unnecessary all other committees. If gentlemen who preside in the Committees of the Whole will rigorously sustain points of order preventing privileged Appropriation Committees from bringing in legislation on any, on all questions not authorized by law on appropriation bills properly belonging to other committees, the dignity of the egislative committees of the House will be preserved, and they will have a hearing upon their reports instead of having those reports gorging our calendars and the work of a large majority of members made thereby useless. This is the spirit in which the present occupant of the chair has acted in making rulings which seem to have caused some gentlemen some astonishment. The Chair has been ruling with regard to the prerogatives of the House and with regard to the dignity of its committees not privileged. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules out the amendment.

Mr. BURNES. I desire now, by unanimous consent, to offer amendments to be inserted in lines 208 and 210, on page 9 of the bill. I send my amendments to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 208 insert the following: "Venezuela, Maracaybo; Turkish dominions, Beirut."

After Porto Rico, in line 210, insert the words, "Sagua la Grande (Cuba)."

Mr. BURNES. It will be remembered that by reason of points of order made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] these consulates were dropped out from the portions of the bill in which they had been inserted, and I desire now to place them in the bill in such a way as to correspond with the current law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] asks leave to recur to lines 208 and 210 to restore provisions for some consulates which have been dropped out of the bill on points of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. In line 220 should not the gentleman from Missouri insert "Beirut, Turkish Dominions?"

Mr. BURNES. That is included in my amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman from Missouri state why he offers this amendment?

Mr. BURNES. Yes, sir; with pleasure. By reason of points of order made upon these consulates as reported in the bill, upon the ground that there was an advance in the salaries, the bill now contains no provisions for these consulates even as they exist under the law for the current year. I apprehend that this Committee of the Whole desires to provide for these consulates to the extent at least that they were provided for last year.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. To my mind the rules under which we proceed touching appropriations, especially Rule XXI, and the constructions from time to time given it by the chairmen of the Committees of the Whole, instead of tending to broaden the privileges of the other committees and of the House, tend to strengthen certain gentlemen who see proper to make points of order against certain amendments and not against others of the same nature nor of superior merit. In other words, it is conceded, I apprehend, by a large majority of the members of this committee that the amendment now offered by the gentleman from Missouri and many others which were ruled out upon points of order were in themselves proper, yet all subject to a point of order under the ruling of the chairman. Now it suits the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] not to make points of order against certain amendments and to make them against certain others. It is true other members of the committee may make points of order against provisions that these gentlemen do not so antagonize, but the fact is they regard all the provisions as proper, those antagonized and those not antagonized by these gentlemen; so that in fact where appropriations are made for consulships not provided for in the appropriation act for the current year they are made by the grace of one or two gentlemen who are willing in particular cases to withhold points of order—a very unsatisfactory way to proceed, in my opinion. And I will add further that the construction given to Rule XXI greatly narrows an already very narrow rule.

I want, however, upon the merits of this bill, to congratulate the Committee of the Whole and my friend from Missouri that some errors of judgment which, in my opinion at the time, were committed during the last session of Congress touching these appropriations, under the lead of the Committee on Appropriations, have been corrected in this bill. For instance, I notice in particular that the provision for consul-general at Cairo, which was dropped out entirely in the appropriations for the current year after a very sharp fight, is in the present bill, no point of order having been made against it; yet that consul-generalship is just as important for the current year as for the coming year.

Now I want to be charitable about this matter, and will say that I presume it is some new light and further information coming upon the minds of the Appropriations Committee that has enabled them to provide in this bill for the consul-general at Cairo and for similar positions at various other places—positions which were not provided for in the last bill. I would not intimate for a moment that the change of administration under which these expenditures are to be made had anything to do with the recommendations embraced in the present bill.

Now I believe my five minutes are about out. I did want to say one or two other things——

Mr. LONG. If the Chair will recognize me I will give my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. If no gentleman objects, the gentleman from Illinois will be recognized as proceeding in the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say further that I do not think this is a very extravagant bill. I think other amendments might well have been made for the benefit of the service; yet it is true that the bill is more liberal than the bill appropriating for the current year. While it does not rest on my shoulders or on the shoulders of gentlemen on this side of the House to champion this bill, the expenditures under which are to be made by the incoming administration, yet I believe that the minority here are now ready, as I believe they will be in the future, to meet gentlemen on the other side in support of apt and proper provision for the public service.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire, Mr. Chairman, pro forma to move to strike out the last word.

I do this for a purpose. The purpose may not be germane to this bill or in conformity with the parliamentary suggestions just delivered from the chair. But, sir, I would re-enforce, if possible, here and now the idea of my most valued friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. I feel more like doing this, as he is compelled to withdraw his "continental" amendment by the point of order. It is about time this Congress should understand one thing. It is this: That the times are hard; that enterprising men are breaking; that industry is paralyzed; that labor is unhappily unemployed; and that even the best "protected" industries, like that of iron and steel, are going down, down to the depths of financial despair.

Sir, the best judgment of the best men in this country should be heeded. I will voice that sentiment.

It will be conceded, Mr. Chairman, by all business men that the present condition of the country is not very happy and hopeful. It has not been brought about by political successes or reverses. It is conditioned on economic reasons. We have been told by those who are absorbed in their special instead of general objects that the paralysis will pass away; but, sir, in the judgment of some of our statesmen who trust to general thought and principle and not to the specific bias of their own occupations, these hard times are likely to grow worse. If that be the case, it should put us on our best caution and courage in our legislation. All times and occasions, therefore, are opportune for such a discussion as my remarks will provoke.

Our bills as to currency and bonds have failed. Our fiscal troubles are not only those pertaining to commerce between our States and communities, but between our own and other nations.

The balance of trade grows less favorable to us day by day. This can not be disregarded. France, Germany, and other countries have adopted what I might call the Republican platform. They hold that it is the duty of government to "protect" industries. The chief thought in my opinion should be to allow the laws of trade to operate without disturbing them by legislation. If we would enhance our industries, dispose of our surplus production, or make more valuable that surplus by increasing our markets, either at home or abroad, or enable people at home or people abroad to buy more, and thus once more start the wheels of industry, we should practice more upon the doctrine of just reciprocity. One illustration will suffice. It is this: When in Paris, some years ago, I learned that a certain class of petitions were filling a certain room in the French Chambers. They were petitions to prohibit American imports of bread and meat stuffs. Since then the anti-corn-law party in France has grown to be a potential factor in her economies. The doctrine of M. Chevelier, who made with Cobden the great reciprocity treaty with England, is being discarded to our disadvantage. His tenets are unheeded. The Bastiats of France are dead. Her selfishness is immortal.

Other countries by absolute prohibitions and by customs duty of a prohibitory kind are cutting us off from their markets. It is not a question of pork with Germany, nor of wheat with France and Russia, nor of cotton from India and Egypt. It is a question of prices for Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois—prices for the labor results of our millions of farming men.

Our platform—I will not say the Democratic platform, but the platform of the Republican party—is being followed in Germany by your blood-and-iron statesmen who dislike republics, emigration, and America. In England Gladstone's liberal administration to-day stands trembling in the balance, almost ready to fall, not so much before her Egyptian or Indian policies as before what is called the "fair-trade" policy.

What, then, is our remedy? Every one will say here—reciprocity. With whom? I mean genuine reciprocity, not any one-sided reciprocity, but real reciprocity. With whom? Why, with the republics and neighbors in our own hemisphere.

Let us learn to reconcile the differences of soil, climate and production by amicable and prosperous interchanges and methods. Let us open the markets of these countries, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] proposes, to the domestic products, whether of growth or manufacture, of other countries on our continent and elsewhere, to fair and free competition.

In doing this, sir, is there any violence to the great idea of allowing every man to dispose of the avails of his own labor to the best advantage? Where is the disadvantage of allowing him to buy under treaty or other conditions where his interests can be best subserved? Where in this policy is the inequality of taxation? Where is the immoderate gauge of taxation, if arranged for the needs of honest government only? Is there any hateful retaliation in such a system?

Here is our opportunity. I favor the treaty with Mexico. It is an old, familiar, and favorite theme of mine. I do not say what should be done with the treaty with Spain; but whatever this House has to do about it should be heedfully done, and must be done to aid our largest industry—agriculture. This Congress will be derelict unless it take notice that we should begin with such enterprise as to make our markets abroad for our surplus products. For, sir, is not the law of economy irreversible and irrefragable? Oh, you can sell, can you, when you can not buy? One or the other of the parties to the trade will be bankrupt unless you barter. Barter is business. You must have a market for our produce or your produce will be burned at home. It does not involve your tariff. It only involves what Germany once had. I mean the Zollverein. It only involves what we once had with Canada—reciprocity. Now, alas, that mutuality is murdered by "protection," and New England mourns. It only involves what Pennsylvania has with New York. It involves what every State in our federation has with every other State.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will take the floor, Mr. Chairman, and yield my time to my colleague.

Mr. COX, of New York. I thank my colleague. On this theme I am pursuing the thought suggested to me by the most distinguished statesman in New York, except perhaps himself. [Laughter.] I mean Horatio Seymour.

This most conspicuous Democratic statesman in America, a citizen of New York, in a letter which I have of the 14th of this month, says:

> If Gladstone's administration shall go down, the "fair-trade" party in Great Britain will modify their laws so that free trade will be confined to those countries which give free trade. In this event we shall suffer for a long time. I think hard times are to last some years unless a European war shall make a demand for our breadstuffs and provisions. The Western States are quarreling with the railroads on account of their charges, although their members of Congress have increased the cost of the roads by the tariff on iron, &c. I do not think there is any hurry about tariff reform. It is best to let the public suffer some, so that our people will learn the causes of hard times.
> There is a great change going on in the strong Republican States of the Northwest. The present tariff is teaching our people great truths more rapidly than an improved tariff will.

Now let the Clerk read what Governor Seymour has again said in a public journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The Republican platform gave offense to European countries where the West seeks to find markets for its products, and they are taking active measures to get their supplies of breadstuffs and provisions from other quarters. For a number of years past the crops of Europe have been poor. This year they are good. The West, and particularly the Northwest, are forced to sell at prices which do not pay them. The future looks dark for those regions, for recent facts show that European governments have adopted the Republican platform and mean to fence out our products by duties upon them and by other measures, such as building railroads, which will open up new sources for supplies. It is clear that the question that concerns the interests of the West will attract public attention hereafter. The States lying west of the Alleghanies now have a controlling power in Congress, and this power will be felt hereafter.

Mr. COX, of New York. My colleague is doubtless proud and pleased to know that his courtesy to me has called forth such rare wisdom from our State.

But, sir, Governor Seymour is not merely a New York statesman. He has interests in the West. He has interests connected with transportation. He is bound up with agriculture. His head is as clear to-day as it was in the earliest days of his chivalric service to the State and Republic. He gives a warning to those that are heedless most prophetic—one that rises higher than these mere wrangles on this floor, higher far than our discussions in economy from party standpoints. What is the warning? It is this: we must seek markets abroad. If we would enhance our prosperity we must open new realms of trade. If we would have markets for our plethoric trade, if we would lay down the foundations of future commercial prosperity, we must go out upon the seas and adventure with other nations into strange lands, even into Ethiopia and India. We must sell and buy, buy and sell.

Gentlemen from the great West know, gentlemen from Minnesota with its flour know, gentlemen from Chicago with its commerce know what we in New York and other places know, that there is a sentiment born of self-interest now dominating in the Northwest, in the South, and in portions of the East which will compel us to make a market for this great and embarrassing surplus production caused by an iniquitous tariff which has produced more than it should by reason of the unnatural, heating, and forcing processes of our legislation. Let commerce be unhampered except for honest revenue, and we will leap out of our present troubles wise and full armed to contend with the new elements which are seeking fresh fields for colonization and commerce.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in reference to the Republican platform giving offense to Germany, I desire to have read an extract from one of to-day's papers which has a direct bearing upon the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

PROTECTION IN GERMANY.

Prince Bismarck adopted free trade as the economic rule of the German Empire, and was not satisfied with the results. Since 1880 he has been experimenting with protection, and he now finds reason to congratulate the Reichstag upon the change of policy. He asserts that the new tariff schedules have had a favorable effect upon home industries, and that the condition of the people has steadily improved. This is undoubtedly true. New factories have been built, an impulse has been imparted to manufacturing enterprises, wages have been nearly doubled in many branches of industry, emigration has been diminished, and a policy of commercial extension has been entered upon with vigor and confidence. Under free trade there were continuous shrinkages of values, reductions of wages, and failures of industrial enterprises. English competition closed German factories and reduced the number of employments open to an impoverished people. Under protection the factories have been reopened, and the Fatherland is more prosperous.

Instead of reducing the tariff schedules, which were admitted in 1879 to be only tentative, Prince Bismarck is now anxious to raise the rates on certain articles and also to impose a duty on corn as a means of protecting German agriculture. This last suggestion is ridiculed by Herr Richter and the liberal deputies, whose policy of free trade proved ruinous to Germany. It will also be derided in London as a crowning exhibition of Prince Bismarck's incapacity to govern Germany in accordance with English ideas. Mr. Bright will declaim against the barbarism of high-tariff legislation, and Mr. Chamberlain will lament over an economic delusion that may carry the Fatherland back a long way toward mediæval ignorance. It is not likely, however, that Prince Bismarck will be deterred by English strictures from following out this policy if the Reichstag will allow him to do so.

During the reading of the above the following proceedings took place:

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, there is so much confusion in the Hall that it is impossible to hear what the Clerk is reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will suspend the reading until order is restored upon the floor.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I feel it my duty to interpose at this point to inquire what is before the committee to justify the continuation of this debate? The bill has been read through; the last section has been agreed upon——

Mr. REED. What justified the beginning of it?

Mr. HAMMOND. Nothing.

Mr. BURNES. Nothing that I am aware of, and I propose to stop it now if I can.

I submit that the last section of the bill has been agreed upon; a few formal amendments had been offered by unanimous consent; and I can see nothing to justify the reading of extracts from newspapers in reference to the tariff question.

Mr. DUNHAM. Why not let both sides be heard since one has been?

Mr. THOMAS. I apprehend that no attempt will be made to cut off a reply to the gentleman from New York. The subject-matter under discussion is the providing for the diplomatic and consular service of this Government, having as its object the honor of the country, its political relations with foreign governments, and providing an outlet for its commerce. I therefore ask that the remainder of the article be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. THOMAS. It can be read in that time.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading as above.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Mr. Chairman, I venture to trespass upon the patience of the committee for a moment to say that I agree in the opinions expressed by my colleague [Mr. COX], but not precisely for the reasons assigned by him. I think that the most important gift that it is in the power of the Government of the United States to give to the people of this country is freer trade with foreign countries.

I believe in reciprocal trade—not reciprocal trade growing out of special treaties alone, although I would be indulgent and liberal in the consideration of such treaties, but such reciprocal and liberal arrangements of trade as will secure to our people the great markets of the world.

What are the great markets of the world? Are they in the West India Islands or in South America? Not at all. Notwithstanding our present imperfect trade arrangements, England takes from us more of our products than all the South American states could take if they rer ceived thei whole supply from us. It is impossible for South America and the West Indies to make up in any degree that is appreciable fo the loss of the great European markets we so long have had and which have been the foundations of the commercial prosperity of this country.

I am in favor of a liberal commercial policy toward the other communities in this hemisphere, to use the largest applicable phrase; but I would not press that policy upon the attention of the world as growing out of any spirit of retaliation, much less from any spirit of hostility toward the European people. I do not wish the enterprise, the capital, and the intelligence of Europe to be occupied with the problem of how to get along without American productions; and the danger in the policy on which we seem to be setting out, especially the danger in avowals like those made upon this floor, is that we will excite against us all the power of these communities in an endeavor to find out how they can get along without the cotton and the wheat and the corn of the United States.

Reciprocal and liberal arrangements! Yes; but let them be with all the world; and while I for one shall favor the proposed treaty with Mexico if I have any power to act upon it, while I frankly say that with certain modifications I shall favor the treaty with Spain, my action will not grow out of any hostility to European governments or any desire to retaliate upon them.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to strike out the three last words.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I trust that some understanding by which the distinguished gentleman from New York may occupy five minutes of time may be reached without continuing this debate any further.

Mr. CHACE. I hope the gentleman will not object to a few moments of debate.

Mr. BURNES. I think some conclusion ought to be reached, and unless we can make some arrangement as to the limit of debate I shall feel it my duty to move that the committee rise for that purpose.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say to the gentleman from Missouri, if he means fair play in this matter, that this had better go on for a little while and we will get through without any unnecessary delay. I think the shortest way is to let it run for a few minutes, and there will be no more time occupied, as far as I am concerned, than is necessary to make fitting response to what has been said on the other side.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Do I understand that my colleague when he speaks of "letting it run" proposes to yield his time to me?

Mr. HISCOCK. I am entirely willing to yield my five minutes to my colleague if he will reciprocate. I expect also to have five minutes yielded to me by my other colleague [Mr. COX]; and with the five minutes of my own I will have fifteen. That is all I wish for.

Mr. BURNES. I would like to know what gentlemen want.

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield my five minutes to my colleague [Mr. DORSHEIMER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] has the floor.

Mr. HISCOCK. I was recognized before the gentleman from Missouri was and I have not resumed my seat.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Missouri rose to make a proposition to the committee and had the floor.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman could not take me off my feet to make a motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. HISCOCK. I yield my five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I was proceeding to say when my time expired that with certain modifications I was disposed to entertain favorably the proposed treaty with the Spanish Government; and inasmuch as the whole subject is before us, I hope I may be excused for taking this opportunity to say that the treaty with Nicaragua in my judgment furnishes to this country a method for avoiding a great peril in the future as well as securing an important present advantage.

The peril in the future which I have in my mind is this: I find that by the construction of the canal through the Isthmus of Suez European politics have been changed. It must be remembered that that canal was built against the wishes of the power most interested in the construction of such a highway, and which has since come into the control of the canal and substantially into the control of the country through which the canal is built. But no sooner was it built than it became the pivotal question in European politics, and it now presents the only subject which threatens to disturb the peace of the European continent.

I do not believe it to be possible that a canal shall be built through the Isthmus of Panama by any foreign government without giving to this people, to use a most temperate phrase, causes for serious disquietude. How would it be when to the fleets of some foreign power there was a direct way open to the Pacific coast, while our fleets were required to make the long passage around Cape Horn? Is there not sufficient reason to say that under such circumstances, in some possible exigencies of the future, the people of the United States would not permit that highway to remain in foreign hands, but would take it in their own, by the exercise, if need be, of all the power they possess?

Mr. BURNES rose.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to strike out the last four words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], who is in charge of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not insist on asking to limit debate, at least till the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has been heard, inasmuch as he yielded to his colleague [Mr. DORSHEIMER].

Mr. HISCOCK. There are two or three gentlemen on this side who desire to speak.

Mr. BURNES. Will you be content with fifteen minutes on each side?

Mr. HISCOCK. Suppose we take twenty minutes.

Mr. BURNES. Very well.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand from gentlemen around me that twenty-five minutes will be satisfactory to this side.

Mr. BURNES. I understand unanimous consent is given that debate shall be limited to twenty minutes on each side.

Mr. HISCOCK. Twenty-five minutes on this side. All the time hitherto has been taken on the other side.

Mr. BRUMM. All except five minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to know on what subject debate is to be limited.

Mr. HISCOCK. On the tariff. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] asks unanimous consent that debate shall terminate after twenty minutes have been occupied on each side.

Mr. HISCOCK. Say twenty-five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to twenty-five minutes, but will agree to twenty minutes on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to limiting the debate to twenty minutes on each side? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. REED. I objected to twenty minutes. I think twenty-five minutes should be allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection has now been made both to twenty-five minutes and to twenty minutes.

Mr. BURNES. Make it twenty-two and a half minutes. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] asks unanimous consent that debate shall be limited to twenty-two and a half minutes on each side. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HISCOCK. I listened to my colleague from New York [Mr. COX], and also to the reading of the profession or declaration of political faith on the part of the distinguished Democratic statesman Mr. Seymour, and to my colleague from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER], as they enunciated the old Democratic doctrine that this country should be a purely agricultural country. Jefferson taught it that we ought to have free trade and interchange of commodities with other nations, we selling them the fruits of the earth and buying their goods, and will either of my colleagues state what we have to exchange but agricultural products—our cotton, our wheat, our corn? Yes, it is again the old Jeffersonian doctrine that my colleagues proclaim: that with cheap farm labor we should confine ourselves to tilling the soil, sell our surplus abroad, and buy all except our food abroad; and that the vast mineral resources of our country, the boundless facilities for manufacture, the market of 55,000,000 of people engaged in or supported by our various industries should all be surrendered, and we shall become a nation of farmers and nothing else.

Are we to understand this is to be the policy, too, of the next administration? Is the country to understand such to be the policy of the next administration? The country expecting, fearing that, we hear the sad news from Pittsburgh of the failure of a great iron and steel enterprise. Expecting that this is to be the policy of the next administration, a great banking house in New York, having their capital invested in railroad bonds and seeing nothing but disaster and depression in business in the future, is compelled into insolvency.

And while I am not a prophet, I have no hesitation in declaring that before this Congress adjourns, from other manufacturing centers and from other business centers we shall hear of greater distress and more failures, all precipitated by the agitation that is threatening this country on the part of the next administration. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.]

It is idle, Mr. Chairman, to talk about making this a purely agricultural country. Do gentlemen think that other lands would not have developed their agricultural interests—that India would not have extended her production of wheat; that Australia would not have become a great producer of wheat and wool, even if it had been the policy of this country to remain purely agricultural? Who will say that enterprise would not have gone into the wheat fields of Australia and of India and would not have developed them, and those and other countries would not compete with the American farmer, even though we had confined ourselves to agriculture alone? This country has been compelled to build up her manufacturing interests. She has been compelled to establish the forge and the factory in juxtaposition with the farm, because in other countries and in other lands the agricultural areas were being extended, and our farmers were being forced to find a market at home for their products.

Mr. Chairman, one word in regard to this proposed scheme for the promotion of trade with the South American states, and with reference to the suggestion made by my colleague from New York in favor of certain treaties that are pending. I ask that gentleman what there is that we can sell in those countries even if those treaties be ratified? Do you propose to degrade the manufacturing industries of this country, or those engaged in them—do you propose to degrade American labor down to that point where we can compete with the English manufacturer? We can have nothing to sell in those markets. We can have nothing to send to them, except you are prepared to reduce the price of labor in this country so low that we shall be able to compete with England in the manufacture of those goods South America and Mexico consume. What is to come to us from the treaties then? What benefit are we to have from them? Can we grasp those markets simply because we make these treaties? Those nations will still buy where they can buy cheapest; and if they can buy in England cheaper than they can buy of us, they will buy from England instead of from us. And is there any way in the world for us to compete with England except by reducing the wages of labor in the United States to the same rates that exist in England?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, and Mr. BURNES both addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. On the understanding that a gentleman on the other side of the House is next entitled to the floor, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Chairman, I hope that that rule will not be rigidly enforced.

Mr. HISCOCK. There are several gentlemen on this side that desire to speak, and I prefer to hear them. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The only question is whether the two sides of the House are to be heard alternately.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. BURNES. I yield a portion of my time to my friend from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I think it is a little more vivacious if not dramatic for both sides of the House to alternate in these five-minute debates.

Mr. HISCOCK. I expect that at the proper time my friend from New York [Mr. COX] will yield me five minutes—either he or Mr. DORSHEIMER.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman is a member of the next Congress and I shall be happy then to accommodate him. [Laughter.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I shall appeal to my friend, Mr. DORSHEIMER.

Mr. COX, of New York. Very well. My distinguished friend from New York, who is perhaps the leader of the Republican side of the House——

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no!

Mr. COX, of New York. My distinguished friend undertakes to say that this country ought to be in some sense a manufacturing country, but that we ought not to send our manufactures abroad.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am quite sure that my colleague does not intend to misrepresent me. What I did say is this: that we can not send our manufactured products abroad unless we can manufacture as cheaply as other nations can.

Mr. COX, of New York. I did not yield, Mr. Chairman, and I trust this does not come out of my time.

I did not misinterpret my friend in the inference I drew from his remarks, because I have heard him debate before on these economic questions. He believes in drawing a line, in building a wall of restriction around this country. He said in debate here once, when we had this same subject up in connection with the consular and diplomatic bill, that he was opposed to certain liberalities in our commercial relations with foreign countries.

We come forward now to discuss a question of reciprocity. It is one of diplomacy. It is not altogether a question of tariff, and the gentleman misrepresents us when he says that the Democratic party, or the incoming administration, or Governor Seymour, or somebody, is in favor of making this country altogether agricultural. We are not. This country has grown up under enormous aud unnatural fostering influences for manufactures, but, sir, is not the farm itself an adjunct to the factory? In fact the farm itself is a great factory.

But are gentlemen consistent in this tirade against liberal commercial policies? Why, sir, this Republican party, after many years of protection, have come forward all at once with a lot of reciprocal treaties, free-trade treaties.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon—not the Republican party.

Mr. COX, of New York. Well, at least the Republican administration. Bismarck once said of Napoleon, after the battle of Sedan: "Napoleon has a great future behind him." That is the condition of our Republican friends. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] They have made these unconfirmed treaties through their administration, and now, when trouble and ruin are coming upon the industries of the country, when even the great petted industry of all—iron—is breaking up in Pittsburgh, its very seat and center, the gentleman says it is all owing to Democratic success.

Why, is it not under these very laws passed by Republicans that this calamity has come upon the country? You, gentlemen [addressing the Republican side of the House] are reponsible for that sort of hotbed growth which gave us our surplus and which has brought on us bankruptcy. You are responsible, for your laws still remain. And is it not a sad commentary or is it a vengeful Nemesis that the very man who as a member of the Tariff Commission did the most to cook up your last tariff revision is among the first to fall as a five-million victim before the blow of your vicious legislation?

We may as well have this thing understood now as in the future. What authority has my friend and colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] to speak for Governor Cleveland? Where did he get the power to read the policy of the administration not yet in power which was elected in November last? Who told him what would be done by that administration? All that he can find out about that future is written in our platform; and if our platform be ambiguous he must wait for the future in the legislation of Congress. We promise nothing as to a future We only say, as was said so well by my colleague behind me [Mr. DORSHEIMER], that when it comes to reciprocity, when it comes to building up trade with republican nations of our own hemisphere, we will do by them what our fathers wisely did as between the States of this Union. They adopted the principle of laissez faire. [Here the hammer fell.] With that French phrase I will stop. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I wonder that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] does not for a moment consider what would be the sole result of the action which he advocates. It surely can not be he is ignorant that to-day we have the most perfect access to all the markets of the world. The difficulty is that we can not sell our goods in the markets of the world, because we can not produce them as cheaply as other nations can produce theirs. And what is the reason? It is one and simple: because for every dollar that competing nations pay to their laboring men the United States pay $1.60. How can we compete? Again the answer is simple: take the 60 cents from the laboring man. Does the gentleman from New York dare to avow that this is his purpose? Yet it must be his purpose, because in no other way can the markets of the world be opened to us for the sale in them of our products to any greater extent than they are sold there to-day. There is the whole subject in a nutshell.

And when the gentleman talks about throwing open to us the markets of the world, that is not the real meaning of what he says. What he means is to throw open the markets of the United States to the outside world—to give the cheap labor of other nations free course against our more costly labor; in other words, to cut down by that action the wages of our laboring men. Thereby he will achieve that splendid result which is to-day the dream of the free-trader, of having our goods jostling in the markets of the world with the products of the cheap labor of Europe at the expense of cheaper wages for our mechanics and our laboring men.

There is another paradise of the unwise which is perpetually being urged here, and that is "free raw material." "The markets of the world" and "free raw material" are what delight the Democratic heart. "Free raw material" means what a Democrat wants to introduce into his mill; what goes out at the other end he wants protected. What he means by "free raw material" is that he shall get at the lowest prices the work of such men as are not strong enough to come here and see that they are protected.

It is the constant repetition of these mistaken ideas that is liable to do damage, unless people go right down to the bottom of these matters and recognize the great fact that labor is the cause of all wealth, and that we can not make discrimination between one class of labor and another, but all must be sustained by the same American system.

Mr. BURNES. I yield five minutes to my friend from New York [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I yield to my colleague [Mr. DORSHEIMER].

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the House apprehended my meaning when I was interrupted before, and therefore I shall not resume the line of comment I was then making, but which I would have been glad to have finished. I turn to the more tempting fields which have been opened by my colleague from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

My colleague says that manufacturing establishments are closing their doors and bankers failing because of the public apprehensions as to the effect of Democratic administration. Did the failures of 1873 grow out of apprehensions of Democratic administration? Did the disasters of last April and May grow out of such apprehensions? Is there any man in this country who eats less, wears less, uses less, than he would have done if Governor Cleveland had not been elected?

No; it is perfectly clear what the reason of the present distresses is. It is the result of Republican administration, which has taken a hundred millions a year more than was needed out of the pockets of the people [applause on the Democratic side], and which has caused a large part of the laborers of this country to be employed in unprofitable occupations.

I say now to my colleague and to the distinguished gentleman from Maine that we are not to be frightened at all by any suggestion about the labor question, and we distinctly avow that it is neither to the interest of the country nor to the interest of the laborer that the workingman should be employed at unprofitable occupations. Let our people seek, as they well can, the employments which the country, with its natural aptitudes and resources will furnish them for profitable employment, and let an end come to that mistaken policy which gives the workingman high wages for his summer work, but which during the winter months sends him to starve in the streets and highways.

It is no time now, with our cities filled with discharged workmen, with the highways frequented by tramps going from house to house asking for food—it is no time, I say, to talk about the higher wages in this country. You make statistics on the wages which are paid; you take into no account whatever all the long months of no work. Your policy has brought upon the workingmen the affliction of no work, and that policy has been the cause of the distresses which my friend from New York jestingly perhaps attributes to an apprehension of the consequences of Democratic rule.

The workingmen are not scared into idleness; they are idle because you have ground them down by taxation, taking from them savings which might have supported them in periods of distress by a policy which has set them at unprofitable occupations which have disappeared with the first blast of adverse winds. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. DORSHEIMER] and myself disagree as to the causes of the failures in the past year. When the people of this country made the mistake of electing this Congress and it was understood that the tariff agitation was reopened failures commenced, the business of the country was unsettled; and when this House convened, when it was organized by the elevation to the Speaker's chair of a distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania was deposed and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] was put at the head of the Committee on Ways and Means and the 20 per cent. reduction scheme was proposed here the list of insolvents and the bankruptcies in this country increased. Mr. Chairman, the agitation which was begun by this House in my judgment is the sole and only cause of the financial distress of the past year.

Mr. HERBERT. Does not the gentleman know——

Mr. HISCOCK. And looking forward to the policy of the next administration, with the utterances ringing in my ears of my friend from New York—"the friend" of Grover Cleveland from New York—who seems almost authorized to speak for it on this floor, I fear there is nothing but financial distress for us in the future.

Mr. HERBERT. Does not the gentleman know this late panic did not begin until after the defeat of the Morrison bill and until the agitation had ceased?

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will answer that suggestion. In the late Presidential canvass the parties quite openly announced that for which they were fighting, and during that contest everything was held in abeyance, and now that it was decided in favor of Grover Cleveland and a Democratic administration the whole country pauses and waits to see what will be the outcome of it all. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that two Representatives from New York, one understood to hold close relations to the next President, have taken occasion on this floor, seemingly by authority, to indicate what the policy of that administration is to be. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the only security of this country for the next four years will be found in certain Democrats on the other side of the House, some twenty-five or thirty in number, who will be found uniting with this side of the House and standing by the laborers of the country, with the manufacturers of the country, and in support of that policy which has so grandly developed our industries and prospered the nation.

Mr. Chairman, one word more in reference to this labor question. My colleague from New York [Mr. COX] has alluded to the past of the Republican party; he said truly we can look back upon a glorious past, considering my country, not my party. I have no hope his party has in front of it so glorious a future. In the past we have given remunerative profits to manufacturers, we have given remunerative wages to laborers, but as was well said by the gentleman from Maine, as was most tersely said by that gentleman, it is utterly impossible for us to build up this commerce with South American states or with any other states unless you reduce the prices of the wages in this country from 33 to 50 per cent. And when gentlemen urge those treaties upon us, I must assume they intend to legislate for cheap labor and the ignorance, vice, poverty, and degradation incident to it.

It is true the two great parties went before the country upon the issue. I regret, and so will this country regret, that the platform of the Democratic party looked in both directions upon this great question. And a cheated, defrauded country for four years will wait in the distress, in the poverty, in the bankruptcy of its industries and the pauperism of its people to right the wrong.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURNES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, the old idea that a low rate of wages makes low cost of production is a relic of barbarism. It has long been exploded in politico-economic science. The law is precisely to the contrary, that high rates of wages make low cost of production.

If the gentleman—my friend from Maine—who has been predicting such ruinous consequences to follow by opening up our trade with the world had read carefully the articles in this volume of the census manufactures, being a tabulated statement of the cotton and woolen manufactures and the iron as well as other different branches of manufactures in this country, he would have seen by all the authorities that the rate of wages has been constantly on the increase in the United States while the cost of production has been constantly on the decline.

What is the cause of the change? It is because the people of the United States, sir, more largely than any other people in the world, produce by the great and multiplied power of machinery. Why, by the process of machine labor to-day we turn out by hundreds and thousands per cent. more of our products than by the manual labor of fifty or sixty years ago. It has multiplied the productive power of labor a thousand-fold; and if the gentleman will take the article on cotton manufactures, an article written by Mr. Edward Atkinson, and which I read this morning before I came up here to the House, he will find a multitude of facts to show the constant and largely increased reduction in the cost of production of this branch of manufacture, while in the last fifty years the wages of the operatives employed in the cotton mills have grown higher and higher, until they are to-day at least 100 per cent. in advance of what they were at that time.

Let me ask how are these facts to be reconciled? It is so also in great measure with Great Britain.

Mr. HISCOCK. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does not the gentleman from Texas understand that so far as this is concerned it applies exclusively or mostly to the cheaper fabrics?

Mr. MILLS. I do not so understand it; it applies to all.

Mr. HISCOCK. But in larger part it applies to the cheaper fabrics.

Mr. MILLS. But the gentleman will perceive that it applies to iron as well as to cotton goods. It applies to all branches of manufacture where machinery has been largely introduced. Everything produced by machinery shows the same increase, an increase exceeding 20 per cent. and 100 per cent. or a thousand per cent. more than mere manual labor can do.

Take the old spinning-jenny and the weaving-machine, the hand-loom of our ancestors, and compare it with the process of to-day. One weaver on a power-loom to-day will turn out a thousand times more work than could possibly have been done by the hand-loom; and just in proportion as that man has the capacity to turn out more profit for his employer are his wages increased, because it is an invariable rule of political economy that the price of the wage measures the value of the labor, just as the price of the interest measures the value of money.

Why, it is perfectly preposterous to talk of low wages entering into and forming an important factor in the low cost of production. It must be evident that such an idea is preposterous; for if it be true, how is it that Germany does not drive Great Britain out of the markets of the world? I ask gentlemen to answer me that question. Germany pays wages 50 per cent. lower than Great Britain does—yea, more than 50 per cent. So also with France. France pays lower wages than Great Britain, and yet both France and Germany are clamoring for protection against the free-trade labor of England. Why, if Great Britain could make larger profits by cheapening her labor, does she not follow the example of France and Germany? Why is it that France and Germany do not give fairer wages to their laborers. The answer is, simply because they still continue to work at the old hand system in labor; and the laborer is not worth the tenth or the twentieth as much to his employer as the laborer who sits down and acquires the capacity to understand the machinery intrusted to his care, and can run six power-looms, with all their immense capacity for turning out work.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be exceedingly proper that this question should be exhaustively discussed on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill; and I am not surprised at the position taken by gentlemen who have spoken already on the other side of the House. The only thing that confuses me is this—we have only heard from one branch or wing of that side. Why this quietness, this silence on the part of the other wing? What is the cause of this remarkable stillness on the part of the other branch of the Democratic party? Where is the distinguished leader whose voice has been heard throughout the South during the holiday vacation converting you gentlemen, at least so said the Democratic press. Where are the converts? I would like to have them stand up and be counted. [Laughter.] I had been led to suppose that the entire South had been revolutionized on this great tariff question by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but to my astonishment the ignorance seems to be as deep and dark as ever over there. [Great laughter.]

As to the position taken by the gentleman from Texas and my friend from New York, Mr. DORSHEIMER, they claim and have been for years claiming that the manufacturers of this country are growing rich beyond all measure out of the enormous profits they are gobbling up from the laborers of this land aided by the Republican tariff system. Explain, if you can, why Mr. Oliver, of Pittsburgh, has had to succumb, one of the most able and careful business men living in the United States. Why have so many other able and upright business men gone down in the same way during the past eight months?

Was it because the Republican party has heaped wealth, as we have been repeatedly told, into the coffers of these manufacturers? Ah! by no means. The trouble with business to-day arises from the fact that you gentlemen are continually tinkering and meddling with laws that ought to be left alone. When business gets established and people are doing it in a prosperous way your party comes into power in Congress, and the first thing you seek is to hunt out somebody who is making something somewhere, and then go for him. [Laughter.] The policy of the Democratic party has been for the last fifteen years to prevent as much as possible anybody from having a prosperous business, to deprive every one who has anything of what he has, and then arrange the law so that no one can hereafter find any profitable enterprise to engage in. That seems to be your policy to-day.

Mr. Chairman, this country needs two or three years for its business to become stable. First let it be well settled that we are not seeking to rob the workingmen of this country, that we believe in higher wages for them in the United States than they can get in any other nation on the face of the earth, and then let the tariff laws alone. The Republican party believes in so administering the laws of this land as to everywhere protect labor. To do that you must build up those industries that furnish employment. The diversity of industries is necessary to furnish work for all our people and to enable fair prices for their work to be maintained.

I am very glad that this question has come up, because I had supposed that our Democratic friends had gone to sleep in the security of their success, and I had hoped they were going to permit the wiser counsels of the minority of their party to prevail for at least this session. But I find I am mistaken. The old element has——

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Broken loose.

Mr. HORR. Yes; as my friend suggests, the old element has broken loose again. The country will understand—it is no revelation to me; I have sat here long enough to have learned the fact—that the majority of the Democratic party at heart are free-traders. I have known this for some time. Many of you actually believe in free trade. A few of you only have the courage to say so. I desire the country to know just where you do stand.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope some gentleman on that side will have time to answer the present administration—the Secretary of the Treasury and the President—on the tariff question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman refer to the present Secretary of the Treasury extending the bonded period seven months after this House refused to do it? Free whisky is what you want.

Mr. BURNES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. HISCOCK. I would inquire of the Chair how much time we have on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. After the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] finishes there will be two and a half minutes left for debate on each side.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Michigan seeks to adjust the Democratic party to what he conceives to be right political thought. Before we see fit to take up any issue with him on that subject we will remit him to work that has to be done in his own Congressional district. The people there seem to be needing education as well as here. [Laughter.]

I regret very much, Mr. Chairman, that it so happens that we have taken upon ourselves, in a debate of thirty minutes, to deal with various subjects which it is impossible for us to discuss in that time. One gentleman thrusts upon us the treaty with Mexico; and then comes the Spanish treaty; and then comes the Nicaragua Canal question, and the Monroe doctrine, &c.

Mr. HISCOCK. Who thrust those questions upon you?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not care to be interrupted. The witnesses are all about. I am complaining of no particular person. But I say that any speeches which may have been made on this side of the House on these questions do not bind every one on this side, I trust. There are likely to be diversities of opinion on these questions not marked at all by the differences which grow out of views upon the tariff, or internal taxation, or any questions of taxation.

Then again, sir, we have thrust upon us the question of the tariff, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], forgetting the accuracy that belongs to this floor, rehearses to us the campaign speeches which failed so notably in November last in effect upon the people. He tells us that the election of Grover Cleveland brought about the great distress in the manufacturing establishments. Sir, the people of this country are too intelligent to accept that statement. The men conducting the business of those establishments are announcing day by day, as the cause of their failure, that they are producing more than the people of this country can consume. And the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] tells us in this attitude of affairs this truth, which I can not believe can be questioned by any fair-minded man, that we have no hope of unloading this overproduction on foreign markets. Then they have a class of laborers engaged in the manufacturing industries of this country that are doomed to the great severities and hardships which, by reason of overstimulation of production, the policy of the Republican party has brought upon them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HORR. I desire just half a minute, and I will then yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. BURNES. My understanding is that five minutes still remain for debate on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. Only two and a half minutes.

Mr. CHACE. Did not the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] propose that twenty-five minutes should be allowed on each side?

Mr. BURNES. That was my understanding.

Mr. CHACE. That will leave five minutes still to each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the question on twenty minutes and on twenty-five minutes, and objection was made to both propositions. Then the proposition for twenty-two and a half minutes on each side was submitted and was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let us have it understood now that the whole time for each side shall be twenty-five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from New York?

Objection was made.

Mr. HORR. I have merely one word to say, and that is to express my astonishment that my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] should have the impression that because in the last election there was a majority of votes in my district for another man, therefore our argument on this question falls to the ground. It would not, perhaps, be polite for me to say that that is a kind of reasoning that I have heard before on this floor, and that always up to this time it has come from men of very small caliber. Heretofore it has never struck me as meaning anything.

I want to say to him further, that he is not the man who should throw that in my face, for I find from the Directory that he holds his seat in this House on a vote of only a little over 3,000; and let me tell him that over 17,000 voters tried to send me back here at the last election; so that I have got more votes even now than he has ever had in four long years, put them all together. [Laughter.] With such a vote as that I submit he should be slow to put on airs.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I should like to know what time there is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. There was an understanding that five minutes should be allowed on each side. That leaves two minutes and a half on the Republican side, and five minutes on the Democratic side.

Mr. BLOUNT. I prefer to take my time at the conclusion of the debate.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, have I four minutes left?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The gentleman from Maine has only two minutes and a half.

Mr. BURNES. I understood the Chair to say awhile ago that there was five minutes left on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BURNES. Well, as a matter of course, the five minutes on the other side should be consumed——

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri concedes that I have four minutes, and he is on the other side. Can not the chairman do as well for us as that? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine has only two minutes and a half left. The Chair can not go beyond the agreement.

Mr. REED. But a gentleman on the other side says that we have four minutes.

Mr. BURNES. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] used up half of the time on that side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] will proceed. He has only two minutes and a half left, unless more time is allowed.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, it is utterly impossible to take up the thread of this discussion in that time, so I propose only to make one or two suggestions. I was very anxious that my colleague [Mr. DINGLEY] should have taken my place, for he could have given the figures. It will not do to permit this discussion to go on under the impression that during the last twenty years our foreign trade has decreased. The fact is that our foreign trade has increased, and it has more than doubled during the prevalence of the system to which the gentleman from New York has so great an objection.

I have also a suggestion to make to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]. He says there is overproduction of the various manufactures in this country. That is true in the sense that now our markets are glutted. He says that there is no remedy for it, no means by which we can find markets abroad. Now, why is that? Our products are selling at starvation prices to-day. Why is it that we can not sell them abroad? Simply because under free trade there has been precisely the same so-called overproduction in other nations and the markets of the world have become crowded, so that manufactured products in other countries are selling at what are starvation prices even with reference to the low wages that are paid in England.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say to this House, in my jndgment we are suffering from a depression which does not have so much to do with the subject in controversy here as it does with the eternal laws of human nature. If you look abroad you will find failures and commercial distress all over the world, and you are going to have in the future, in due time, recuperation. The foundation for that recuperation is to be the return of general confidence, and that can only come by stability in our legislation and by letting the tariff alone.

Mr. BURNES. I yield half of my remaining time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], and the other half to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE].

Mr. CURTIN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. I want to say that all the business centers are becoming more prosperous, confidence is reviving, labor is better paid, everything is improving. I do not wish this debate to go out to depress the people. I desire rather to dissipate the clouds that have been hanging over the business interests of the country. Gentlemen on the other side ought to have made their speeches before the election instead of now. It is all humbug. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is entitled to the floor for two minutes and a half.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] in his irritation took occasion to say substantially that the remark I made came from a small source.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania (to Mr. BLOUNT). He excepted you.

Mr. HORR. I said "the remarks up to this time." I made you an exception. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is happier now than he was when he made his speech; and he gives a better tone to his voice. I trust that his happiness may continue from now on, and that we shall have no more of his asperity.

But it is proper, sir, that I should say something in reply to his statement of the vote for myself as shown by the Congressional Directory. The gentleman states it as about 3,000.

Mr. HORR. A little bit over 3,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. "A little bit over 3,000." Now, Mr. Chairman, the whole explanation of the case is that I represent a population largely agricultural, and I happen not to have had opposition in my canvass. On the earlier occasions when I ran for Congress I had a contest, and there was a full vote. An examination of the record discloses the fact that in the Congressional districts of other gentlemen from Georgia where for many years there was a hot contest there was a full vote. This is an entire explanation. And this accounts for the full vote of my friend from Michigan. He had a hot contest, I am told, and there was a full vote polled—enough, sir, to bring about the election of his opponent, notwithstanding the enormous vote that my friend received. Perhaps, however, I ought not to refer to that again, as I wish to say nothing unpleasant.

But so far as concerns my own vote and the vote of some other gentlemen of my State, the condition of things pointed out by the gentleman grows entirely out of the fact that there happened to be no opposition. I may add that in my district and in others this state of affairs has grown oftentimes out of suggestions on the part of the Republicans that they should have no candidate. The policy of the Republican party was to make their fights in other directions. Again, there is the further fact that in that section of the country that party has hardly anybody agitating elections except the men who want offices; and these men fight each other, not wanting anybody else nominated, because they come here and claim office by reason of their candidacy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has expired. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] is now entitled to the floor for the remainder of the time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. CONVERSE. Mr. Chairman, it must be a matter of profound regret to the country that on this important question we have heard from but one wing of the Republican party to-day, and that does not happen to be the administration portion of the party. We have not heard from the gentlemen who represent on this floor the views of the President, or the gentlemen who represent Secretary McCulloch. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen who have spoken upon the opposite side of the Chamber have no authority to state the present position, and they do not correctly state the past position, of the Democratic party upon the questions of tariff, taxation, revenue, protection, or the various questions affecting the industries of the country. The position which Jefferson and Madison and Jackson occupied was not that ascribed to them by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]; but I can say to him and to other gentlemen on that side that the Democratic party to-day does occupy precisely the position occupied by Jefferson, by Madison, by Jackson upon those important questions. We are all in favor of a reduction of taxation. We are all in favor of administrative reform.

Gentlemen need not undertake to say that the country is frightened by the prospect of the Democratic party coming into power. Have you not a Republican Senate? Can there be any radical changes in the laws without the consent of a Republican Senate? There will not probably be any change in the political complexion of the Senate for the next two, three, or four years. The Democracy have made no changes in the laws which could bring about the present embarrassed condition of the industries, and no such changes are comtemplated. But there is a prospect of effecting some reform in the administration of the Government; and upon this question our party is united as one man. The central and most pressing thought in the late political canvass was administrative reform, and I hope it will be such in the incoming administration. If gentlemen desire to look into the cause of the hard times and the business failures, they will find it in the fact that the people have been robbed by excessive taxation, and those taxes have been to the extent of hundreds of millions withdrawn from the productive industries and the channels of trade to be piled up in the Treasury. That vast sum unjustly exacted from the people and hoarded by the Government excites the cupidity of the dishonest and serves as a temptation to the weak to induce them to sustain all sorts of extravagant enterprises. An overflowing Treasury has led to a multiplication of offices, to an increase of salaries, and to vast appropriations for various improper objects. These things at least, it is to be hoped, the Democratic party will reform in a measure during the next four years. No more money ought to be collected than is sufficient to carry on the Government, economically administered, and pay its debts. All beyond that necessity of the Government should be left in the channels of industry and the pockets of the people.

But certain it is that our party will be united upon the doctrine expressed in the platform adopted at Chicago. Gentlemen suggest that that platform may look two ways. It does not look two ways.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Which way does it look?

Mr. GIBSON. It looks to the White House.

Mr. CONVERSE. It looks exactly where Jefferson looked, where Madison looked, where Jackson looked. The incoming President will give it interpretation by his acts and his administration.

Mr. MILLIKEN (while the chairman rapped loudly) addressed to Mr. CONVERSE a question which could not be heard.

Mr. CONVERSE. I can not hear the gentleman's inquiry; but I can say to him that that platform looks to reform in all the Departments of the Government; it looks to a more rigid accountability and a more exacting economy; it looks to the stopping of stealing; it looks to stopping the attempt to carry elections by "bull-dogs" or by money sent from New York. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We propose to have honest government and honest elections, North as well as South.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for this debate has now expired. The question recurs on the amendments moved by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

The amendments were adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Under agreement we will now return to dispose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, line 149, strike out "of thirteen" and insert "(in pursuance of the provisions of section 1704 of the Revised Statutes and section 5 of the consular and diplomatic appropriation act, approved June 11, 1874,) of eight," and same line and lines 150 and 151, strike out "to be appointed under section 1704 of the Revised Statutes, $13,000" and insert "at $1,200 each per annum, and five consular clerks at $1,000 each per annum, $14,600;" so that it will read:

"For salaries (in pursuance of the provisions of section 1704 of the Revised Statutes and section 5 of the consular and diplomatic appropriation act, approved June 11, 1874,) of eight consular clerks at $1,200 each per annum, and five consular clerks at $1,000 each per annum, $14,600."

The CHAIRMAN. The appropriation bill referred to, in the opinion of the Chair, is directory for the appropriation of that year. The amendment contemplates more money than the Revised Statutes, and the Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. BURNES moved that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7857) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes; and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. BURNES demanded the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

By unanimous consent the amendments were agreed to in gross, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the vote on the passage of the bill will be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 240, nays 0, not voting 83; as follows:

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BURNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, under instructions from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I submit a bill and report, what is commonly known as the river and harbor bill, making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes. I ask that the bill be printed and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. All points of order being reserved.

The SPEAKER. The reservation of points of order will be noted.

Mr. WILLIS. It is proper to say that there is an item on which the committee is divided. I refer to the Hennepin Canal. The minority believe it is not within the jurisdiction of the committee; the majority think otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. Will a separate vote be allowed on the two reports?

Mr. WILLIS. That is for the House to say.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7972) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. WILLIS. I believe a member of the committee, Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, desires consent to file a minority report.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. If it be necessary, I ask consent of the House to submit the report of the minority on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the views of the minority will be printed to accompany the report of the committee.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is understood that points of order are reserved?

The SPEAKER. Points of order have been reserved by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (S. 929) granting a pension to Caroline Treckell; and
A bill (S. 764) granting an increase of pension to Abbie P. Arnold.

KICKAPOO INDIANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, recommending legislation on behalf of members of the Kickapoo tribe of Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HENRY C. FRAZIER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting papers in the claim of Henry C. Frazier on account of depredations by Chiricahua Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, my object being to reach the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Indian service.

Mr. CHACE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana that it is only within the last hour that members of the House have been able to get printed copies of this bill. It is late in the afternoon, and there are a number of little matters that gentlemen want to have taken up and which they have been trying to get before the House for a long time. There are also some bills that members would like to have passed by unanimous consent. I suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana, therefore, that he allow this bill to go over and give members the opportunity to do some little things that are pressing very much indeed.

Mr. RANDALL. There is nothing pressing so much as the annual appropriation bills.

Mr. CHACE. We have had no opportunity to examine the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Rhode Island if this is allowed to go over if he will promise to read the bill through? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHACE. The bill is a very long one, and would not be more than read through this evening; and gentlemen will probably have until Tuesday to examine it if it is allowed to go over this evening.

Mr. ELLIS. I must insist upon the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The Clerk will read the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7970) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a very long bill and its consideration will probably extend over until next Tuesday. I therefore suggest that by unanimous consent the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that——

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Chairman, I shall object, and insist upon the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, perhaps it would be wholly beneficial to the views of the gentleman from Rhode Island if he will listen to the proposition that I desire to offer. The gentleman from Louisiana, as I understand it, does not desire to proceed with the argument this evening.

Mr. CHACE. Will he make way then for these little matters to which I have referred?

Mr. RANDALL. I shall object to that. If we are not to go on with this bill we had better adjourn.

Mr. KEIFER. Let the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, with the understanding that we do not go on to-day with the general discussion of the bill.

Mr. ELLIS. I am willing to agree to a general understanding that the committee rise and the House adjourn. On that agreement we will dispense with the first formal reading of the bill.

Mr. REED. I think there will be no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman who made the objection did it under a misapprehension and is willing to withdraw it.

Mr. REED. It is understood that we are to adjourn at once on going back into the House?

Mr. RANDALL. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. ELLIS. Then I make that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his objection?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I withdraw the objection to the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The objection being withdrawn, the first formal reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7970) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope the gentleman will yield to me that I may introduce a bill for reference.

Several members demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the question on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, January 19, 1885.

THE PRAYER.

The Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray. Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, we come again to worship before Thee; and we pray that Thou wilt so dispose our minds that the words of our mouth and the meditation of our hearts may be acceptable in Thy sight. Our iniquities have separated between us and our God; and that we are at all tolerated as worshipers in Thy presence is another proof of that long suffering which ages ago was proclaimed as one of the distinguishing characteristics of Thy nature.

Thou art He by whom kings reign and princes decree justice. Thou art pleased to carry out Thy purposes in no small part by the governments which men, under the direction of God-implanted impulses, have established throughout the earth. One of these governments is represented in this Chamber, and we pray that the legislation of this body may be so under Thy control that the history of the nation, so far as may be learned by the proceedings here, may show us striving to become a people whose God shall be the Lord.

We are this day to be reminded of the uncertainties of life. Members of the Senate shall rise in their places to honor the memory of the distinguished dead. They shall recount his virtues; they shall emphasize the intellectual and moral characteristics which eminently fitted him for the high position he occupied so long and with such credit to himself and to the country; and we humbly pray that this recital may stir us up to such a consecration of our talents as shall develop an absolutely faithful service to the nation for the days that are to come.

And do Thou help us so to spend the few days which remain to us upon the earth that the discriminating eulogist may pronounce upon our personal and political career, as he in candor must this day pronounce upon the career of him we mourn, the benedictions of a grateful and appreciative country.

And, more than this, may the services we shall be able humbly to render to the nation be impelled by such a desire to please the nation's God that, while men shall speak well of what has been, it shall please Thee to pronounce blessings upon us during the ages yet to be. We ask it in the name of Him who is the resurrection and the life. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 13th instant, Circular No. 282, regarding the assessment and exportation of distilled spirits; which, with the accompanying papers, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF PUBLIC PRINTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Public Printer, transmitting his annual report, showing the condition of the public printing, binding, &c., for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of John H. Williams and 12 other citizens of Arkansas, praying compensation for services rendered by them as United States soldiers under Col. A. H. Ryan, in the State of Arkansas, during the late war, and for the use and loss of their horses while thus engaged; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS. I hold in my hand a paper addressed to myself, to my colleague [Mr. JACKSON], and to my colleague in the House, the member from the Memphis district [Mr. YOUNG], signed by a committee of the city government, a committee of the Cotton Exchange, and a committee of the Merchants' Exchange, of Memphis, Tenn., praying for an appropriation for the protection of Memphis Harbor. It is evidently intended as a petition to the Senate, although addressed to us personally. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it be received as a petition, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be received, and so referred.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to procure the passage of a law "to adjust certain accounts between the United States and the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, as set forth in House bill 110 and dated December 10, 1883.

Whereas on December 10, 1883, Hon. BARCLAY HENLEY, of California, introduced in the House House bill 110, which was referred to the House Committee on Claims; and on December 18, 1883, Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, of California, introduced in the Senate Senate bill 795, which was referred to the Senate Committee on Finance, as follows, namely:

"A bill to adjust certain accounts between the United States and Territories and the District of Columbia.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit each of the several States and Territories, and the District of Columbia, with the amounts of money heretofore laid upon and apportioned to said States, Territories, and District of Columbia, respectively, levied as a direct tax under the provisions of the eighth section of the act of Congress, approved August 5, 1861, entitled 'An act to provide increased revenue from imports to pay interest on the public debt, and other purposes;' and he shall thereafter state an account between the United States and each of said States, Territories, and District, respectively, and he shall pay to each thereof, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums of money as may appear to the credit of each thereof upon the books of the Treasury arising from such settlement."

The foregoing bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall credit each State with the amount of money assessed against it for direct taxes under the act of August 5, 1861.

The effect of the passage by Congress of said bill will be to refund to those States which have paid the amounts of such assessments to the extent of the sums by them so paid, and to release those States which have not paid, from hereafter paying all said taxes, and also from all future liability to pay the same. While the right of the General Government to raise revenue by direct taxation is unquestioned, it is patent that this direct tax was in the nature of an enforced loan; and it was made in this form only because it was required to meet the great exigency then upon the country; and

Whereas several of the States now owe the General Government from a quarter to a half million dollars each, on account of this direct tax, while others have paid their full quota: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to urge the passage of the bill hereinbefore referred to, and use their best endeavors to secure to the State the amount paid to the United States by this forced tax.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of the Senators and Representatives by the governor of Ohio.

A. D. MARSH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN G. WARWICK,
President of the Senate.

Adopted January 14, 1885.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OHIO,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, James S. Robinson, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of house joint resolution No. 66, adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, on the 14th day of January, A. D. 1885, taken from the original rolls filed in this office.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, the 15th day of January, A. D. 1885.

[SEAL.] J. S. ROBINSON, Secretary of State.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of John J. Smith and other citizens of Massachusetts, saying that they have seen with pleasure the passage of a bill through the House relating to interstate commerce, containing a clause forbidding any discrimination in passenger traffic on account of race or color; and they desire that in any bill which may be passed by the Senate on the subject a similar provision may be inserted. I move that the petition lie upon the table, as the bill is now pending.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of George H. Maintien Post, No. 133, Department of Massachusetts, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the publication of certain photographic illustrations in the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I present a statement, in the nature of a memorial to Congress, signed by merchants of New York city, setting forth their opinion "that the proposed Spanish treaty is as a whole against the interest of the people of the United States, and ought not to be ratified." I present the paper and ask that it be received as a memorial and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be received and so referred.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented resolutions adopted by the Blue and Grey Veterans of Fresno, Cal., urging that General U. S. Grant be placed on the retired-list of the Army with the rank of General; and stating that the ex-confederates belonging to that organization especially desire that this may be done in gratitude for his determined stand in protection of their paroles of honor; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of 301 business men, officials, and workmen of Allegheny, Pa., praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Allegheny River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1684) for the relief of Clement A. Lounsberry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2399) for the relief of Maj. Michael P. Small, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

JOHN E. WHEELOCK.

Mr. LAPHAM. The Committee on Foreign Relations have instructed me to report back with amendments the joint resolution (H. Res. 237) for the relief of John E. Wheelock, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations were, in line 5, to strike out the word "gross" and insert "alleged;" and in lines 7 and 8 to strike out the words "demand and enforce in such manner as he may deem best, an immediate" and to insert "urge an early;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

That the President be directed to bring to the attention of the Government of Venezuela the claim of John E. Wheelock, a citizen of the United States, for indemnity for alleged outrages and tortures inflicted upon him by an officer of said Venezuelan Government, and to urge an early settlement of said claim.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 2562) to establish a quarantined live-stock trail, and to regulate commerce between the States as to live-stock; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he hereby is, directed to communicate to the Senate a document prepared in his Department containing a documentary history of the railway mail service from its origin in 1834 to the present time.

DEATH OF SENATOR ANTHONY.

Mr. ALDRICH. According to previous notice, I offer the following resolutions and ask for their present consideration:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of HENRY B. ANTHONY, late a Senator from the State of Rhode Island.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended, to enable his associates to pay proper tribute of regard to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, he who was here the senior in service, and first in the affections of his associates, rests in

The lone couch of his everlasting sleep.

His great heart with all its attractive qualities has ceased to beat. His stalwart form, so recently instinct with strength and life, is crumbling in the dust.

He who has so often lighted up with the touches of his matchless eloquence the character of others is no more. Oppressed by a sense of personal loss which is beyond expression, and by the sorrow of separation from a wise counsellor and faithful friend, I despair of rightly interpreting the story of his honorable life and rendering an adequate tribute of praise to his memory.

HENRY BOWEN ANTHONY was born at Coventry, R. I., April 1, 1815. His ancestors had for more than a century and a half resided on Rhode Island soil. His father, William Anthony, and his maternal grandfather, James Greene, were Quakers. His father was a cotton manufacturer, and the establishment of which he was manager was the third of its kind erected in the State.

William Anthony was a man of strong character, greatly respected by his neighbors, and it is easy to trace the influence of his wise teachings and watchful care in the future character of the son. The latter was, in his early life, imbued with the doctrines of the Society of Friends, which left their impress on his nature, developing that gentleness of manner and love of peaceful methods, that strict integrity and conscientious devotion to duty, which were the most striking traits of his character.

He received a preparatory education in a private school at Providence and entered Brown University in 1829. At college he had the benefit of the teachings of the distinguished Dr. Wayland, then president of the university. After his graduation, in 1833, he entered the office of his brother in Providence with the intention of engaging with him in the business of manufacturing. He remained there five years, spending, however, a portion of his time in the prosecution of his business at Savannah, Ga. At this time he was a casual contributor to newspapers and magazines; and a poem written by him during his stay in Savannah attracted considerable attention. We can readily imagine that he found literary work more congenial to his tastes than the exacting demands of a business life.

Mr. ANTHONY first became connected with public affairs as a journalist. In 1838, at the age of twenty-three, without previous training, except as an occasional contributor of literary articles, he assumed the editorial charge of the Providence Journal. He accepted the position at the request of a kinsman, who was then the proprietor of that paper, to fill a vacancy, and with the understanding that the arrangement was to continue only for a few weeks; but the connection thus made did not cease until the day of his death. His success as an editor was instant and marked. The time at which he took charge of the Journal was one of great political excitement in Rhode Island. The bitter struggle which was then going on to change the government of the State for the avowed purpose of securing an enlargement of the suffrage brought the contestants to the verge of civil war.

In this contest, Mr. ANTHONY, who when a young man, as in later years, was conservative in his instincts, naturally took the side of "law and order." The triumph of the party to which he was attached was largely due to the vigorous and incisive advocacy of the Journal under his control. His brilliant leadership attracted some of the brightest and best men of his State to his support. The members of the party which he led with such consummate ability, were prompt to acknowledge and to show their appreciation of the invaluable service which he rendered their cause at this period. The conduct of the Journal in this controversy established Mr. ANTHONY'S reputation as a journalist, which then, and as long as he was actively engaged in the exercise of the profession, extended far beyond the limits of his own State. In the midst of a political contention of unsurpassed virulence he was never tempted by the impetuosity of youth nor driven by the malevolence of personal attacks to write a sentence or utter a sentiment which would not bear the test of his maturer judgment, or which his friends would prefer should be erased or forgotten.

He was best known for the vigor and ability with which he wrote of political affairs, both State and national, and for his brilliant and genial satire; but the native dignity and courtesy of the man were manifested in the grace of style and ornate eloquence which distinguished all his literary workmanship. With a strong love for his profession, he had all the faculties of the ideal journalist—that of ready, clear, and forcible writing; of prompt decision in emergencies, combined with fair and temperate judgment; of wise choice in his associates and subordinates, with the cordial and friendly spirit of appreciation which secured their warm zeal and co-operation.

There was nothing labored in his work. He was an exceedingly rapid as well as an industrious writer, and has been known to keep four expert compositors busy in setting his editorial manuscript. For years he performed the greater part of the editorial writing for the Journal, and even after his election to the Senate was for a long time in the habit of sending to the paper his daily editorial contribution. To his latest day he kept up the habit of writing for its columns, and did not abandon it even under the pressure of enfeebling illness. The last paragraph, contributed a few days before his death, was a friendly notice of an acquaintance, and his last suggestion in its management was a request to spare a political enemy. The Journal was always the object of his affectionate care. His supervision of its columns was constant and close, and the suggestion that he should relieve himself of its responsibility, after the sudden death of his trusted associate, Mr. Danielson, under whose editorial management its reputation had been ably sustained and its sphere of usefulness enlarged, moved him to the expression that he would as soon think of parting with a child.

As a journalist Mr. ANTHONY was vigorous in controversy and dealt in hard and sharp blows when he felt they were needed; but it was a characteristic of his temper as well as the secret of his success that he never indulged in unnecessary controversy or yielded to the temptation of being satirical merely for the sake of showing his skill. He never descended to abuse, and there was a kindly element in his keenest satire which robbed it of half its severity. His opponents always felt that they were dealing with an antagonist who would take no unfair advantage. His style of argument in the discussion of important subjects was remarkably clear and simple, and no one was ever at a loss to understand what he meant, or was at fault in following his train of thought.

In his later years he took special delight in writing on local topics in a spirit of genial humor and with all the graces of a true Addisonian style. His simple tributes to the memory of friends were marked with the same feeling eloquence which distinguished his elegiac orations in this Chamber. For many years Mr. ANTHONY was the Providence Journal. His individuality and his intellectual not less than his political influence made it the center of the intellectual life of Rhode Island and attracted to it the contributions of the highest minds in the State.

It is perhaps not too much to say that no paper in the country outside of the metropolitan journals had a higher reputation than the Providence Journal while Mr. ANTHONY was its editor; and that it was merely the limitation of its sphere that prevented him from being ranked in influence as a journalist with his great contemporaries of that remarkable era in American journalism. The volumes of the Journal while under his direction constitute his most conspicuous monument.

In 1849 Mr. ANTHONY was the nominee of the Whig party for governor of Rhode Island and was elected. His administration was successful, and he was re-elected in 1850 but declined the nomination for a third term.

Governor ANTHONY'S position as a political leader in Rhode Island was then assured. The confidence of her people in his capacity and sagacity continued in a marked degree, and it was manifested in 1858 by his election to represent the State in the United States Senate. This office he assumed on the 4th of March, 1859, and by the uninterrupted favor and generous faith of his constituency, shown by five successive elections, he retained it for more than twenty-five years, until he was the oldest Senator in service and long after all his early associates had left this chamber.

Entering the Senate in the full vigor of early manhood, he was splendidly equipped, by nature and education, by a careful study of political history, and by an intimate knowledge of the science of government, for the responsible duties of his high station. At this time the shadows of the approaching "irrepressible conflict" which was soon to involve the country in war had fallen upon the Capitol. Elected as a Republican, the first who was not openly allied with the Abolitionists, his conservative tendencies did not prevent his taking the earliest opportunity to attest his devotion to the cause of liberty.

To recount the events in which Senator ANTHONY during the years of his service was a participant, or of which he was a witness, would be to recite the history of the country for its most interesting and important period. I can not, however, forbear an allusion to his valuable services during the critical years of the late civil war. In this momentous crisis he brought to the discharge of his important duties in the Senate, and as a trusted counselor of the Executive, great good sense, sound nerves, a clear, cool judgment, a courage never dismayed by disaster, and a loyalty and patriotism equal to any sacrifice or emergency. We have, as a people, justly bestowed our highest honors upon the military heroes who at that time rendered conspicuous service to the country, but it may be doubted whether we have properly estimated the influence and services of those who in the national councils shared the responsibilities of the great contest.

Measured by the length of time employed, Senator ANTHONY'S greatest labors while a member of this body were on the Committee on Public Printing, of which he was the chairman for more than twenty-two years. During this period, and largely through his influence, the extravagant and corrupt system of contract printing was abolished, a national printing office established, the publication of debates transferred from private hands to the Public Printer, and economical reforms in the manner of purchasing paper and other supplies were initiated. He sought, unsuccessfully, to restrict the public printing to the legitimate demands of the various Governmental Departments, and to prevent the publication for popular distribution of large and expensive editions of works of questionable value. He also endeavored, with equal lack of success, to make the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what it purports to be, a faithful transcript of Congressional proceedings, and to prevent its "leaden columns" from being weighed down by the insertion of speeches which were never spoken.

Senator ANTHONY served from 1863 to his death on the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which he was for many years the senior member. He was familiar with the condition and wants of the Navy, and was greatly interested in promoting all measures which promised to add to its efficiency. Meritorious officers always found in him an earnest advocate and firm friend.

Senator ANTHONY was elected President pro tempore of this body in March, 1863, and re-elected in March, 1871, serving for four years. In this position he displayed rare abilities as a parliamentarian and presided over the Senate with grace and dignity. In January, 1884, he was again elected, but "with a heart overflowing with gratitude" felt obliged to decline, as the state of his health warned him not to assume any labors that he could honorably avoid.

Senator ANTHONY never consumed the time of the Senate in useless discussions, but on the rare occasions when he participated in debate his remarks were characterized by both clearness of statement and soundness and force of argument. His memorial addresses, in which he rendered graceful and grateful tribute to the memory of departed Senators, are accepted as models of perfect taste, and are marked by an elegance of style and a spirit of kindly but just criticism which command universal admiration. Ranking with these in grace of style are his address at the completion of the equestrian statue of General Greene near the Capitol, which owes its existence to his exertions; his speeches on the occasion of the presentation by the State of Rhode Island to the National Government of the statues of Roger Williams and General Greene, and his remarks in favor of an appropriation for the restoration of the monument which marks the last resting-place of the Chevalier De Ternay, at Newport.

As a Senator he applied himself steadfastly to the absorbing duties which crowd a senatorial life, never neglecting any appeal or demand from his constituents. No man had a more exalted idea of the dignity and importance of the senatorial office than he; and none was more careful to preserve intact its time-honored privileges and prerogatives. He was inflexibly opposed to all innovations on established precedents in modes of procedure, and was accepted as authority on all matters pertaining to senatorial etiquette. He held a position of honorable and commanding influence among his associates in the Senate and in the councils of his party.

He was by nature incapable of doing a mean act. With a high sense of political and personal honor, no narrow influences ever controlled his political action. Living at a time when few reputations escaped attack, it is a matter for congratulation that his long public career closed without a stain upon his honor and without the breath of suspicion resting on any of his official acts. Neither foes nor rivals ever ventured to question his uprightness or his strict integrity.

Senator ANTHONY was a devoted son of Rhode Island, proud of her institutions, fond of her traditions, and familiar with every phase of her not unglorious history. With uncommon solicitude he had watched her wonderful industrial growth and intellectual development. For half a century he had been more influential than any other of her citizens in molding public sentiment and directing the policy of her people; and as the acknowledged leader of the dominant party in the State, his influence in political matters was, for a large portion of this time, controlling. He implanted and nurtured a patriotic spirit in the hearts of her sons which will continue to bear fruit in perpetual remembrance of his example.

In every forum and on every occasion, whenever her institutions were assailed or any principle dear to her people brought in question, he became her advocate and defender, using every weapon of offensive or defensive warfare with all the skill of a veteran and all the enthusiastic ardor of a youthful recruit. He was impelled to this service rather by the promptings of affection than the demands of duty. This engrossing love for his native State was his grand passion, and to serve her interests with fidelity was the one undeviating purpose of his life, dominating all circumstances and surroundings. He never, however, found his intense loyalty to his State in conflict with his duty as a Senator of the United States.

His exceptional success as a political leader, in a community where many ambitious and able men were disposed to dispute his ascendency, did not depend alone upon that esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens, which is the natural reward for devoted services. He had the faculty of forming a correct judgment of the character and capacity of those with whom he came in contact, and there was a subtle charm in his nature which appealed strongly to the sensibilities of others, attracting men of the most diverse characteristics and attaching them firmly to himself and his fortunes. His manner was always conciliatory; his temper was never impulsive, and his persistence rarely assumed an aggressive form. He persuaded and prevailed more by the moderation of his spirit than by the vigor and comprehensiveness of his understanding. He was faithful to his friends, clinging fondly to old companions and associations; but this did not prevent his prompt recognition and appreciation of the new men, with special qualities for leadership, whom changing circumstances brought into prominence.

He was a zealous party man, but he never used the patronage or power of official station to advance his personal interests. When required to decide, as he often was, upon the comparative merit of aspirants for political preferment, he invariably made fitness and a capacity to advance the public welfare the only standard of judgment.

His associates here can hardly fail to speak with warmth of his striking personal characteristics; of his genial and gracious presence—in manner and essence that of a gentleman—which has so long adorned this Chamber. Here he was faithful in his attachments, tolerant of his opponents; and the unusual sweetness and uniformity of his temper endeared him to all with whom he came in contact. He never practiced the arts of the demagogue, but he had a strong attraction for all that was real, genuine, and manly, and an instinctive dislike for shams and everything like cant or hypocrisy. He detested display and pretension, and shrank from notoriety. He had an inexhaustible fund of human gentleness, which made him naturally courteous and amiable; but his courtesy and politeness never offended by taking the form of condescension. He was considerate of the feelings and comfort of others; quick to discover and commend merit. His nature was cast in the finest mold—

> His life was gentle, and the elements
> So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, This was a man!

He was a strong man mentally and physically, but no disproportion marred the symmetry of his character, and no irregular outlines called attention to the strength and beauty of the structure.

His conversation abounded in simple and delightful charms, and he was a favorite in every social circle. His hospitality had all the elegance of that of a gentleman of the old school, and his house in Providence was always the attractive centre of a circle of brilliant men and women.

It was painfully evident when Senator ANTHONY last attended the sessions of the Senate that death had marked him for its victim; and no one knew this better than himself, for he had been informed by his physician as early as April, 1883, of the fatal character of the disease from which he was suffering. Returning to his home in April last, he proceeded with perfect composure to set his house in order for the great change. During the months which followed he awaited the dread summons with a patience and philosophic calmness which deeply impressed all those who were about him. With the slow wasting of his physical powers there was no visible impairment of his mental faculties. The letters written by his own hand during this period had all the peculiar grace and charm of style which made him master of the epistolary art.

He was singularly reticent even to his most intimate friends in regard to his inner being, but whenever the uncertain tenure of his life was mentioned he always manifested a spirit of humble submission to Divine will, and would say, "God's time is best." In the face of death his courage never faltered; and the lessons of faith which had been taught him by a Christian mother were never forgotten. "He had," to use the words of his friend, Rev. Mr. Woodbury, in his eloquent funeral discourse, "schooled himself to that serenity of soul which could not be disturbed either in life or death." At his home devoted friends and relatives ministered to his comfort, and the ablest medical skill sought by the use of every remedy known to science to stay the progress of the disease, but all their efforts were in vain. On the 2d of September last he peacefully sank to rest. He was buried from the neighboring church where the funeral rites of his beloved colleague, General Burnside, had been so recently solemnized. "Twin heirs of fame," their precious dust reposes in the same cemetery, and their memories are together graven on the hearts of the people of Rhode Island.

His funeral, without pageantry or display, was an appropriate tribute of honor to the distinguished dead. It was attended by the President of the United States, a large number of Senators, and the official representatives of his State and city.

In the history of the Senate others have served as faithfully and as honorably as he whom we mourn, but it is rare that length of service unite with a high order of intellect and a spotless reputation to form a senatorial career as impressive, as instructive, and as patriotic as that which is now closed in the grave of HENRY B. ANTHONY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Again, Mr. President, we pause in our consideration of measures affecting the material welfare of millions of living beings and give the hour to our recollections of our departed friend and associate and to lay upon his tomb our glad tributes to his worth and our sad memories of his loss to his friends and his countrymen.

Scenes like this, common as they are, never over the wide world lose their interest. Infidel, and pagan, and Christian, alike celebrate them, and in varying forms, and with differing hopes and aspirations, come to weep over the graves of their fellow-men. To all alike the veil that separates the present of life from its future is equally impenetrable to the natural eye; but to the eye of faith and hope, and, as I think, to the philosophic vision as well, there opens a field of view which should lead us not to mourn at the death in the fullness of accomplished years of those we have loved and respected, but rather to be soberly glad for them, who, having faithfully filled their space and appointed time and having borne the last trial of humanity, have been admitted to the life of the mysterious future. We see "through a glass darkly," indeed, but our friend and all who have gone before and with him do I believe see and feel clearly the peace that belongs to them who with pure hearts and faithful endeavor have, in whatever station, run the race that was set before them.

The almost twenty years of close intimacy with which Mr. ANTHONY honored me filled me more and more, as time went on, with admiration of his character and with strong personal affection. A gentleman of more perfect honor and of more perfect kindness of heart, of more catholicity of spirit, of less bigotry, of less envy or uncharitableness, or of less self-seeking I have never known. So knowing him I could not choose but love him.

He never made a brow look dark,
Nor caused a tear but when he died.

His public life was one embracing a period of events as stupendous and important as any that can occur in the history of nations. Through it all in the respects I have mentioned he was almost peerless among his peers. His close associates were among the pillars of the nation's fortune. Many of them have gone to their reward before him. There were Sumner, and Wilson, and Collamer, and Foot, and Johnson, and Wade, and Fessenden, and Chandler, and Howard, and Grimes, and Howe—these were they who chiefly in the Senate carried the nation triumphantly through its great struggle and restored it to its broad foundations with the bright, new corner-stone of liberty, and they honored him in his place in his party and in the Senate, as I now do his gracious memory, as with a constant benediction.

Strongly devoted to his party he yet always stood for the liberty of individual senatorial opinion and action, and in all conferences, when needful, he reminded his colleagues of the rule of his party in the Senate that preserves to each Senator the full liberty to follow his honest convictions without reproach from his fellows. He desired unity of action, but he desired still more to "follow right because right is right in scorn of consequence." He could not believe that "dissimulation in political action was to be regarded as a public virtue, or that when men asserted the dignity of truth their candor was to be charged against them as a heinous crime." In all the long trials of the war and in all the time of the difficulties and bitterness that followed it I have never heard that he had wounded the feelings or incurred the resentment of any gentleman of either party in the Senate. In all contests and disputes his gentleness of feeling and manner and his strict observance of every courtesy in debate compelled the sympathy and good will of his opponents, if they did not secure their adhesion to his views.

As a speaker his voice was clear and sweet, but his real diffidence of himself and his fear of consuming time sometimes produced a faulty and too rapid utterance. As a writer he had marked excellence, and in some departments of composition his writings have seemed to me as perfect as any in the English language with which I am acquainted.

The same qualities of mind and heart to which I have alluded made him a favorite in the wide social circles of the capital. He was everywhere a welcome visitor. He was neither scandal-monger nor tale-bearer. He never indulged in coarseness or vulgarity, but his conversation ran pleasantly along on topics of history, biography, anecdote, and poetry, for which last he had a particular fondness. I have often heard him repeat favorite passages with a tenderness of feeling and a grace of expression that showed how perfectly he sympathized with the inmost sentiment of the writer.

As he has here so often done for the memory of his departed friends, we now make our last formal memorial of him. In the years that are to come I can only hope for our country that all her Senators may have his fidelity and worth, and that those who hereafter celebrate similar occasions in the Senate may be able to speak as truly and kindly of the departed as we now do of him.

He leaves behind him, freed from grief and years,
Far worthier things than tears,
The love of friends without a single foe:
Unequaled lot below!

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the list has grown to be long indeed which records the deaths of those who have been my associates in this Chamber, and among them all, the living as well as the dead, I know not one more sedulous, considerate, and impressive in the payment of the last marks of sorrowing respect and brotherhood to his deceased associates than the worthy gentleman whose death induces these remarks.

To "weep with them that weep" was an injunction little needed by Mr. ANTHONY, whose kindly and sympathetic nature found frequent, eloquent, and admirable expression in the elegiac addresses delivered by him in the Senate as one after another his friends and associates passed in melancholy procession before him to the tomb. And now, at last, he also, ripe in years and wisdom, has been gathered in the harvest of mortality by the inevitable hand of the grim reaper.

As a Senator from the State of Rhode Island Mr. ANTHONY sat in this council chamber for nearly twenty-six years, and seldom has any one served so long and so worthily.

Without the wish or probably the faculty to impress himself as a leader among men, yet he was recognized and sought by those who were and are leaders as a wise and safe counselor. While not participating frequently in debate, few were so intelligently observant of the course of public business or wiser or juster in their judgments respecting it.

As a parliamentarian Mr. ANTHONY excelled, and elected, as he frequently was, to be the President pro tempore of the body, his skill in parliamentary law and procedure and in the dispatch of business, accompanied by unfailing courtesy and impartiality, gave him a hold upon the respect of all parties that always remained unbroken.

The spirit of comity, courtesy, and thoughtful consideration of others animated him and marked his conduct in the performance of his duties in this Chamber; and while we who were the beneficiaries of these admirable qualities felt our indebtedness, there can be no doubt that his usefulness and capability as a representative to render successful and important services to his constituents was in turn greatly increased.

Mr. ANTHONY was strict and tenacious as a party man, and was largely controlled here by his party allegiance, but I never knew it to take the form of offense or imputation of a political opponent, and I may truly say that in sixteen years of association here I never saw his face darkened by a frown, much less disfigured by a sneer.

A touching and impressive instance of the feeling he had inspired among his associates was afforded when, at the commencement of his fifth term of senatorial service as he advanced to take the constitutional oath, the entire Senate rose and remained standing during its administration.

I knew him well, and relations of steady friendliness subsisted between us, unbroken by differences of opinion and political association, and it was as a sincere mourner that I followed his body to its last resting-place, in the State of his nativity which he had served so long and well.

We had been sorrowful witnesses here of the gradual decline in his health for several years, and the final summons was not unexpected by him nor by those who surrounded him.

In the death of Mr. ANTHONY the United States have lost one of their most experienced and respected public servants, the State of Rhode Island a distinguished, valued, and faithful representative, and every member of this Senate a genial and well-beloved friend.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I bring my tribute of respect and affection for our dead brother.

Senators who had the pleasure of long association with him in this body, and that intimate acquaintance which the public and private proceedings of the Senate seem always to promote, have done and others still will do justice to his life and character, to his qualities of head and heart, to his principles and methods. Although not always in the association of the Senate Chamber, I knew Senator ANTHONY long and well.

When he came to the Senate I was a member of the House of Representatives. The stirring events which soon followed in 1860–'61 brought us into contact. The differences of our party associations and modes of thought as to the impending struggle were very great. They did not divide us; indeed, they seemed to bind us closer together, so soon as we fully understood that each of us honestly cherished and faithfully supported a common purpose to preserve by whatever variant methods an "indissoluble Union of indestructible States."

I soon learned to know how decided were his convictions, how resolute his assertion of them, how unbending his will in carrying them into execution. And yet how courteous his manners and gentle his judgment of opinions and actions differing from his own! I soon learned to appreciate those genial qualities of temper and manner which soften the asperities of thought and action dealing with the fate of nations in flagrant civil war.

Time passed. Our intercourse as members of Congress ceased. A most agreeable companionship followed, when for many years the heats of long, exhaustive summers were escaped in the delights of an unequaled climate at Newport, or on the shores of his native Narragansett. There he threw off the cares of public life, the harness of party, and was the genial, friendly, cultivated, agreeable gentleman, administering to the enjoyment of many friends who gathered in that most favored region of Rhode Island.

Again we met as members of this body. The favor of our respective party friends assigned us corresponding positions in our party conferences; and then I came to know him still better. His fidelity to party obligation was inflexible and pronounced. His appreciation of a like fidelity among his opponents, his candor, and suavity, and honor were equally conspicuous.

His intellect was strong; his information was large; his culture was wide and generous; his views of public duty were fixed; his aims were lofty; his methods were honorable; his heart was true and kind; his courtesy never failed. I think he never willingly wounded the feelings of any one. He was faithful and wise as a committeeman. He was fully conversant with the current business of the Senate. He was an admirable presiding officer; the very master—facile princeps—in all questions of ceremonial and dignified propriety.

The little volume of addresses in which Senator ANTHONY commemorated the qualities of his friends who had died in the Senate testifies to the truth of all I have said.

The style is rich but simple. The taste is faultless. The fountain of sympathetic appreciation is exhaustless. The judgment is just but kindly. The philosophy is of that calm and patient and hopeful faith in which he was born. "There is One that doeth all things well" was the pervading thought as the great dead fell around him. Even as early as 1874, "musing on the transitory nature of all sublunary things," he recalls with touching pathos that since his entrance to this Chamber every other seat save one had changed its occupant and into the vacant places had stepped others, who had put on the armor which those who had gone before had worn, lifted the weapons which they had wielded, and marched to the work which they had inaugurated.

And thus—

He exclaimed—

I am filled with reverent wonder at the beneficent ordering of nature, and inspired with a loftier faith in that almighty Power without whose guidance and direction all human effort is vain, and with whose blessing the humblest instruments He selects are equal to the mightiest work that He designs.

For twenty-five years he served well his State; and, with faculties unimpaired, with the duties of life discharged, the trusts of life fulfilled, died at the age allowed by the wisdom of God and the experience of man as the most fortunate for translation to other spheres of existence and duty; even to the last the recipient of the highest honors, political and social, which the respect and confidence and affection of its citizens could confer.

In his own language I repeat:

To complain at the close of such a life is to complain that the ripened fruit drops from the overloaded bough, that the golden harvest bends to the sickle; it is to complain of the law of our existence, and to accuse the Creator that He did not make man immortal on the earth.

To him the wondrous portals of the unseen world have opened; and perhaps the mysteries of death, revealing "what was and is and is to come," have solved the mysteries of life. Faith may disclose to our grateful eyes glimpses of heaven's beatitudes, yet when his associates here realize that we shall see his face again no more forever "one human tear shall fall and be forgiven."

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, called, as we so often are, to lament the departure of one of our fellow-members, we are prone to feel the lesson less bitter from its frequent recurrence, and forget it as "a tale that is told;" but the prominence here of the late Senator ANTHONY, for a quarter of a century of continuous service, lends to the present occasion exceptional interest. To me, his senior in age, and attached to him by all the ligaments which bind associates in public and private life, the event brings a message of admonition peculiarly impressive. In the common course of nature the scene would have been reversed and my labors should have earliest ended, while he should now be here. Truly "we know not what a day may bring forth." Almost from my first entrance to the Senate it was my good fortune to sit by the side of him whose decease we now mourn, and it is almost unnecessary to say that I found my near neighbor not only a delightful talker but a patient listener, and his occasional wayside conversation, with its full flow of spirits and store of anecdote, indulged in tones not drowning senatorial debate, made his presence welcome by the same abounding attractions which everywhere made him so general a favorite in society. His empty chair proclaims the Senate's loss, and I feel sure many longing hearts are ready with me to exclaim:

Oh, for a touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still.

HENRY B. ANTHONY was a man beloved. His character, as well as his person, was attractive, and his bearing manly. Even those who chanced to differ with him in opinion, found nothing repulsive in his manner. His ambition was fully satisfied with being an American Senator, and, having befitting intellectual tastes and aptitudes, having a high ideal standard for the service, he was careful to maintain the prestige and to preserve the traditions and prerogatives of the Senate. He was familiar with all of its parliamentary usages and forms, and the proprieties of its proceedings, when guided by him, lost nothing of grace and dignity. As the President pro tempore of the Senate he was thoroughly the master of the rules, wholly impartial, and largely contributed to the correct and brisk dispatch of business. His handiwork, known as "the Anthony rule," is likely to be long approved as a method of forwarding the daily work of the Senate. In the chair, as everywhere, he was a ready man. His mind moved with the same electric swiftness that characterized his spoken words. Questions of order did not hang fire, and from his prompt decisions an appeal was seldom or never taken.

As the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, the late Senator, from his practical knowledge, exercised a constant and commanding influence, and, though not always able to restrain the vote to print documents—the value of which often disappears with the revolving year—within the limits he judged proper, yet his conservative action was ever deeply rooted in the line of economy. The art of printing he esteemed as really the "art preservative of all arts," and he had some pride in having Government printing done by the Government, and better done than it could be elsewhere. This he believed to have been successfully accomplished, and we are indebted to the late chairman as the promoter of many improvements, until at length, more or less under his promptings, the Government commands the skill and machinery to produce work in the foremost style of typography.

The services of Senator ANTHONY upon the Committee on Naval Affairs were long and conspicuous. With the exception of the late Senator Grimes, of Iowa, whose mastery of all naval matters was simply marvelous, I think he had a more precise and thorough knowledge of every vessel and of every officer of the Navy than any person not officially connected with its service. He was proud of the "old sea dogs" and of their heroic exploits. He could name those competent to command a fleet or a squadron, or those whose genius and blood could be trusted to conduct a naval battle, and he looked upon a proper navy in a large measure as the custodian of the national honor, as well as the chief if not all-sufficient arm of national defense. He was alert in guarding the high reputation of the personnel of the Navy, or in keeping it clear of epauletted barnacles, and no officer, when dismissed from the service for worshiping Bacchus instead of Neptune, ever had a fresh opportunity to lose a ship or the lives of men by being restored to place through his aid. He was full of reverence for our national flag, and to his eye the starry banner when waving from "the mast of some great admiral" appeared in its highest splendor.

Senator ANTHONY did not often venture upon extempore speaking, though upon emergencies he appeared to lack neither fluency nor effectiveness; but his prepared speeches were marked by abundant research, vigor of thought, and were clothed with all the graces of classical culture. His speech in defense of some peculiar features of the constitution of his native State, inherited from its colonial origin, displayed the full forces of his learning, logic, and loyalty, and Rhode Island will look in vain for a defender more intrepid or better equipped.

His memorial addresses, of which years ago he reprinted a collected edition, were models of beauty and pathos. Few more impressive and appropriate tributes to deceased associates will be found in the records of the Senate than the felicitous eulogiums pronounced here by him whose long and honorable career has just closed, and whose decease brings us all together here as a band of brothers. His discourses on these sad occasions sometimes seemed to me almost to rob death of its terrors, and that, heralded to the "unseen world" covered by his gracious mantle of testimonials, one would "even dare to die." These utterances were the throbbings of a generous heart, eloquently and conscientiously spoken, and delicately perfumed. Thinking no evil, and incapable of malice, he could not have a "sterile admiration" for his friends, and when he bid them an everlasting farewell he did not fail to decorate them with immortelles.

His brief address to the governor of Massachusetts, as chairman of the committee accompanying the remains of Charles Sumner, was worthy of the "illustrious dead," and will live as a happy specimen of spontaneous and genuine eloquence.

The late Senator ANTHONY was void of all conceit; did not "think of himself more highly than he ought to think;" never attempted to offer instruction upon questions he had not fully studied; and never pretended to that intuitive genius which comprehends all subjects, but he aimed to do thoroughly well the work that fell to his lot. Without surrendering cardinal principles, he was outspoken and generous in his appreciation of the merits of others, whether they were arrayed on this side of the Chamber or the other. Though affectionately attached to his friends, no asperities of political life invaded his personal or social relations. Eloquence in the Senate or a great debate, equally with the foremost examples of ancient history, lingered long in his memory, and was accounted by him as an appropriate and enduring contribution to the renown of his country.

Senator ANTHONY was one of the proprietors, and for many years the chief editor, of the Providence Journal, the leading Republican paper of Rhode Island, with an enviable reputation throughout the country. The editorials of the Journal were bright and scholarly, but, somewhat like those of Thurlow Weed, George D. Prentice, and Horace Greeley, generally rather short, and noted, as well as extensively copied, for their sterling good sense. The editorial profession, which he so early adorned, did not fail to tincture his later career, nor fail to largely contribute to his public usefulness. In his copartner, Mr. Danielson, so long as he lived, he found also a gifted and most valuable editorial associate, and the Journal securely maintained its position as one of the most prosperous and influential papers in New England.

As a man he never seemed to be deserted by his good genius, and never to do or say a foolish thing. All of his speeches, therefore, were scarcely less than models of good taste. They were never dull, but always crisp and without redundant words. His calm judgment, undisturbed by crotchets, together with his transparent sincerity, gave to his opinions positive weight, and to any discussion, where he was a participant, he brought visible and valuable contributions.

He was in the first year of his fifth term of service in the Senate. This remarkably protracted distinction emphasized the abiding confidence and affection of the people of his State, and was in harmony with the almost equal love and respect of the people of the country at large. It will not be too much to say that it was thoroughly merited by his high-toned integrity, by his conceded ability, and by his unselfish devotion to every public duty. Throughout the long and historic career of this distinguished son of Rhode Island, who here survived all of his early associates, the world has ever recognized the bearing and just proportions of an American Senator, and virtues most worthy of imitation. He leaves us without a word he could wish to blot. He leaves us with the completed record of a useful and blameless life. He faithfully bore his part in the Senate during an era of great national events, and history will lovingly guard his memory.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, in the accurate sketch of the life and character of Senator ANTHONY just now presented by his former colleague on this floor we have a beautiful picture of a life noiseless and of even tenor, but industrious and laborious, devoted to good private acts and great public service, and a character simple, amiable, affectionate, yet commanding.

Educated for that most jealous and exacting of all professions, the law, his health failing, he embarked in the business of newspaper editing. In this broad field of influence and of usefulness, in which so many of the first men of our country have figured, he maintained, as he did in all things he undertook, a high and prominent rank. From this sphere he went to the governorship of his State, where he served her so well and so faithfully she became not merely attached to him, but devoted to him, from that time till he was laid away for the long sleep in the dark chamber, in her own bosom.

Coming to this body as her Senator in 1859, when such men as Fessenden, Douglas, Seward, Hunter, Sumner, Toombs, Trumbull, Jefferson Davis, Crittenden, and Benjamin were honored members of this Chamber, he soon took rank with them as a most able and valuable co-laborer. Elected for five consecutive terms, he rendered longer unbroken service here than any Senator in our history save Mr. Benton, of Missouri. Mr. King, of Alabama, served longer, but his terms were not continuous, while Mr. Sumner had twenty-three years of consecutive service.

While this compliment is so rare, in this case it was well merited, for Mr. ANTHONY was industrious in his Senatorial work, well instructed in all its details, and faithful to the last.

He rarely engaged in what are called purely political debates, but when he did he showed he was equal to the demands of the occasion.

His speeches, made generally with a view of throwing light on questions of public policy and aiding in their solution, were plain and simple in their style—"neither affected nor elaborate, and remarkable for the absence of all words of questionable authority."

Well versed in parliamentary law, he was a stickler for the enforcement of the rules of the Senate as a means for the preservation of order and the transaction of business; and his usefulness in this way was on several occasions fully recognized by his brother Senators in their selection of him to preside over the deliberations of this body.

Almost from the time I began to take an interest in Congressional proceedings Mr. ANTHONY was a well-known and distinguished actor in them. From then till very recently, to read these deliberations was to become somewhat familiar with him. Eight years ago, when I became a member of the Senate, he was here, conspicuous and leading, and was then, except for the presence of the venerable Hamlin, the father of the Senate, as he was so affectionately called by his brothers here in the latter days of his service. To me, therefore, the Senate seems unnatural without him; it is most difficult to realize his absence, and by us all and the country his loss is deeply deplored.

His conduct in life was without parade or ostentation. Without pretensions, his movements and acts spoke for themselves, a full exemplification of what Sallust said of Cato: "Esse, quam videri."

His manners were attractive to the last degree to those who associated with him, and to be thrown with him was to sincerely admire him.

He merited by his public works and by his private virtues the respect and affection of his countrymen, and the best wish for his country and his office is that his mantle may fall upon his successor.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, in paying the tribute of the Senate to our senior, the eminent Senator from Rhode Island, it is fitting that his State and those who were nearest to him in friendship and in length of service should have been first heard. But it would be unjust to Massachusetts if her profound sympathy with her neighbor and her own sense of public loss did not also find expression. No two States in the Union are bound together by closer ties than Massachusetts and Rhode Island. Their affection was never broken. When Roger Williams went out to lay for the first time in human history the foundation of a State in religious liberty, he retained, undiminished, his love for the people he had left behind. He earnestly desired that the younger Winthrop should become the governor of his infant Commonwealth. From that day to this the occasions have been few and unimportant and temporary in which there has been any considerable difference of opinion between these sister States. Their character, their interests, their employments have been the same. Together their soldiers and sailors met danger and victory under Perry and Greene, the illustrious captains of Rhode Island. William Ellery Channing, who, beyond all other men, has influenced the character of Massachusetts in later times was the gift to her of Rhode Island. When the whole structure of her civil society was in danger, Rhode Island sought and found her successful champion in Daniel Webster. There were no sincerer mourners at the grave of Burnside than the citizen soldiers of Massachusetts. No voice spoke the universal sorrow for the death of Sumner more affectionately and tenderly than that we miss to-day.

Mr. ANTHONY, after having been twice governor of his own State, was five times chosen to the Senate for a full term. If his life had been spared, he would have had a longer period of unbroken service here than any other person since the Senate was organized. Owing to the delay in the admission of Missouri, Mr. Benton was not elected until late in 1821. His first term ended March 4, 1827. Mr. ANTHONY served in the Senate, in fact, longer than any other person, except Mr. Benton.

I think we may offer him to the judgment of history as the model of the character of the Senator as our fathers conceived it. Superior, by the length of his constitutional term of office, and by his own personal weight, to what is fluctuating and temporary in the popular sentiment of his State, yet representing what is best and most permanent in its character and opinion—member of a body whose organization has continued and is to continue without a break from the time the Constitution was inaugurated until it shall perish, the never broken chain binding the remote past to the far remoter future—the Senator alone, as his name implies, stands for the principle of seniority in the Republic. Mr. ANTHONY was the depositary of the unwritten traditions of this body. He never failed to maintain, so far as in him lay, its authority and dignity. He had a wide circle of friends, and was above all others the one most welcome guest in the hospitable circles of Washington. But his only home was the Senate Chamber. It can not be doubted that he was thinking of his own lot when he uttered that touching passsage in his eulogy on Wilson:

Home he had none. No man shared more largely in the affections of the American people; no man was more beloved by his immediate constituency; but those pleasures which the greatest of American orators placed above all the other immeasurable blessings of rational existence, above the treasures of science and the delights of learning and the aspects of nature, even above good government and religious liberty, "the transcendent sweets of domestic life" were no more for him. Those relations which nature intended for the joy and the rapture of our youth, for the happiness and the embellishment of our maturer years, for the comfort and consolation of age, had been severed by the remorseless shears of fate. No eye grew brighter when he raised the latch that held his lonely dwelling; no outstretched arms of wife, no ringing laughter of children, welcomed his returning footsteps, when he crossed the threshold over which all that had given life, and joy, and beauty to that simple abode, and had lighted it up with a glory not of palaces, had been borne never to return. He had nothing left to love but his country.

He was fully able to defend himself and his State and any cause which he espoused. No man would attack either with impunity under circumstances which called on him for reply, as he showed on some memorable occasions. But he was of a most gracious and sweet nature. He was a lover and maker of peace. When an indignity was by his own political associates put upon the great leader of emancipation in the Senate which had been the scene of his illustrious service, no man regretted the occurrence more than Mr. ANTHONY.

And straight Patroclus rose,
The genial comrade, who, amid the strife
Of kings, and war of angry utterance,
Held even balance, to his outraged friend
Heart-true, yet ever strove with kindly words
To hush the jarring discord, urging peace.

Mr. ANTHONY was a learned man; learned in the history of the Senate and in parliamentary law; learned in the history of his country and of foreign countries; learned in the resources of a full, accurate, and graceful scholarship. Since Sumner died I suppose none of us can be compared with him in this respect. Some passages in an almost forgotten political satire show that he possessed a vein which, if he had cultivated it, might have placed him high in the rôle of satiric poets. But he never launched a shaft that he might inflict a sting. His collection of memorial addresses is unsurpassed in its kind of literature. He was absolutely simple, modest, courteous, and without pretense. He was content to do his share in accomplishing public results, and to leave to others whatever of fame or glory might result from having accomplished them.

—— to be, and not to seem,
Was this man's wisdom.

Gentle and kindly in his judgments he could be firm and stern when public duty required. He steadfastly resisted everything which seemed to him to relax the discipline or lower the standard of character in the Navy to whose glory his State has so largely contributed.

He was fortunate in life. He lived and took a great part in great historic events in a great age. His Senatorial service corresponded almost exactly with the term of power enjoyed by the great party to which he belonged. He saw the beginning and the final triumph of the political movement to which a race, that, within two generations, will number more than thirty millions in this country, owes its emancipation. He had his full share in advising and framing the measures by which rebellion was subdued and his country saved. He had his full share, also, in that great self-control by which the restored nation manifested alike its unparalleled clemency and its unparalleled integrity, greater in ruling its own spirit than in conquering states or taking cities. Through all this, I can not think of an utterance he would wish to blot, or a vote he would desire to recall. Recte, te, Cyre, beatum ferunt, quoniam virtuti tuæ fortuna conjuncta est.

He was fortunate also in death. He escaped that sudden and unprepared parting against which the church offers her prayers. He escaped, also, the weakness and decay of age. Death came to him, without pain, and without a shock, while his intellectual forces were unimpaired. His life had been stainless, honored, useful, happy. He was beloved by his associates here, beloved by the people of the State of which he was the citizen first in honor and in station, beloved by his whole reunited country.

The great orator and philosopher of Rome declared, in his youth, and repeated, in his age, that death could not come prematurely to a man who had been consul. Cicero spake to a Senate to whom Christianity was unknown, and immortality but a dream. Surely we can not mourn as untimely the ending of the life of a man who has been five times Senator. To us, to whom Christianity holds out its promise of an existence continued somewhere, where the virtues developed here shall continue and grow, it is matter of high exultation that a soul so pure, so lofty, so fortunate, has passed on safely, and without a stain, to another stage of being, where—

——— that, which lived
True life, lives on.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, my friendly regard and high respect for Governor ANTHONY began soon after I became a member of this body and continued uninterruptedly to his death. Though one of the oldest veterans in the service, and many years my senior, he was nevertheless accessible at all times to younger men, and invariably courteous and kindly. His personal qualities were so attractive that we were instinctively drawn to him. His equanimity of temper, amiability of disposition, dignified and affable demeanor, and cordial social virtues were uniform and almost exceptional, so that he was always a welcome guest in social life, a genial, companionable gentleman.

Simple, unaffected, unpretending in his professions, he was a most faithful, trustworthy, and devoted friend. We all remember how devotedly attached he was to his life-long friend and colleague, General Burnside; how devotedly this attachment was reciprocated, and what a touching eulogy he pronounced upon that friend in this Chamber. During my term of service here with Governor ANTHONY we have passed through some of the most exciting, acrimonious debates ever known in the Senate, and yet I do not remember that one expression of bitterness or one word of personal reproach toward his political opponents ever escaped his lips. This is a great deal to be said of any man, Mr. President, who has passed through such trying ordeals and irritating scenes, but I am sure every one of his brethren of this body will bear me out and that it is sustained by the record. I can pronounce no higher encomium upon his character as a Senator and gentleman. His mental qualities and intellectual attainments were as marked and high as his personal attractions. In a word, sir, his whole make-up, moral, mental, intellectual, and physical, was as completely rounded off with uniform symmetry as any man I have ever known. As gentle and kindly in his sympathies as a woman, he was nevertheless as stern, as earnest, and unyielding in the discharge of what he conceived to be his duty as the most robust nature.

Our party affiliations and associations threw us on opposing political lines; and while he was regarded by his political opponents as a staunch and faithful adherent to the party of his faith, his partisanship never became so intense or unreasonable as to become offensive to those who differed with him or to forfeit their personal regard. I do not think that Governor ANTHONY, in a popular sense, could have been considered a party leader. His mental and intellectual organization rather led him to the literary and scholarly side of politics. And yet it was generally understood by those of us not in the councils of his party that in consultation his judgment exercised a commanding influence in determining party policy. In questions before the Senate of a non-partisan character, in the conduct of business, in the real work of legislation, his well-earned experience, faithful, conscientious attention to the duties of his high station carried great weight with his brother Senators of all parties.

He rarely participated in general debate, but was always at his post of duty and when he did speak he commanded the respectful attention of the Senate and always spoke with effect. His last elaborate effort that I remember was in defense of his State, whose institutions and rights he thought had been unfairly criticised and unjustly assailed, and I question if there is on record a clearer and more convincing exposition of the rights and reserved powers of the States of the Union than is given in this speech. If he had done no other public service, this speech would entitle him to take rank among the ablest expounders of the constitutional powers of the State and Federal Governments.

It was my fortune, Mr. President, to attend the funeral ceremonies of this venerable and distinguished Senator at his home in Providence, and the large attendance from other States, the outpouring on that occasion of all classes and conditions in that community to do honor to their fellow-citizen and dead statesman, bore evidence of how much he was beloved by his neighbors and how highly he was esteemed by his fellow-countrymen. It is drawing no invidious distinction to say that no Senator has ever gone out of this Chamber to his last account more universally respected and lamented than Governor ANTHONY; few Senators ever served a constituency longer, and none more faithfully. His long and distinguished public career is closed without a shadow to dim its luster, or a suspicion upon his integrity to mar its completeness.

Mr. INGALLS. The service of Senator ANTHONY in this body exceeded the entire period of Republican ascendency, from Lincoln to Garfield—a momentous interval, characterized by unprecedented activity of the material, intellectual, and moral energies of the nation, and resulting in structural changes in government and society.

It was an epoch of tremendous passions; of vague and indefinite morality; of frenzied debate; of anomalous statesmanship. There were giants in those days, and when the Macaulay of another age shall turn to rehearse their history, he will find little in our recorded annals to explain the remarkable and long-continued prominence of Senator ANTHONY in his State and the country, or the extraordinary influence he exercised upon all his contemporaries.

Without the learning and eloquence of Sumner, the logic of Fessenden, the restless industry of Wilson, or the intense and relentless energy of Chandler and Morton, he was the trusted counselor and companion of all, and was accorded the highest positions of confidence and honor to which a Senator can aspire.

For twenty-five years Senator ANTHONY uttered no word in debate in this Chamber that is not recorded, but how faint and unsatisfactory is the portrait that this will present to posterity. Those who recall the melody of his diction and the dignity of his delivery will always wonder with regret that he so seldom spoke who spoke so well; but no printed page could record the gentle and benignant courtesy which shone in his demeanor and lent a nameless but irresistible charm to his deportment and bearing; the confident courage that despised the paltry arts and the hollow clamors of the demagogue; the stainless honor that knew no taint of perfidy or guile.

He was a minister of grace. He never made an enemy and never lost a friend. The envy that might have been aroused by his early success was averted by the sensitive delicacy of his nature; and the jealousy that might have been excited by his long supremacy was disarmed by his loyalty to his friends; by his fidelity to his convictions; by his unsullied integrity, by the temperate restraint of his spirit which no heat of controversy could disturb, nor any rancor of partisanship provoke to retaliation unworthy of a Christian and a gentleman.

The entire career of Senator ANTHONY was one of unique and singular felicity. For him fate spared its irony. Nemesis was propitiated. Fortune favored him. Time denied him none of those possessions that are regarded as the chief requisites of human happiness. He escaped calumny, and detraction passed him by. There was no winter in his years. He had length of days without infirmity. His ambition was satisfied. Honor, health, love, friendship, affluence, which so often with capricious disdain elude the most strenuous pursuit, attended him as courtiers surround a monarch. His life was not fragmentary and unfinished, but full-orbed and complete. Death was not an interruption, but a climax. His sun was neither obscured nor eclipsed, but followed its appointed path to the western horizon. So he departed, and above his spirit and his fame abides the enduring covenant of peace:

His memory, like a cloudless sky;
His conscience, like a sea at rest.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, so much has been said by many who knew Mr. ANTHONY long and well that much speaking by me is neither needed nor becoming.

He was a most devoted, reverent, and obedient servant of his State. He was very proud of the trust Rhode Island reposed in him. He was an American, a patriot, a lover of liberty and union in every fiber of his being. Submissive to the Divine will and fearless of death, he yet wished to live, and I think he longed to complete thirty years of Senatorship. During the last few months of his life he earnestly desired to return to Washington, and could he have chosen the place of departure I believe he would have selected this Capitol.

In speaking to the memory of Henry Wilson he said:

Nor was the occasion of his death inappropriate to his life. It has been lamented that the inevitable hour found him away from his home and without the tender ministrations of woman. In this regret I do not share. * * * Where should the patriot statesman whose life has been devoted to freedom die, rather than in the Capitol, whose uplifted Dome bears aloft the vindicated statue of Liberty?

In the succeeding paragraph, which the Senator from Massachusetts has already quoted, Mr. ANTHONY refers in lines of exquisite delicacy and feeling to the circumstances of domestic bereavement and loneliness in which his own domestic life was a parallel to Mr. Wilson's, and adds.

He had nothing left to love but his country. It was proper then that he should die here, where his greatest work had been wrought; here, where his greatest triumphs had been achieved.

Mr. ANTHONY possessed a strong, deep, loving nature, though not demonstrative or careless of choice, and he grappled his friends with hooks of steel. Senators who heard it can not forget the fervor and profound pathos of his lamentation over the loss of his beloved and inseperable friend Burnside.

In some characteristics he gave evidence of the teachings of Quaker ancestry, molding a congenial nature. His courtesy and gentleness, his pleasing tone of voice, his love of peace, his refined wit and humor, his tender poetic sentiment, his fund of literary, historical, and political reminiscences made him most welcome in many circles of admiring and attached friends, here and elsewhere.

His classical education, his reading, and his more than twenty years of successful experience as an editor, beginning at the age of 23, gave him a charming and polished style as a writer, of which he has left admirable illustrations in many addresses. Of his varied services, and especially of his zealous and effective labors during the stormy years of war, my seniors in this Hall have spoken. Personally I was nearly four years associated with him in that committee, of which he was twenty-one years the chairman. His society made labor agreeable. All sense of drudgery was lost in the pleasure of social intercourse.

Connecticut will join her neighbor of two hundred and fifty years of unbroken friendship in tributes of respect to the memory of the distinguished and honored citizen who has gone to "the sublime equality and sacred fraternity of the tomb."

When all things move in what we imagine to be the due course of nature, as year after year hurries along, the Divine Father greatly mitigates the dread of death. Before one reaches the allotted three score and ten, the time comes when he feels that the majority of all whom he could know well and love well have gone over to the other side. The sound of a tree that has fallen in the forest becomes a familiar sound, no longer alarming. The multitude of old and dear friends, who are invisible but still very real, occupy more and more of our thoughts. Calling our faith and philosophy to our aid, we try to believe that it is not death we dread, but dying. We get so weary of eternal turmoil, that in despondent hours we fancy that we can almost envy that brilliant soldier of the late war whose last words were, "Let us cross the river and rest in the shade."

Our friend could not have been surprised by his summons. It is a comforting belief, and let us try to indulge it, that he is fully at peace in the society of the host of his friends and colaborers who have preceded him.

Said a Greek poet:

> Little it imports
> The dead, I think, if any shall obtain
> Magnificent and costly obsequies;
> Vain affectation of the living, this.

But no one has gone from us who would feel a richer joy to know that all men speak of him kindly and lovingly.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, the eloquent tributes to the noble dead whose virtues we extol to-day from those who have been his coworkers in the Senate during the eventful years when HENRY B. ANTHONY did his full duty here would seem to have so fully met the demands of reverence and affection, that it was not needed that one who so lately came to full personal appreciation of his noble qualities should be heard in words of eulogy. Yet I can not resist the opportunity offered me to speak of the high esteem in which I held him during the many years when to me he was simply one of the most prominent of public men, and of how much I came to revere and love him when it became my great privilege to know him personally.

I can never forget the cordiality of the welcome extended when I became his associate in the public work to which he had brought such high appreciation and advantageous effort; the encouraging words and valuable aid given me by the noble son of Rhode Island will ever remain in my memory as one of its most valued treasures. The mere acquaintance of the latter part of the Forty-seventh Congress ripened into something stronger during the winter of 1883–'84, and when, during the last summer, it was my fortune to spend a few delightful days with him at Block Island, in the State he loved so dearly, and when I saw him surrounded by his neighbors, relatives, and friends, an admiring acquaintanceship became a warm friendship.

Coming to the United States Senate in 1859, and serving there for the next quarter of a century, Governor ANTHONY was an active participant, if not a leader, in the most important legislative affairs during those eventful years of the Republic. He took his seat at the time when partisan spirit and sectional politics were at the flood. During the dark and gloomy days of the war of rebellion he did his full duty to the country he had sworn to protect and serve. His voice was ever raised for the cause of the right. He could find no excuses for rebellion and did not attempt to palliate treason. Too gentle in nature to be fiercely denunciatory of the misguided and misled men who were engaged in that which he deemed to be an unholy and inexcusable crusade against the dearest and best interests of the Republic and a base attack upon the rights of man, yet he had none but words of condemnation for their course and of strong support and hearty help for the soldiers of the nation. Those who wore the blue ever found in him a friend.

The dreadful conflict over, his shaping hand and controlling brain may be seen in the measures of reconstruction and the important laws designed to cement a divided nation and bring again together the warring States that they might once more dwell in unity and peace.

Twenty-five years of intelligent, active, painstaking, appreciative performance of his arduous and perplexing duties! How grand the record! There was much during the time to perplex and annoy, a great deal of a nature calculated to change the patient, loving spirit into one impatient and petulant, but no colleague in the Senate, constituent in his State, or fellow-citizen of HENRY B. ANTHONY ever found such change.

The poet of the early English, grand Geoffrey Chaucer, says, "He is a gentleman who does gentle deeds;" and the life of our departed friend is so full of the constant performance of such deeds that he made himself of the true gentry and issued his own patent of nobility. He did not seem to tire of such well-doing; the passing of the years and the coming on of old age brought physical change, but "that good gray head which all men knew" was ever the servant of the kind heart. He seemed to have followed the sound advice of the old philosopher, and to be able "to resist with success the frigidity of old age by combining the body, the mind, and the heart, keeping these in parallel vigor by exercise, study, and love."

But I do not propose any review of the noble life that has gone or to comment upon the valuable lessons that it teaches. Others have done it far more profitably than I could hope to do. In one official capacity, however, it seems fitting that I should speak of the lamented dead. At an early period in his life Mr. ANTHONY assumed editorial charge of the leading newspaper of his native State and made the Providence Journal a power for good. It was a fitting recognition of his intimate knowledge of the printer's craft that prompted the Senate in December, 1859, to place him upon the Committee on Printing. He served continuously upon this committee for nearly twenty-five years, and for twenty years of this period he was its alert, attentive, accommodating, and efficient chairman.

During the first year of Senator ANTHONY's service upon the committee, at a time when the political party with which he acted was in the minority, investigations were made of the contract system under which the printing and binding for the Government had been performed. This investigation showed so many abuses, so much of favoritism and fraud, that the result was the purchase of a printing office, of small size and insufficient in its appointments, which grew with the country's needs and growth to its present immense proportions. In the management of this office, and in its gradual enlargement as the work done there has increased, Senator ANTHONY took a deep interest.

The busy hive, with its thousands of industrious, intelligent employés, whose active brains and deft fingers furnish to the world the best public literature it has ever read; with its mighty forces, steam and electricity, giving life and motion to delicate machinery that seems to think and reason as it performs its allotted task; this great Printing Office, throbbing and pulsating day and night for the public good, stands as a mighty monument to the dead ANTHONY.

The record of the proceedings in the Senate bear testimony to his repeated efforts (unfortunately not often crowned with success) to diminish the cost of the public printing by curtailing the amount and dispensing with masses of official verbiage, which now swell too many of the public documents. He had a true man's hatred of "shams," and made bold assaults upon many of the works of deceit where they lay strongly entrenched.

One of the abuses which he sought persistently to do away with was the cumbering of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with remarks alleged to have been made but never delivered in Congress. Permit me to give an extract from one of the latest speeches made by him, and which, listened to with great interest in the Senate, should have brought forth abundant legislative fruit:

> Whatever may be said of the unimportant character of too much of the debates of Congress, as of other deliberative bodies, the importance of the proceedings can hardly be overestimated, and upon these the debates throw great light. They are the proceedings which establish and modify the Government of 40,000,000 of free, active, adventurous people, and whatever makes these proceedings plainer is of high value to the people, by whose servants they are transacted.

Further on he said:

> The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should be what it purports to be. Its phonographic accuracy and completeness should mirror exactly what is said and done. It should speak, like a credible witness, "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." Its correctness is the essential quality of its value. If not correct it is not only useless but injurious, it deceives instead of informing, it misleads instead of guiding, and throws confusion upon what it undertakes to enlighten.

Words of wisdom these, and abundantly worthy of the man who uttered them.

Another matter is well worthy of note as showing the sense of fairness that characterized the late chairman of the Committee on Printing. In the early days of his service investigation showed that many scandalous frauds had attended the purchase of paper and other material used in the public printing. These were done away with by changes in the law conceived and carried into execution by Governor ANTHONY. Purchases made in open market from favorites were no longer countenanced. Advertisements are now made for sealed proposals to supply according to samples furnished to each bidder, and bids are opened in public by the Joint Committee on Printing, and awards made to the lowest bidder who will best subserve the interests of the Government.

But I need not deal in further detail. Our brother's life was open as the day; he knew not concealments. So many were his virtues that "none knew him but to love him."

A life of virtue and well-doing prepared him for the great end. As his life had been so was his death. It was most fitting that it should come to him quietly, gently, and without shock.

He was to all of us most excellent example, and like him

> So may'st thou live till like ripe fruit thou drop > Into thy mother's lap, or be with ease
> Gathered, not harshly plucked, for death mature.

Mr. SHEFFIELD. Mr. President, as I recall the intimate personal relations which existed between the late Senator ANTHONY and myself for a period of forty years and upwards, the pleasure I have felt from his society, the wisdom I have derived from his counsel, the many acts of kindness I have received at his hands, and my attachment to his person, I hardly dare to trust myself to review his life and character in the presence of so many reminders of his death. This Chamber was the scene of his long-continued and useful service to his country. The presence of his honored associates to pay a tribute to his exalted worth, and my own entry here to occupy the place his death made vacant, bring before my mind in bold outline the genial man whom I could have wished would have lived always.

No Senator long acquainted with Mr. ANTHONY will arise to address the Senate on this occasion without having in mind the eulogies pronounced upon deceased Senators by him, eulogies which welled up from a mind and heart filled with human sympathy, as pure water from a natural spring, and expressed in language as pure as the fountain in which those eulogies originated; and especially will each Senator recall the burning words with which Mr. ANTHONY, as the representative of the Senate, delivered to the authorities of Massachusetts under the dome of its capitol the dead body of a great Senator; but the voice then so eloquent over the remains of Sumner is now hushed in death. The brilliant imagination which then mingled sadness and triumph has now been put out forever.

Well may we say:

> Who would not sing for Lycidas? He knew
> Himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme;
> He must not float upon his watery bier
> Unwept, and welter to the parching wind
> Without the meed of some melodious tear.

Mr. ANTHONY was a lineal descendant of John Anthony, a native of Hempstead in England, who came to Boston in the Hercules in 1634, and to Rhode Island soon after 1640. Gilbert Stuart, the artist, whose mother was an Anthony, who has preserved on canvas so faithfully the features of Washington, descended from the same ancestor. William Anthony was the father of Senator ANTHONY, and his mother was a daughter of James Greene, of Warwick. The Warwick Greenes have been a conspicuous family in Rhode Island from the foundation of the Colony. General Nathanael Greene, whose statue adorns a place in a hall of this Capitol, and Col. Ray Greene, who commanded at the battle of Red Bank, were members of this family, and two of its representatives have been members of the Senate. The ancestors of Governor ANTHONY belonged to the Society of Friends, which for a considerable time in our colonial history was the most influential denomination of Christians in the Colony. After Mr. ANTHONY graduated from college, he went to reside for a time and engaged in some mercantile pursuit at Savannah. He returned to Rhode Island, and was there married to Sarah Aborn, daughter of the late Christopher Rhodes, in 1837. In 1838, at the age of 23, he assumed the editorial control of the Providence Journal.

At that time, and for more than a score of years thereafter, he was surrounded by a coterie of young men, mostly college friends, of learning, wit, and of marked ability as writers, who aided him more or less in the conduct of his paper. But while his associates contributed to its success, his was the critical judgment, the controlling mind which carried the Journal to the front rank of the New England press, a standing which it yet maintains. In the heated contests which preceded the insurrection in the State in 1842, and during and subsequent to that event, while a constitution for the State was being framed and adopted, the Journal was the organ of the government, and the distinguished ability with which it was conducted brought Mr. ANTHONY prominently before the people of the State, and in 1849 he was presented by the young Whigs as their candidate for governor, an office to which he was elected that year, and re-elected in 1850, when he declined to be further a candidate for the office. In 1854 the great sorrow which ever after shadowed somewhat the life of Governor ANTHONY fell upon him. On the 12th of July of that year his wife died. I might pause here to dwell upon the tenderness of his nature as developed by that affliction, but the theme is too sacred—I will not sully it. Burdened with this great sorrow, early in 1855 he visited Europe for rest and relief. Upon his return he resumed control of his paper.

Governor ANTHONY inherited from his father an interest in a manufacturing establishment located in his native town of Coventry. Though for a time he was interested in carrying on business at this establishment, he retired from it when he went abroad, but omitted to give notice of his withdrawal. In 1857 the company became involved in the financial distress of that time. The creditors claimed that Governor ANTHONY was liable for the debts of the company. He did not stop to have the question of his liability for these debts settled in the courts, but manfully came forward and met them, and honorably settled the claims made upon him. This added to his popularity, and in 1859, after a sharp contest, he was elected to the Senate of the United States, and to this office he was four times re-elected. This shows alike the stability of the character of the Senator and of the people of the State who elected him. While in the Senate during this most interesting period of our national history the conduct of Senator ANTHONY was seen and known of all men.

As an editor, Mr. ANTHONY clearly comprehended the rights and duties of his office. He understood the wants and necessities of the industrial interests of New England, of which Providence is a great center, and it was his laudable ambition to make his paper a leading advocate and organ of those interests. He thought clearly and selected with rapidity the words which could best express his thoughts in the most forcible manner. There was no room left for construction in what he wrote. His style was direct, clear, and forcible, without excess of verbiage—it needed no interpreter. When he entered the Senate he had no superior in New England in writing effective editorial paragraphs, and though his Senatorial career was correct and very creditable to himself, it may be well doubted if he had continued in his profession whether his fame as an editor would not have been as desirable as it is as a Senator.

As a politician Mr. ANTHONY stood by his party, seeking to correct its errors and to improve its policy within and not without its lines. He always adhered with fidelity to his convictions of duty, yet he always treated his opponents with a generous justice, while that treatment was duly appreciated, and when it was not he was yet just. He won the respect and regard of the opposing party by tempering the expression of his convictions with evidences of good-nature and with an address which conciliated rather than repelled them.

The secret of Mr. ANTHONY'S influence was an entire frankness, the natural outcome of his character, with his absolute integrity of purpose, which prevented him from supporting any measure which he believed to be prejudicial to the best interests of the public. In the Senate he never made the most of himself, for he always underrated his own capabilities in comparison with the capabilities of others. He was careful never to undertake what he feared he might not be able to accomplish.

Mr. ANTHONY was a man of amiable and even of fascinating manners, deferential to those about him, and mindful of all the proprieties of life; he was well calculated to impress with a sense of regard and respect all with whom he was brought into close relations; never obtrusive, full of conversational resources, endowed with a ready wit and a rich fund of pleasing anecdotes always at command to illustrate a point without encumbering it; strong in his friendships, tender in his sensibilities, yet with absolute self-control. That he was a student of the science of government apart from his observation of the practice of that science in the Senate, no one will pretend; and while he could state a point which would expose a defect in the argument of an adversary as clearly and as effectively as any of his compeers, he was not the man to present by public address a subject involving complicated details. He rather directed his force against an adversary by isolated assaults at his weak points than by an attack upon his entire line—by sortie, rather than by siege. He was a conciliatory man, and was possessed of great forbearance. He would go to the very verge of propriety to avoid the giving of offense, and would exhaust the resources of a very charitable disposition before he would believe that cause for offense was intended to be given to him. But there was a line which his self-respect would not allow him to pass or an adversary to cross, and when forced to resistance he was a vigorous and unyielding adversary.

Mr. ANTHONY loved his native State. He was devoted to its institutions and thoroughly imbued with the spirit of its history. He believed with Lord Coleridge that the character of a state was not to be determined by the number of acres of ground it contained or by the number of its population, but rather by the characters and achievements of its people. In quiet retirement, in company with men of kindred thoughts, in conversation Mr. ANTHONY dwelt with admiration upon the fortitude and self-denial of those exiles of exiles who settled the Rhode Island Colony; upon their sufferings and hardships, and withal upon the Christian charity which they exhibited in planting and maintaining the great ideas upon which the Colony was founded. Then he would trace the progress of the colonial history, the growth of the Colony, and its development into a State; the rise of its commerce until its canvas whitened every sea; and that commerce alone, and the commercial enterprise of its people, merited the glowing eulogy of Burke in the House of Commons upon the commercial enterprise of all the Colonies. Then he would describe how wars and the adverse policy of the Government drove that commerce from the ocean, and forced upon reluctant New England a blessing in disguise, that wiser policy, which the great commoner of Kentucky called "the American system" of fostering and protecting American industries; and how Rhode Island, upon the ruins of its commercial industries, reared factories and workshops and operated them, until their handiwork under the operation of this benign system won for them a place among the foremost industries of the country. At these times he would also delight to dwell upon the men who had illustrated Rhode Island history and their achievements, to show the claims of Rhode Island upon the National Union, a part of which achievements he appeared to feel to be his by inheritance from a line of ancestors who had borne an important part in settling, developing, and maintaining the Colony and State during every period of its history.

The grave has closed over him and shut in his mortal remains. Throughout his life he anticipated the harvest of a good name, and he did nothing to blight it. His end did not come until after a long career of useful public service, when his physical energies had been exhausted and the ends of life had been attained. It is a sad thought; but it will not be long before "our lighted torches will pass to other hands."

Senator ANTHONY was a fortunate man; fortunate in his moral and intellectual endowments; fortunate in his friends and in his surroundings; fortunate in his life, fortunate in his death in his own house with kind friends around him. He has left no stain upon his good name; his finished course covers nothing to be regretted, leaves undone nothing desired, but that his career could have been prolonged and that his usefulness could have been continued. But it has been otherwise ordered, and his friends should be thankful for the blessings which his life has conferred, rather than to murmur at the Providence which has determined it.

Mr. President, I second the resolutions on your table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being the third Monday in the month, the regular order is the call of committees for motions to suspend the rules. The call rests with the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CONSULAR COURTS, ETC.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I move to suspend the rules, take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 343 to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion, and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4083 to section 4130 inclusive, and put the same upon its passage.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, that is a very long bill, some fifty pages——

Mr. RANDALL. I object to any bill passing this House without being first read.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania simply anticipates my purpose. It was my object to insist upon the reading, and also that the other side might be heard.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a very important bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is exactly my opinion, and I want to have some debate on the other side of the question. For that reason I want to have the bill read, and demand a second upon the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I will state that this Senate bill coincides, word for word, with House bill No. 1867, which is printed; so that any gentleman by using House bill No. 1867 can follow the reading.

Mr. RANDALL. I insist upon the reading of the bill. I have seen in my legislative experience great injury done by the passage of bills without having them read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] does not ask to dispense with the reading, but simply states that there is a House bill identical with the Senate bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 343) to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion, and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4083 to section 4130, inclusive.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the jurisdiction which the United States now have or hereafter may have and enjoy, by treaty, custom, usage, or otherwise, in countries or places out of their territory or dominion, so far as the same is judicial, shall be exercised through and by the courts herein provided for, each of which shall be a court of record and have a seal. In China and Japan it shall be exercised through and by consular courts, district courts, and one supreme court. In all other such places out of the territory and domain of the United States such jurisdiction shall be exercised through and by consular courts in manner as provided in this act.

And the consuls authorized hereby to hold such courts shall be responsible to the United States and amenable to the laws thereof not only as consular officers but as judicial officers when they perform judicial duties.

The several provisions of this act shall apply and be enforced in the several countries herein named, in whole or in part, to the extent to which the United States are authorized by treaties and capitulations of the said countries, respectively, to exercise jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. That the sections of the Revised Statutes from and including section 4083 to and including section 4130 be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That the said sections, and every part thereof, shall be and remain in force so far as may be necessary for the purpose of defining, prosecuting, and punishing crimes committed before this act takes effect, and of saving and enforcing civil actions pending at that time.

BORNEO, COREA, EGYPT, MADAGASCAR, MOROCCO, MUSCAT, PERSIA, SAMOA, SIAM, TRIPOLI, TUNIS, AND TURKEY.

SEC. 3. That to carry into full effect the provisions of the treaties of the United States with Borneo, Corea, Egypt, Madagascar, Morocco, Muscat, Persia, Samoa, Siam, Tripoli, Tunis, and Turkey, respectively, and any capitulations of either of said countries, the consuls of the United States duly appointed to reside in each of those countries shall, in addition to other powers and duties imposed upon them respectively by the provisions of such treaties and capitulations, be invested with the judicial authority herein described, which shall appertain to the office of consul, and be a part of the duties belonging thereto, so far as the same is allowed by treaty or capitulation.

SEC. 4. That such officers are invested with all the judicial authority necessary to execute the provisions of such treaties and capitulations in respect to crimes charged to have been committed by or against citizens of the United States, and to issue all necessary processes to carry this authority into execution as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 5. That such officers are also invested with all the judicial authority necessary to execute the provisions of such treaties or capitulations, respectively, in regard to civil rights, whether of property or person; and in all matters of contract or of other controversy, the consul at the port where, or nearest to which, the contract was made, or at the port at which, or nearest to which, it was to be executed, or the cause of controversy arose, or the damage complained of was sustained, shall entertain jurisdiction. Such jurisdiction shall embrace all controversies provided for by this act or by such treaties and capitulations, respectively.

SEC. 6. That jurisdiction in both criminal and civil matters shall in all cases be exercised and enforced in conformity with the laws of the United States heretofore enacted or hereafter to be enacted, which are hereby, so far as is necessary to execute such treaties, respectively, and so far as they are suitable to carry the same into effect, extended over all citizens of the United States in those countries, and over all others to the extent that the terms of the treaties, respectively, justify or require. But in all cases where such laws are not adapted to the object, or are deficient in the provisions necessary to furnish suitable remedies, the common law and the law of equity and admiralty shall be extended in like manner over such citizens and others in those countries; and if neither the common law, nor the law of equity or admiralty, nor the statutes of the United States furnish appropriate and sufficient remedies, the Secretary of State and the Attorney-General shall prepare a code to supply such defects, which shall be submitted to Congress by the President.

SEC. 7. That the consul of the United States in either of the countries mentioned in section 3 of this act, within the consular district for which he is appointed, is authorized, upon facts within his knowledge, or which he has good reason to believe true, or upon complaint made or information filed in writing and authenticated in such way as shall be prescribed by the code of practice hereinafter provided, to issue his warrant for the arrest of any citizen of the United States charged with committing in the country any criminal offense against law, and to arraign and try any such offender, and to sentence him to punishment in the manner herein prescribed. If the offense is punishable with death or imprisonment, and there be a diplomatic representative of the United States in the country in which the consulate is situated, the consular officer shall report the proceedings in full, without delay, to him, calling attention to any palliating circumstances. The consular officer shall at the same time report such proceedings in full, with the palliating circumstances, to the Secretary of State, to be submitted by him to the President. Execution of the sentence of death shall be suspended until the approval of such sentence by the President. When it appears that the offense has been committed within another consular jurisdiction, such consul may, on the application of the consul of the district in which the crime was committed, send the offender in custody to the consul making the requisition, or require him to give security for his appearance there. In civil cases, wherein judgment is rendered for more than $200, appeals on questions of law, according to the forms of the code of practice hereinafter provided for, shall be allowed as follows: From the consular courts of Borneo, Corea, Madagascar, Muscat, Persia, Samoa, and Siam, to the supreme court of Japan; from the consular courts of Egypt, Morocco, Tripoli, Tunis, and Turkey, to the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of New York. Execution shall not be stayed by reason of such appeal unless the appellant shall execute a bond to the appellee, in such sum as shall be fixed by the consular court, with sureties approved by it, conditioned to pay any final judgment that may be rendered against him.

SEC. 8. That the consuls in the countries mentioned in section 3 of this act are hereby authorized, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to provide suitable prisons for the safe-keeping and confinement of persons under arrest or conviction, and for their suitable support.

SEC. 9. That in criminal cases in all consular courts, except those of China and Japan, the Supreme Court of the United States, or any judge thereof, shall have jurisdiction to issue writs of habeas corpus and suspend execution of sentence in said consular courts, upon petition of the accused, stating in detail the errors committed in said courts, for the purposes of a review of the decision of the consular courts in the Supreme Court; and the said Supreme Court shall have power, upon such application, to render final judgment or to remand the case for further execution. In such proceedings the appearance of the accused in person shall not be deemed necessary to confer jurisdiction unless ordered by the court or judge allowing the writ.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

SEC. 10. That the consular courts in China and Japan, and the grades and ranks of the officers thereof, shall be as now established, except as changed hereby. The acting consular officer of the district is authorized to hold such court. The Secretary of State may assign to each consulate in China and Japan a consular clerk, who shall also act as clerk of the court and as a master in chancery; and for this purpose the number of consular clerks authorized by section 1704 of the Revised Statutes is increased to twenty-five. Such consular clerk shall have the custody of the seal and records, with the usual powers and duties of the clerk of a court of record, and shall also be under the consul in his consular capacity, and shall execute a bond to the United States for the faithful discharge of his duties, in such amount as shall be fixed by the Secretary of State, and with sureties who shall be approved by the court.

SEC. 11. That the consular officers authorized to hold such courts shall continue to have the power, as fully as they now have, to issue warrants and cause to be arrested citizens of the United States charged with the commission of misdemeanors, offenses, or crimes. When it appears that the offense or crime has been committed within another consular district, they may, on the requisition of the consul of the district within which the crime was committed, send the offender in custody to the consul making the requisition, or require him to give security for his appearance there. When it is charged that the misdemeanor, offense, or crime was committed within the consul's district, the consular court may take jurisdiction of, try, and punish citizens of the United States so charged when the offense is not punishable with death; and a review may be had in the proper district court on the rulings of the consular court on questions of law. That, for the purposes of this act, there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two judges for China, and a judge for Japan, whose term of office shall be eight years, respectively; and in case of vacancies, the persons appointed to the place from time to time shall hold office for like terms. Each judge shall receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 a year, payable monthly, and his necessary traveling expenses in the discharge of his duty, payable on his own voucher, at the rate of 8 cents a mile.

The consular districts of Canton, Amoy, Foo-Chow, Ningpoo, and Swatow shall constitute the first judicial district, with the seat of the court at Canton; the consular districts of Shanghai, Hankow, Chin-Kiang, Tien-Tsin, and New-Chwang shall constitute the second judicial district, with the seat of the court at Shanghai; and the consular districts within the Empire of Japan shall constitute a judicial district, with the seat of the court at Yokahama. But the Secretary of State may from time to time change these districts as convenience may require.

The President may also, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a clerk for each district court in China, one of whom shall have his principal office at Canton and the other at Shanghai, and shall also be the clerk of the supreme court for China, and a clerk for the district courts held by the judge for Japan, who shall have his principal office at Yokahama, and shall also be the clerk of the supreme court for Japan. Each of said clerks shall have power to appoint a deputy, and shall give bond to the United States for the faithful discharge of his duties in such amount as shall be fixed by the Secretary of State, with such sureties as shall be approved by the court. Each clerk and deputy, before entering on the duties of his office, shall take and subscribe an oath before the judge to faithfully observe the laws of the United States in force in China or Japan (as the case may be), and to discharge the duties of his office. Each of these clerks shall also be a master in chancery, and receive an annual salary of $2,500 and his fees as master in chancery, such portion of his fees as clerk as he is entitled to retain under the provisions of this act, and his necessary traveling expenses in the discharge of his duties, payable on the voucher of the judge at the rate of 8 cents per mile.

The judges for China may appoint an interpreter for the district courts in China, and the judge for Japan may appoint an interpreter for the district courts in Japan. Each of these interpreters shall be also a translator, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $2,000 a year, payable monthly, and his necessary traveling expenses in attending court, to be computed and certified as in the case of the district clerks. The interpreter for the second judicial district of China and the interpreter for Japan shall also be the interpreter and translator for the supreme court of the country for which he is appointed. A willful failure to so interpret and translate truly shall make the offender guilty of perjury, for which he may be tried and convicted by the proper consular court, although he be not a citizen of the United States.

The said district courts may appoint temporary officers when necessary to the proper conduct of their business, and fix a reasonable compensation for their services, which shall be paid by the clerk out of any funds in his hands applicable to that purpose, or by the consul of the district on the certificate of the clerk that he has no such funds.

A term of court in each district shall commence on the second Monday in January in each year and end on the last Wednesday in December. The judges for China shall hold the district courts in China, and the judge for Japan shall hold the district court in Japan; but either judge may sit in a district of the other if desired to do so. This court shall be held by a district judge, as presiding judge, and the person authorized to hold the consular court in the district. In case of difference of opinion, the ruling of the district judge shall stand as the ruling of the court.

If the judge of the district certifies in writing to the consul that neither judge can be present, the court shall be held as a district court by the consul, as presiding judge, together with four impartial citizens of the United States selected by the district judge from the leading citizens residing in the consular district. In case of difference of opinion between the consul and his associates, the ruling of the consul shall prevail on questions of law. The proceedings shall be prosecuted in such court to final judgment, and sentence in case of conviction. All rulings of law adverse to the accused in a court not presided over by a judge shall be subject to review in the district court.

It shall be the duty of the presiding judge at all convictions for capital offenses to report immediately the proceedings in full to the principal diplomatic representative of the United States in the country, with a statement of any palliating circumstances, if there be such. If the diplomatic representative thinks the case a proper subject for pardon or commutation, he may grant a reprieve not exceeding six months, and shall at once forward the papers to the Secretary of State, in order that they may be submitted to the President.

On any final judgment of said district court in a case brought up for review from a consular court, where the matter in controversy, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum of $2,500, and on questions of law in suits originally begun and prosecuted to final judgment in said courts, where the matter in controversy is of like amount, an appeal shall be allowed to the supreme court for China or Japan, as the case may be.

The supreme court for China shall have appellate jurisdiction to hear and determine all causes, whether civil or criminal, decided in China, and brought before it for review under the foregoing provisions; and the supreme court for Japan shall have like jurisdiction as to cases decided in Japan and brought before it for review.

The said supreme courts may affirm, modify, or reverse any judgment, decree, or order lawfully brought before them for review, and may direct such judgment, decree, or order to be rendered or such further proceedings to be had by the inferior court as the justice of the case may require. They may enter final judgment or decree and issue executions thereon.

The appellant may prosecute his appeal without bond, but in such case execution shall not be stayed.

In all criminal causes in the consular or district courts which may be taken for review to a higher court, execution of judgment may be stayed, and in case of judgment of death, shall be stayed, by the court rendering judgment, until the order of the reviewing court.

A copartnership of which a citizen of the United States is a general partner may sue and be sued in said courts, and proceeding had in any such suit as if all the parties were citizens, except that execution shall not issue against the separate property of a member who is not a citizen of the United States, unless permitted by treaty or capitulation.

Persons desiring to form a partnership in any consular district for the transaction of business with a limited liability may do so under the rules and regulations of the code of practice herein directed to be made: Provided, That such rules and regulations shall provide for making public, in the consular district where the business is to be transacted, a certificate, to be signed by all the proposed partners, wherein shall be stated the names of all the partners, the amount of the cash capital contributed by each, the nature of the business, the duration of the partnership, and the interest and liability of each partner. Any false statement in such certificate shall cause a general liability of each and every partner for all the debts of the partnership.

ATTACHMENT.

SEC. 38. That in a civil action for the recovery of money the plaintiff may, at or after the commencement thereof, have an attachment against the property of the defendant upon the grounds herein stated:

First, when the defendant or one of several defendants is a foreign corporation or a non-resident, and the cause of action has arisen in the country wherein the consular district is situate; or,

Second, when the defendant has absconded with the intent to defraud his creditors; or,

Third, has left the jurisdiction to avoid the service of a summons, or,

Fourth, so conceals himself that a summons can not be served upon him; or,

Fifth, is about to remove his property, or a part thereof, out of the jurisdiction of the court, with the intent to defraud his creditors; or,

Sixth, is about to convert his property, or a part thereof, into money, for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of his creditors; or,

Seventh, has assigned, removed, disposed of, or is about to dispose of his property, or a part thereof, or conceals it with the intent to defraud his creditors; or,

Eighth, has fraudulently or criminally incurred the obligation for which suit is about to be or has been brought.

The said remedy of attachment shall be obtained and enforced according to the regulations and forms prescribed by the code of practice, which shall include the making of an affidavit and the giving of a bond, with sufficient security, on or in behalf of the plaintiff.

JURIES.

SEC. 39. That a grand jury for each consular district shall be impaneled and sworn, to inquire into and take cognizance of all crimes and offenses committed therein. The number of members, the number necessary to find an indictment, the selection, summoning, rules, and forms of proceedings of such grand juries shall be regulated by the code of practice herein directed to be made.

No one shall be held to answer for a capital crime or other felony except on indictment of a grand jury, or for any other offense except on such information as may be prescribed by said code of practice, unless, after being duly advised by the court, the accused shall waive such indictment or information and consent to be tried upon such charge as the court may enter of record against him.

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right of trial by jury; but he may waive the same and submit to be tried by the court alone, or he may plead guilty to the charge.

In all civil actions according to the course of the common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, but the parties may waive the same and submit the cause to trial by the court.

SEC. 40. That every male citizen of the United States resident or temporarily sojourning in any of the places covered by the provisions of this act, of the age of 21 years and upward, being able to speak and read English, not having been convicted of any infamous crime, shall be qualified to serve on a jury. All persons so qualified shall be liable to serve on a jury, except persons in the diplomatic service, officers and employés of the courts and prisons, officers in the Army or Navy on duty, attorneys in actual practice, and persons disabled by mental or bodily infirmity.

On or before the second Monday of January in each year a list shall be made out by the consul of persons residing in the district and qualified to serve as jurors. This list shall be conspicuously posted in the court-room and consulate until the 31st of the same month. As soon thereafter as it can conveniently be done, the consul shall, in open court, revise and settle the list for the current year, and until the next list shall be settled.

Whenever a jury is required, the court shall summon at least fifteen persons from the said list. Any one failing to appear when so summoned shall be liable to such fine, not exceeding $50, as the court may see fit to impose, to be collected in such manner as the court may direct.

A trial jury shall consist of five jurors, and shall be required to give a unanimous verdict. No person interested in the result shall sit as juror. In cases tried before a jury the rule of challenge shall be as follows: Challenges for cause shall be unlimited in civil and criminal cases, and all challenges for cause shall be tried by the court. In civil actions there shall be no peremptory challenges. In criminal prosecutions peremptory challenges shall be allowed; if the case is capital, the defendant nine and the Government three, to be exercised alternately, the defendant challenging three and the prosecution one. In all other criminal cases the defendant shall have five peremptory challenges and the Government two, to be made in the same manner.

Jurors shall receive for their subsistence while in attendance at court $2 each per day, and shall also be entitled to traveling expenses, at the rate of 8 cents per mile, from their homes to the place of holding court, and from such place to their homes, respectively.

The clerk shall pay the jurors' fees and mileage from a roll which shall be provided by him for each term of the district court, and be known as "the court pay-roll for the term of 18—," out of any funds in his hands from which court expenses are payable, as hereafter provided. Each juror on receiving his per diem and mileage fees shall sign such roll; and the court pay-roll thus signed and approved by the signature of the district judge shall be the clerk's sufficient voucher.

SEC. 41. That if it shall be found impossible to obtain a trial jury of five competent persons among all the citizens of the United States in the consular district, the consul shall enter that fact on the record of his court, and proceed with a jury of three such citizens; and if it should be impossible to obtain a jury of three, he shall call on three disinterested persons not citizens of the United States, but otherwise qualified to act as jurors.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. COX, of New York, demanded a second.

Mr. HITT. I ask that the second be considered as ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we had better have a count by tellers, as required by the rule.

The SPEAKER. A second being demanded, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT].

The House divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 54.

Mr. HOLMAN (one of the tellers). I do not insist on further count.

So (further count not being called for) the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the motion and fifteen minutes in opposition to it. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] to control the time in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to control the time in opposition to it.

Mr. HITT. In the few moments of time given for discussion it will hardly be possible to even explain the provisions of the bill, much less to make an argument in their support. It is a long bill, although it is much shorter than the law of which it takes the place, for it is a revision of many laws enacted at many times concerning the extraterritorial jurisdiction of the United States. Those laws have in the course of time been amended, and it is believed that they need further amendment, and that they need to be methodized and perfected.

This bill is one aiming at that purpose. It was prepared with great care in the department of the Government specially charged with our foreign affairs. It has been considered by the committees of both Houses for two Congresses and many modifications made. It has received their continuous attention for several years. It has been the subject of two messages from the President, of several executive communications, of extended discussion elsewhere, and very full discussion in the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House.

The need for this kind of legislation need not be explained to any one who is familiar with the condition of our citizens abroad, their rights, and their affairs. No one among us would be willing in Pagan or Mahommedan countries to be subjected to their fantastic laws and cruel punishments, and inefficient, ignorant, corrupt courts. Our Government, from the beginning of our national history, has taken vigilant care to protect its citizens everywhere around the world, providing in its treaties with Oriental, far Asiatic, and island countries of half-civilized peoples, that they shall not be subjected to the jurisdiction of local law and local tribunals. And when gentlemen ask, as they may, where is the authority in the Constitution for exercising this jurisdiction or for establishing a judicial authority in a foreign country, I may remind them that this was done by nearly all Christian governments under public law, in treaties centuries ago, and by our own Government in its earliest existence. This system of establishing and exercising judicial power outside of our country began even before the Constitution, and at the very moment that the Constitution was framed, when by the treaty with Morocco, in 1787, judicial power over our citizens in that country was confined to courts authorized by our Government.

A long series of similar treaties made since have received the assent of our wisest and most eminent statesmen. These treaties withdraw our countrymen from the local laws of Eastern countries; we are bound by reason and necessity to supply their place. The laws that have extended, perfected, and methodized this system are, it is believed, where conflicting, reconciled, abbreviated, and in some things extended in the elaborate measure which is now presented to the House. I may say briefly that this bill is a digest and arrangement of the present statutes on this subject, with some things omitted which were deemed superfluous or unwise, with many limitations put upon the judicial powers of our consuls as they are now exercised under the law. It also greatly abridges the present extraordinary, almost uncontrolled, judicial authority of our ministers. The powers of the consuls, acting as consular courts, through the countries of Northern Africa and the islands and the East are more sharply defined, and in cases of importance an appeal is given to the United States court for the eastern district of New York.

In China and Japan, where the American interest is so large and increasing so fast, where our merchants in single cities, our fellow-citizens, can be counted by hundreds, where their transactions amount to millions upon millions, it has been deemed necessary to establish courts purely judicial, and to take away from the consuls and from the ministers the power of life and death which they now have and have long held. Our consuls can now try a man for his life. There is no appeal save to the minister. If the minister is away it is to the gentleman who is exercising the functions of chargé, perhaps a young man of little experience. If he does not see fit to send it to the President the man is executed. Several times in cases the records of which lie before me have citizens been tried there for their lives, and have perished under this law. It is time that our citizens have a more adequate, systematic protection in accordance with the spirit of our laws and our institutions.

It was remarked to me a day or two ago by a gentleman long in China that we have not had a minister of the United States in that empire since the time of Mr. Burlingame who had read law. The gentleman who made the remark was himself an ex-minister. Yet the minister is the appellate court for that great multitude of Americans in China, and for that enormous body of property which passes through the hands of the American merchants, dealers, and workers, whose brain and muscle are carrying such a mighty American influence into China. Therefore it has been deemed by the Department and by the committee wise that independent judicial tribunals be established. This will cause, of course, an additional expense. That is the item in the bill that will undoubtedly subject it to the criticism of some gentlemen upon this floor. The bill provides for two judges in China and one judge in Japan, at $5,000 each, who are to take the place of our minister in his capacity as judge and of the consul in many cases, which are defined very carefully in the bill. These judges and the personnel of their courts altogether, in China and Japan, will not entail as much cost upon our Government as one of the numerous English courts established in those remote countries for the protection of British subjects, the security of their lives and property, by that great and wise government, chiefly with a view to the extension of its commerce and its power; and we, seeking to-day by every means that legislation can compass to extend American commerce, can hardly find a more immediate and practical way of doing it than by protecting American life and property everywhere throughout the world by our flag and by our laws.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, at the present time we have what are called consular courts in these heathen lands. I mean the Mohammedan countries and the pagan countries, such as Japan and China. This bill proposes to extend the jurisdiction of our courts there beyond the consular business. It makes somebody else besides the consul a judge. It creates a district court in China and Japan, with two judges for China and one for Japan, and a supreme court to be held by all the judges.

Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] very properly says that the basis and the authority for legislation of this kind is to be found in the Constitution under the treaty-making power. It has been sometimes alleged to be a power connected with commerce. It is sometimes alleged to be a power arising under the second section of the third article of the Constitution, the general judicial power; but I think all hands agree, especially since the argument of Mr. Cushing, when he was our minister to China and made the treaty there—I think all hands now agree that if there is any authority in Congress to carry the body of our judicial power beyond the limits of our own nation it comes from the treaty-making power, and is to be found there and nowhere else. It has been doubted by men of ability whether or not we can lift up the body of our judicature and bear it into a foreign country; whether we can give it extraterritoriality; whether we can carry our constitutional requirements as to evidence and as to trial by jury and kindred subjects to a foreign land.

But there comes in the condition, and in so far as the treaty makes it conditional we may do so. If these foreign countries agree to it we may do so, but it is a matter of very grave doubt. Can we, merely by the consent of another party, expand our Constitution? Can we do it so as to set up a judicial system in a foreign country?

I need not argue that question. It seems to be taken for granted that we have the power to make a consular court, and a fortiori to make these other courts. I may deny the latter according to my present lights.

I agree with my friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] that there is no time in a half hour's debate for the proper discussion of a subject of this magnitude. It is a bill covering fifty-two printed pages. It is a bill involving a code for human society. It is a code relating to partnerships, to the laws of evidence, to marriage, wills, and successions, and to the laws as to attachments. It involves crimes and punishments. It creates juries. It concerns life and death itself.

Mr. Speaker, if the Constitution of the United States allows us to set up our judiciary in a foreign country, should we not have our jury system there? What provision is there in this bill for a jury? The jury is sacred to Anglo-Saxon traditions.

Here, sir, is a provision for a jury of five American citizens, if so many can be found, or of three, if only so many can be found within the bailiwick; but if three Americans can not be found, then the jurors are to be selected from whom? Why, from your Chinese, or your Japanese, or your Samoan or Siamese friends. You may select the whole five from any of the peoples where these courts are to be established.

Mr. LONG. Do not our consuls at present exercise judicial powers?

Mr. COX, of New York. They do.

Mr. LONG. Where do they obtain them?

Mr. COX, of New York. They obtain them under the present law of Congress. But this bill proposes to set up regular courts.

Mr. LONG. Will not the power exercised by those courts be the same judicial power that is now exercised by the consular courts?

Mr. COX, of New York. I doubt our right to establish regular courts outside of consular and commercial relations. It has been doubted by those who know more than I do. I merely throw out the doubt now. We have no time to discuss the question in this brief debate. Here, sir, is a bill which repeals forty-eight sections of our Revised Statutes. Very likely it has ameliorating clauses in it. It is so framed, however, that no one can tell, in the hurry of to-day and in view of the reform going on in our own and other countries, what particular code is the best for the emergency or what is needed for the protection of our citizens and their property and persons in these barbaric realms.

Mr. Speaker, these courts of ours in foreign countries have grown, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] has well said, out of our first treaty with Morocco. That treaty was made shortly after the organization of our Government.

At that time these Mohammedan and pagan countries were governed by bigotry. They were prejudiced against foreigners. They were ruled by their caprices, and restrained only by their own rules of evidence and trial. Many of these rules were drawn, as the gentleman reminded us, from the Koran. But since that time there have been marvelous changes. Consider what has been transpiring in the world since. We can truthfully say, "We have changed all that." In China, wherever we can reach it, in Algiers, in Morocco, in Siam, in the Corea—in all these remote and so-called barbaric nations there has been progress. They regard such courts as these as irksome. They are a sort of wheel within a wheel—an imperium in imperio. In Egypt, but for its distractions, our court would long since have been abolished. These abnormal and extraterritorial courts are the remnant of the bigoted and unprogressive past. They are provoking; they are odious, just as all creations of foreigners in defiance of home rule. They should not be encouraged. Nor should we, in view of their unpopularity and in the new "light of Asia" and new enterprise in Africa, and under the dawn of a new century, extend these alien institutions into those remote countries. We would not suffer them. We should not inflict and certainly should not extend them in defiance of our own organic order. If the Constitution be sacred to us; if its ungranted powers are reserved; if we would reserve our powers and not push them too far federally, not push them into the far-off and jealous Orient, then let us be heedful about passing a bill of this nature. If we must repeal our statutes let the repeal be under liberal and just conditions.

Besides, this bill encourages the creation of many new offices. There are already coming to the front many men of many minds, if not of many tongues, to be appointed marshals and clerks and judges of the courts to be established under this bill.

Why not wait a little? Let this be considered in Committee of the Whole—perhaps in the next Congress. Perhaps we may then see what the wisdom of the State Department has not seen.

There may be many defects in a bill of this nature which can be cured by more considerate deliberation. Until that time, and in view of a general reform of our consular system under the new processes of our era of steam, electricity, interchange, and intelligence, we may perfect closer and happier relations with this Moslem and pagan world, some of whose institutions and customs are so much finer and better than our boasted policies and politics that we may well hesitate before reproaching their advancement by such bills as this.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, if we are to build and support in the very heart of the Orient an American state, I think we should proceed with great deliberation and caution in planning the edifice. Here is an elaborate code which in its civil aspects is almost as large and intricate as that of the Empire State of New York; and incorporated in this bill is also a criminal code. In other words, this bill creates several ready-made American states, both as to civil and criminal jurisdiction, with two supreme courts, one in China and one in Japan. Now I ask, is it right that in the half-hour allowed for its discussion in this House we should hastily pass a bill to create an American government in a foreign country? I would respectfully suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] that the title of this bill should properly read somewhat as follows: "An act to create small experimental American states in China, Turkey, Japan, and other remote countries, and to provide offices abroad for home statesmen." It will never do for us to begin our administration of the Government in this way.

I call attention to another feature of this bill. It not alone deals with the question of partnership, the question of marriage, the entire social and legal relations of Americans residing in those countries, but it deals with the question of life; and the American citizen abroad finds himself under this code tried by what? By a jury of his countrymen? By a jury of twelve men, in accordance with our Constitution? No; he may be tried for his life under this bill by a mongrel jury of three men—something unknown to the laws and Constitution of the country which he has left and of which he is a citizen.

Mr. HITT. That is the law now, or, rather, it is worse now.

Mr. MCADOO. No; the gentleman is in error. The present law provides that the consul shall conduct the trial, with a right of appeal to the minister; and I say that a citizen of this country had better be tried by a consul or a minister than by a jury of three men, as provided in this bill. Say, as may be the case, three Chinamen, who can very imperfectly speak English. Trial by an intelligent consul seems to me superior to this novel jury of three pigeon-English-speaking Chinamen or Japanese.

Moreover, under this bill there is a discretionary power as to the creation of offices. There is provision for an increased number of interpreters; and, in this bill, after the foreign interpreter takes the oath he is for the time being a sort of temporary American citizen. This bill gives leave, so long as the funds hold out, so long as the clerk has any unexpended portion of the appropriation, to create temporary offices; and it gives to the Secretary of State the right to make an elaborate code regulating the practice of these courts.

I protest, sir, against this exportation of an American state, a mongrel state at that, to a foreign country under the flag of the United States. Why, it will involve us in all kinds of international difficulty. We do not know, speaking facetiously, but that, following the example of our history, this American state in China may want to secede from that government, and so involve us in all manner of international trouble.

I hope, sir, that this bill will not pass, and am sorry that in the short time allotted me I can not point out the many other defects it contains. We have here at home a great continent to develop and absorbing problems of free government to work out without embroiling ourselves in Africa or Asia.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me a very perilous proceeding to pass a bill of this magnitude, a bill of fifty-two pages, involving the highest questions of government, with no opportunity for amendment and only half an hour's debate. There are many provisions of this bill which are embraced in the present law; but the bill proposes to create many new offices—judges, consular clerks, marshals. Innumerable provisions are made under which public expenditures will be very largely increased.

But, sir, there is one new feature in this bill to which I wish especially to call the attention of the House. I ask the Clerk to read the eighteenth section. Its extraordinary character may have been overlooked in the hasty reading which has occurred.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That any consular officer of the United States, under directions of the Secretary of State, may assist in establishing and maintaining municipal governments in settlements occupied by Americans, Europeans, and other foreigners in any such place out of the territory and dominion of the United States, by the concessions of the government in which it is situate. Citizens of the United States residing in such municipalities, either already or hereafter to be organized, are and shall continue to be subject to such regulations as fully as if the same were imposed by due authority of law within the domains of the United States. The consular courts of the United States shall take jurisdiction of and enforce the regulations issued by such municipal bodies of which a consular officer of the United States is a member, and render judgment for fines and penalties imposed by the same, and cause such judgments to be enforced and make such disposition of such fines and penalties when collected as may be provided by the municipal regulations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, that provision is a new one, and it seems to me confers extraordinary powers on the Secretary of State, powers hitherto never conferred upon an officer of this Government. The consul, with the approval of the Secretary of State, may absolutely organize municipal governments within the limits of any outlying dominion. To what extent the Government of the United States in the progress of years might, by the single action of the Secretary of State, become involved in the affairs of foreign governments no human foresight could predict. If there were an opportunity to move to strike out this section I would then call attention to others which I consider equally objectionable. I am opposed to passing a bill containing so broad a power as this confers upon a consular officer and the Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. The gentleman from Illinois has six minutes remaining.

Mr. HITT. I desire to occupy only three minutes; the remaining three minutes I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Will the gentleman take his time now?

Mr. CURTIN. I will, and will ask the gentleman to notify me when the three minutes have expired.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill is not intended to acquire foreign property in foreign territories, or to establish new nationalities. It is intended essentially to protect, to foster, and to extend the trade and commerce of the people of the United States; to give our citizens in foreign countries the just protection they deserve.

Here on this floor I continually hear gentlemen say we need the extension of our commerce—we need new markets for our surplus products. This is an effort, sir, in that direction.

The gentleman has stated to you that out in these countries they put men to death without the form or semblance of law.

Now as to the question of the right to establish these courts and appoint all the officers provided under it, why our Government has exercised it from the very beginning—before the formation of the Constitution. There is scarcely anything in this bill new except that which goes to strengthen the hands of officials abroad for the protection of our people. It is merely the putting together of the various acts of legislation on this subject—digesting, arranging, codifying them into one bill. For years the subject has been under the consideration of Congress, of the Executive, of the State Department, and whatever is here provided has been on ample information from abroad and after most careful investigation of the law as it is. The bill was fully considered in the Senate Committee, unanimously reported, and was passed by that body. It has received the deliberate consideration of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, and that committee has unanimously recommended its passage to this House.

As I have said already, it is no new power; it is only an enlargement of the present powers for the purpose of protecting our citizens, as well as the interests and commerce of the country. If such legislation be required would it not be better to pass this bill rather than it should fail, and have a new bill commenced at the next session? It might be amended hereafter, and limited to suit gentlemen.

Mr. EATON. Read the last clause.

Mr. CURTIN. I will call the attention of the House to the last clause of the last section: "As to all other provisions, it shall take effect in six months from the approval of such code by the President."

Mr. HOLMAN. Very important powers are given to the courts.

Mr. CURTIN. I know there are. But if we are to secure trade and commerce, to extend the interests of American citizens in foreign countries, we must protect them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HITT. I will yield the remaining portion of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he desires it.

Mr. CURTIN. No; I am obliged to the gentleman, but I have said all I desire to.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] urged against this bill that it gave arbitrary and despotic power apparently over human life, and that the consul has the appointment of a jury of only three, and they not necessarily Americans, in certain possible cases which might arise under the bill. That may be true, but it is even worse as the law now stands. This bill is an effort to supply defects in the present law, a law which gives such enormous powers to the consul. By this measure he is required to have a jury, and in view of the small number of Americans there obtainable, the jury is to be of five men, and he must get them if he can. That is better than it is now when he passes on human life by himself—a man, too, it may be in some cases, who never read law, and who has perhaps one hundred American citizens doing business in the town where his office is located. The gentleman's fear of the eighteenth section, which might be used to found new governments, is simply to regulate and legalize the action of our consuls in barbarous places like the Samoan Islands, where all the consuls unite in a sort of municipal council to preserve order and have some sort of government. Their action in such cases has long been recognized by the Department of State.

It is true the bill is not absolutely perfect, but it is as perfect as can be made in its methods with the material that must be employed to procure juries. It is all in the direction of a limitation of arbitrary power. It is all in the direction of the protection of the lives and property of our citizens abroad from arbitrary dealings by the officers in charge. It aims to place power into the hands of those who are supposed to have knowledge and experience to enable them to exercise such powers in conformity with law and justice.

The code of general law, crimes, and punishments which is embodied in this bill—very brief it is true, and I wish it could have been more extensive—is necessary for a reason that I wonder should have escaped the acuteness of that gentleman; and that is, that our Federal laws do not and can not touch the most numerous and ordinary questions of municipal law, and the rights of our citizens in person and property which are governed by State laws. But this is not the case with reference to the English, French, Italians, and others whose whole body of law is one; and therefore this code is provided as a guide to our consuls, containing as it does the elementary principles of our law, so as to guide them with reference to those questions which may and probably will come before them under the operation of this bill.

Mr. MCADOO. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HITT. I hope the gentleman will excuse me, as I have but a moment. The defects or omissions of this bill, by a code which it expressly provides, shall be supplied by the Attorney-General and the Secretary of State, and before it goes into effect must be passed upon by this body.

Mr. MCADOO. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question in reference to this very subject of jury trial as provided in this bill.

Mr. HITT. I must decline to yield to an interruption, having but a very brief time to answer the arguments which have been made against the bill.

Mr. MCADOO. I will yield such time as I had left to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HITT. And as to the question of offices and their multiplication, the creation of new offices, especially the numerous marshals to which reference has been made, the gentleman should remember that those marshals already exist. They are now provided for the consulates under our present statutes, and this only provides that they shall aid these judicial officers in the exercise of their duty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 66 members voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 148, nays 104, not voting 71; as follows:

Mr. BAYNE. I object.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope that will be done.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE]. The Clerk will call the roll.

So the motion was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BAYNE, by unanimous consent the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. HURD with Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, on this vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. CHACE. I have no desire to antagonize the bill which gentlemen desire to have called up, or any other; but in order that the House may have an opportunity to express its feelings in regard to this matter, I now ask that unanimous consent be given for the consideration of the resolutions in regard to the death of the late Senator ANTHONY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent to take up for consideration at this time the resolutions received from the Senate in relation to the death of the late Senator ANTHONY.

Mr. SLOCUM. I object.

The SPEAKER, as the next committee in order for motions to suspend the rules, called the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOWRY. I move that the House take a recess till half past 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. Another committee has been called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] moves that the House take a recess until half past 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House take a recess until to-morrow morning will not the order in regard to the suspension of the rules continue?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I hope the recess will be taken, because I want to reach the education bill.

Mr. HAMMOND. How long will it continue, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Until the House adjourn, whether it be one day or three days.

Mr. WASHBURN. If it is in order, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to move to amend the motion for a recess so as to fix another hour?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move to amend by making the hour 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. MILLS. Is a motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER. The House has transacted no business since the motion to adjourn was rejected.

Mr. WELLBORN. Was not asking unanimous consent the transaction of business?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island asked unanimous consent, which was objected to.

Mr. WELLBORN. Was not that business?

The SPEAKER. It was objected to by a single member; not by any action of the House.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, is not the calling of the Committee on Military Affairs the transaction of business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. It is not the transaction of business by the House. The House has taken no action on any question since the motion to adjourn was rejected. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] to take a recess.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet the day after to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the Clerk to read the rule which states the order in which these motions can be made.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XVI.

4. When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, to take a recess, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motions shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a day certain, to refer or amend, or to postpone indefinitely.

The SPEAKER. The House will see that the motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn has precedence over the motion to adjourn, and also over the motion to take a recess. Therefore the motion, if made, to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, is in order.

Mr. MILLS. I move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker decided that by the sound the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MILLS. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 101, noes 85.

Mr. SLOCUM. I demand tellers.

Mr. BAYNE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 38 members voting in favor thereof; being more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 137, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—119.

Adams, G. E.	Eldredge,	Lewis,	Seney,
Alexander,	Ferrell,	Lovering,	Shively,

So the motion that the House adjourn was not agreed to.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. HOLTON, on this vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. MILLS. I move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. TALBOTT. And I move that when we adjourn to-day it be to meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. MILLS. That would be a recess.

Mr. TALBOTT. Very well; then I move a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a motion to adjourn over is not amendable by a motion to take a recess. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, that when the House shall adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. BAYNE. I make the point that the proposition is not in order, the same question having been already submitted to the House and voted down.

Mr. MILLS. But business has intervened since.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] makes the point of order that this motion is not in order, because it is precisely the same as one which the House has already refused to adopt.

Mr. MILLS. But under the rules of the House we may alternate indefinitely these two motions, first to adjourn, and then to fix a time to which the House shall adjourn.

The SPEAKER. But the point of order which the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes is that the motion of the gentleman from Texas is precisely the same motion which the House has already refused to adopt.

Mr. MILLS. But since that time the House has voted directly on a motion to adjourn, and that is intervening business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does not make the point that no business has intervened since this proposition was voted upon; he makes the point that the gentleman can not make precisely the same motion which the House has rejected.

Mr. MILLS. Why, sir, I stood here when those two motions were alternated at one time for about seventy hours.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that a motion to fix as the time to which the House shall adjourn precisely the same time to which the House has already refused to agree, is not in order.

Mr. WELLBORN. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that two hours ago the House had voted down a proposition to adjourn, and that now the identical motion should be repeated, does the Chair say that would not be in order?

The SPEAKER. That is a very different proposition. But the gentleman from Texas can reach precisely the same end which he seeks to accomplish by moving to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to make the order that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next. The motion to reconsider being in order, it is not in order to make over again the original motion.

Mr. MILLS. Then I make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. MILLS. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order that when the House adjourns to-day it will adjourn to meet on Wednesday next. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves to lay on the table the motion to reconsider; and on this question the gentleman from Texas calls for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. COX, of New York, there were—ayes 80, noes 65.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The point is made that no quorum has voted.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the point.

The SPEAKER. The point being withdrawn, the motion of the gentleman from New York is agreed to, and the motion to reconsider is laid on the table. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moves that the House adjourn.

Mr. KEIFER. If I can be allowed to make a suggestion, representing the friends—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to make a suggestion which I think will solve this whole question. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 20, 1885.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

JOHN P. JONES, a Senator from the State of Nevada, appeared in his seat to-day.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. COLQUITT presented the credentials of JOSEPH E. BROWN, chosen by the Legislature of Georgia a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1885; which were read and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a tracing of the plat of the preliminary survey of the unconfirmed private land claim No. 132, in the Territory of New Mexico, known as the Antonio de Salazar grant; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COKE. I present the petition of F. Barnard, R. M. Garrett, D. Tooke, W. H. Strahan, C. C. Herberts, J. G. Newsom, J. B. Stalyard,

W. J. Herbert, and others, of Colorado County, Texas, respecting a large amount of cotton said to have been seized in that county after the war by the authorities of the Government, for which they set up a claim. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of the judges of the supreme court of the Territories of Montana, Washington, Utah, Arizona, and Wyoming, praying for an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONGER. I present a petition of the American Association of the Red Cross, through its president, Miss Clara Barton, praying for a further print of a document which was ordered to be printed heretofore by the Senate, giving the history of the treaty arrangements between this and other governments in regard to the Red Cross Association, the edition of which has been entirely exhausted. A reprint is asked at this time because the Red Cross Associations of the United States have on exhibit at the New Orleans Exposition such things as belong to that association which are illustrative of its objects and uses. They have also been made the depository of all exhibits sent from similar organizations by the different governments of the Old World, as from Germany, England, and France. There is a great demand for this document to be distributed at the New Orleans Exposition, and all the numbers have been exhausted.

I ask that the petition may be printed in the RECORD, as it is brief, and that it be referred, with the document in question, to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the petition presented by him may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The petition is as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 1885.

SENATOR: Availing myself of your kind permission, I beg to present through you to the honorable body of which you are a member the following requests, namely:

That leave be given to extend the printing of the History of the Red Cross of Geneva to the number of 20,000 copies for general circulation among the people at the exposition of New Orleans, where that international and national organization will hold an exhibit.

Two thousand copies of this pamphlet were printed by order of Congress early in the spring of 1883. This copy is in stereotype at the Government Printing Office, and its reproduction will incur only the cost of material and labor of printing, which will be comparatively small.

As this pamphlet was printed at the request of the Senate, in order to inform the country of the adoption of the treaty of Geneva in 1882 by this Government, is largely official in character, and by its date can not contain the reports of the legitimate work performed by the national association acting under the treaty since that period, nor that of the international conference of last year, which information is earnestly sought for by the people, I would ask further that an appropriation of $5,000 be applied through the Government printing department for the purpose of bringing the history of the treaty of the Red Cross down to present date.

When I shall recall the facts that this association, in almost constant activity in the national relief work of the great calamities of the country, and, as we believe, performing its part with credit to the nation, draws nothing from the Government; that through four months' work in the floods of the Ohio and Mississippi of last year, running its relief boats side by side with those of the Government, not a dollar of the munificent appropriation made by your honorable body for that relief came to this association for distribution or otherwise, and that of the million and a half so generously and so well appropriated for the exposition at New Orleans still not a dollar has been passed to the use of this association; that the Red Cross must make its own exhibit and receive and care for the foreign Red Cross exhibits as well; that the $1,000 appropriated by Congress to print the history of the treaty of Geneva and the official relation of our Government to it is all the cost the organization has been to the Government; that the treaty was without cost to it, we feel warranted in believing that your honorable body will not unwillingly accord the favor we have dared to name.

CLARA BARTON,
President American Association Red Cross.

Hon. OMAR D. CONGER,
United States Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I should have said that although the petition is directed to me it is accompanied with a request that I shall present it to the Senate as a petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be so received and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HARRIS. I present the petition of Frank Rives and his brothers and sisters, praying that the Government may purchase what is known as the Congressional Globe building, in the city of Washington. As the building is used by the Public Printing Office, having been rented by the Government for some years, I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, Minn., praying such legislation as will result in the United States acquiring the title to the canals and waterways connecting Kewenaw Bay with the waters of Lake Superior, in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, Minn., representing that the appropriations for harbor improvements at Grand Haven, Ludington, and Manistee, in the State of Michigan, are inadequate to the needs of commerce passing through those ports, and praying for sufficient appropriations for such improvements; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Cigar-makers' Union of Saint Peters, Minn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SAWYER presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the purchase of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal, in the State of Michigan, and that it be opened to commerce; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a memorial of cigar-makers of Henderson, Ky., a memorial of cigar-makers of New York city, and a memorial of citizens of New York city, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Eureka, Cal., praying further appropriations for the improvement of the harbor of Humboldt Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present the memorial of Knights of Labor, District Assembly No. 66, of Washington, D. C., remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 2507) to amend the law concerning mechanics' liens in the District of Columbia. As it is a matter of importance, I move that the memorial be printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7857) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House returned to the Senate the bill (H. R. 1004) relative to the Chinese indemnity fund.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 12) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson;

A bill (S. 764) granting an increase of pension to Abby P. Arnold;

A bill (S. 929) granting a pension to Caroline Treckell; and

A bill (S. 5639) extending the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in Wyoming Territory.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 600) to refund internal-revenue tax illegally collected, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HARRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 692) for the relief of Michael Reynolds, to report it adversely, upon the ground that the relief which is asked for can be obtained under existing general legislation. I move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2509) to confirm titles to lands in certain cases, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2519) to declare valid the titles to certain lands sold by the land officers of the United States, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DOLPH. I give notice that on some morning in the near future I shall ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 7004) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands and the laws allowing entries for timber-culture. In this connection I will say that the bill as reported from the Senate Committee on Public Lands proposes material changes in the bill as it came from the House. Those changes are all explained in the printed report which has been laid on the desks of Senators. This being a House bill, the opportunity is offered to secure much-needed legislation in regard to laws for the disposition of public land, legislation which has been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office for years past. If that bill should pass the Senate, a measure just reported favorably, and some other measures of general importance which have been reported favorably, may be attached to it, if the Senate should concur in the judgment of the committee to so amend the bill of the House, and they would thus become a law.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 652) for the relief of Brannin, Summers & Co., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1628) granting a pension to Elizabeth Howard, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JACKSON. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1594) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth F. Asper, to submit an adverse report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. JACKSON. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 586) granting an increase of pension to Samuel S. Hite, to submit an adverse report thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to this report. I wish to know whether he desires that the bill shall be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1334) granting arrears of pension to Mary Ringgold Archer, widow of Robert H. Archer, deceased, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JACKSON. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2082) granting a pension to George W. Nokes, to submit an adverse report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri the bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SLATER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1654) granting a pension to Selinda E. Smith, to report it adversely. By request of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2576) to repeal section 840 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and a portion of section 839, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 6480) granting a pension to Margaret G. Halpine;

A bill (H. R. 3663) granting a pension to John T. Marshall; and

A bill (H. R. 4379) for the relief of Maj. W. W. Frybarger.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 5776) granting a pension to Louis D. Petty; and

A bill (H. R. 2399) granting a pension to Clarissa McKee.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6927) granting a pension to Merit M. Oakley, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1790) granting an increase of pension to Edgar L. Dutton, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 320) granting a pension to Kate Amann, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CULLOM. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2535) granting a pension to Mrs. Julia Hartley, to report it adversely.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5951) granting a pension to Abel J. Lewis, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2263) granting a pension to Abel J. Lewis, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4059) granting a pension to Isaac Demaranville, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2398) granting a pension to Cyrus Reeser, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

HEIRS OF CHARLES B. SMITH.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2543) for the relief of the heirs of Charles B. Smith, deceased, late a lieutenant in the Fifth Iowa Cavalry, to report it favorably without amendment. I am further instructed by the committee to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. It is simply to heal an incompleteness in an act of Congress passed June 8, 1880.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to close the subsistence and quartermaster's accounts upon the books of the Treasury of Charles B. Smith, deceased, late a first lieutenant in the Fifth Iowa Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

USES OF COAL IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HALE. Certain papers, accompanying the letter of the Secretary of the Navy of January 8, 1885, transmitting the report of the board of officers appointed to investigate and report upon the comparative merits of anthracite and bituminous coal for ordinary naval uses, were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, in order that that committee might examine and see what are needed to be printed. I now report them back, and ask that the documents accompanying the letter, together with the letter, be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Maine, with the accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on Printing. The rule requires such a reference.

Mr. HALE. I do not think that such a reference will be needed. It is not anything that will be beyond the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is competent for the Senate to order the printing without another reference. The rule requires that such motions shall be referred "unless otherwise ordered." If there be no objection, the question will be put on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine that the papers returned by him from the Committee on Naval Affairs be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANK OF BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7768) to authorize the National Bank of Bloomington, Ill., to change its name to the First National Bank of Bloomington, to report it favorably and without amendment. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is very anxious to have the bill acted upon at once, and, as it will take no more time than to read the bill, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. M. LOBBAN.

Mr. BECK. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report back favorably the bill (S. 2529) for the relief of J. M. Lobban. I do not know whether the Senate will grant unanimous consent to act upon the bill at present, but I should like to state why it ought to be done. The bill authorizes the issuing of a duplicate check, in place of one that was lost, above the amount where the Secretary of the Treasury can authorize it to be reissued. The officer who drew the check can not settle his accounts until this is done. The bank to which the check is payable was a national depository, but is no longer so; the funds have been transferred to Omaha, and its affairs can not be closed until the account is settled. For these reasons I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered now. I do not think it will take more than a moment.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments: in line 3 to strike out "War" and insert "the Treasury;" in line 8 to change the name to "James M. Lobban;" in line 11 to strike out "War" and insert "the Treasury;" in line 12 to change the name to "James M. Lobban;" and in line 14 to strike out "War" and insert "the Treasury;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, instructed to direct Maj. G. B. Dandy, quartermaster, United States Army, to issue duplicate check No. 20, for $4,608.50, dated April 26, 1884, in favor of James M. Lobban, on the the Stock-Growers' National Bank, Cheyenne, Wyo., in place of one lost on or about May 3, 1884: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be satisfied the same has not been paid: And provided further, That said James M. Lobban shall first execute a bond, with sureties to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury in due form, to save the United States harmless against any loss or injury by reason of such duplicate check or the payment of the original.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The report has been filed, I presume.

Mr. BECK. All the papers accompanying the bill have been sent to the desk.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is all right. The report ought to be printed so as to show the circumstances, as this is a case of the issuance of a duplicate check.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

The title was amended to read, "A bill for the relief of James M. Lobban."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that no report has been sent up with the papers accompanying the bill.

Mr. BECK. I have the report, which I will furnish to the Secretary. It is embodied in a single letter. I was ordered to write it this morning, but after carefully reading the letter I did not have time to copy it.

Mr. SHERMAN. There ought to be a report in all cases where duplicate checks are issued in order to have an accurate statement of the facts.

Mr. BECK. I will furnish a copy of the letter in the form of a report.

DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably with certain amendments the joint resolution (S. R. 104) providing for the printing and distribution of the Descriptive Catalogue of Government Publications. I wish to state that this material, ordered to be compiled by former Congresses, is now ready for the Printer. It is considered a very important publication, and I am directed by the committee to ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were: in line 5, to strike out "5,780" and insert "6,600;" in line 21, to add the letter "s" to the word "it;" in line 22, after the word "Office," to insert:

Eight hundred and eighteen copies to be delivered to the Secretary of the Interior for distribution to such libraries not depositories of public documents as shall be named for this purpose by each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress.

And in line 27, after the word "Institution," to insert:

Two copies for the Government Printing Office.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

That there be printed and half-bound in leather, with the exception of the reserve sets, which shall be full-bound in leather, 6,600 copies of the Descriptive Catalogue of Government Publications, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate; 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; 4 copies for the library of the Senate; 12 copies for the library of the House; 60 copies, 50 of which shall be for foreign exchanges, for the Library of Congress; 2 copies for the library of the Executive Mansion; 40 copies for the Department of State; a copy to be sent to each legation of the United States abroad; 25 copies for the Treasury Department, including its bureaus; 20 copies for the War Department, including 1 for the library of the Military Academy at West Point; 20 copies for the Navy Department, including 1 for the library of the Naval Academy at Annapolis, and 1 copy for the Naval Observatory at Washington; 25 copies for the Department of the Interior, including its bureaus, the Railroad Commission, the Geological Survey, and the Census Office; 818 copies to be delivered to the Secretary of the Interior for distribution to such libraries not depositories of public documents as shall be named for this purpose by each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress; 10 copies for the Post-Office Department and its bureaus; 10 copies for the Department of Justice, including a copy for the library of the Supreme Court and a copy for the library of the Court of Claims; 2 copies for the Department of Agriculture; 2 copies for the Smithsonian Institution; 2 copies for the Government Printing Office; 1,000 copies to be bound and distributed with the reserved documents; and 50 copies for the use of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, to be distributed among those who have aided in the compilation of the work.

SEC. 2. That the Public Printer shall print 500 additional copies of the above-named work, to be half-bound in leather, and sold at 10 per cent. advance on cost price to any person applying for the same, a notice stating the price to be inserted at least once a week in the daily edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD until the edition shall have been disposed of.

SEC. 3. That all provisions of law under which any additional copies of the above-named work might be printed are, so far as they apply to the above-named work, repealed.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. There is no provision, I think, in the joint resolution for distribution to the libraries of the different States and Territories, and if it pleases the Senator I shall move in the first section to provide that one copy shall be delivered to each library of the respective States and Territories.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will state for the information of the Senator from Michigan that that is already provided for in the joint resolution. The provision with reference to reserved documents, over a thousand in number, is for that purpose.

Mr. CONGER. If that is so, I have no more to say. I noticed that omission, as I thought.

Mr. MANDERSON. The joint resolution is carefully guarded. I will state further that it carefully guards against cases of omission. It is carefully provided, and I think will meet all cases.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 17th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 1432) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS introduced a bill (S. 2563) granting a pension to Eliza Francesco; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAYARD introduced a bill (S. 2564) relating to improved signal side lights for sail vessels under way in the inland and lake waters; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2565) to change the limit of appropriation for the public building at Terre Haute, Ind.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 2566) to provide for the sale of the United States court-house at Boston, Mass.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PORTRAITS OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of purchasing 1,000 copies of the work entitled "The Portraits of Washington," by Elizabeth Bryant Johnson, for distribution to the public libraries of the country.

COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORTATION ROUTES.

Mr. ALDRICH. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard be authorized to sit during this session of Congress, by a subcommittee or otherwise, with the same authority given the committee under resolution of July 5, 1884.

Mr. INGALLS. What was that resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. A resolution authorizing and directing the committee to collect certain statistics in regard to the cost of transportation; practically a continuation of the Windom report published in 1873.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LANDS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PLUMB submitted the following resolution, and asked for its present consideration:

Whereas the United States in 1866 acquired from the Creek and Seminole Indians, by treaty, certain lands situate in the Indian Territory, a portion of which have remained unoccupied until the present time; and

Whereas a widely extended belief exists that such unoccupied lands are public lands of the United States, and as such subject to homestead and pre-emption settlement, and pursuant to such belief a large number of citizens of the United States have gone upon them claiming the right to settle and acquire title thereto under the general land laws of the United States; and

Whereas it is understood that the President of the United States does not regard said lands as open to settlement, and believes it to be his duty to remove all persons who go upon the same claiming the right to settle thereon, and for that purpose has directed the expulsion of the persons now on said lands by the use of military force, and there seems to be a probability of a conflict growing out of the attempt to expel said persons so claiming right and attempting to settle: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to advise the Senate as to the status of the lands in question as viewed by the Executive, the action taken, if any, to expel persons seeking to settle thereon, and the reason for the same, together with any other information in his possession bearing upon the existing controversy.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have that printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent to have this resolution now considered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have it go over for a day so that we may see it in print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over until to-morrow and be printed.

WASHINGTON WATER-SUPPLY.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General is hereby directed to report to the Senate whether any of the claimants of lands taken by the Government under the act of Congress passed July 15, 1882, for increasing the water-supply of the city of Washington remain unpaid, and what obstacle, if any, exists that prevents payment for lands taken for the purpose in said act provided.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7857) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 1004) relative to the Chinese indemnity fund. A bill of that number passed the House of Representatives and was sent to the Senate. Afterward, on request of the House of Representatives, it was returned to the House. Apparently the same bill is again returned to the Senate with one word in it changed. The Chair thinks it must be treated now as an original bill, it not being the same bill that was read twice before. The Chair therefore lays it before the Senate as an original bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 1004) relative to the Chinese indemnity fund was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the passage of the following order:

Ordered, That there be printed, for the use of the Senate, 1,000 copies of Senate bill No. 1820 to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, as passed by the Senate December 9, 1884, and by the House of Representatives, without amendment, January 14, 1885, and that the said copies be furnished to the Senate document-room.

There is a great demand from all parts of the country for a copy of the French spoliation bill as passed by the two Houses, and I have introduced this order and ask for its present consideration in order that Senators may have these copies to send out.

The order was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I should like in connection with that same subject to introduce for reference to the Committee on Printing a resolve that 5,000 extra copies of the communication of the Secretary of State giving a list of the spoliation claimants be printed. If the Secretary will take that down, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. HAWLEY. Allow me to ask the Senator how much of a document that is?

Mr. HOAR. It is a document twice as big as that [exhibiting]. I presume one hundred pages will cover it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will repeat his resolution so that the Secretary may take it down.

Mr. HOAR. I will change the number to 3,000 and offer the resolution in this form:

Resolved, That 3,000 additional copies of the communication of the Secretary of State, containing a list of claimants against France by reason of spoliations committed prior to 1801, be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY. My object in making the inquiry was to suggest to the Senator from Maine whether, as these things will both be called for, it might not be as well to put the act in with that pamphlet. The act is not very long.

Mr. HALE. My object only was to answer the needs for a few days. After the bill has become a law undoubtedly there will be a larger number printed than I have called for here, and then I should think it would be very proper that all of these lists should go with it.

Mr. HOAR. I propose to refer my resolution to the Committee on Printing; and that committee will report a resolution to print the bill with it, I presume.

Mr. HALE. My resolution went through, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 3,000 additional copies of the communication of the Secretary of State, containing a list of claimants against France by reason of the spoliations prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, be printed.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. PIKE. I desire unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 1501, Order of Business 736, for the purpose of moving its recommitment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1501) for the relief of Robert Strachan, John H. Johnson, Samuel M. Bryan, George Combs, Annie Botts, and George A. Hawkins, with the object, as he states, of moving its recommitment to the Committee on the District of Columbia. If there be no objection the bill will be considered before the Senate for that purpose. The Chair hears none. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY INSPECTOR-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to take up Order of Business 904, being House bill 1017.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1017) relative to the Inspector-General's Department of the Army.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). There is. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SEWELL July 2, 1884, down to the portion of the report which embodies the report of the House committee:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1017) in relation to the Inspector-General's Department of the Army, respectfully report:

The Inspector-General's Department is constituted, under existing law, as follows:

One senior inspector-general with the rank of brigadier-general; one inspector-general with the rank of colonel; one assistant inspector-general with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; two assistant inspectors-general with the rank of major.

The present bill proposes to reorganize the department as follows: One Inspector-General, with rank, pay, and emoluments of brigadier-general; two inspectors-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonel; two inspectors-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonel; and two inspectors-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of major.

This increases the number of inspectors-general of the Army by two.

The number of officers, in addition to those now belonging to this department, which has been needful to detail for the performance of the necessary duties of the department, is given in the letter, hereto appended, of the Acting Adjutant-General of the Army.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, July 1, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, inclosing a copy of a bill (H. R. 1017) to reorganize the Inspector-General's Department of the Army, and requesting information as to the officers now detailed as inspectors, &c., and to state in reply that there are four officers regularly detailed as acting assistant inspectors-general under the act of Congress approved June 23, 1874, namely, Lieut. Col. E. C. Mason, Fourth Infantry, in the Department of the Platte; Capt. Thomas Ward, First Artillery, in the Department of the East; Capt. R. P. Hughes, Third Infantry, in the Department of Dakota; Capt. J. B. Russell, Ninth Infantry, in the Department of the Missouri.

In addition to these the following-named officers are on inspection duty, though not regularly detailed as acting assistant inspectors-general: Lieut. Col. H. M. Lazelle, Twenty-third Infantry, in the Department of California; Maj. A. K. Arnold, Sixth Cavalry, in the Department of Arizona; Maj. S. S. Sumner, Eighth Cavalry, in the Department of Texas.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHAUNCEY McKEEVER,
Acting Adjutant-General.

Hon. WILLIAM J. SEWELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

It will be seen by the foregoing communication that there is one lieutenant-colonel and three captains of the line doing duty, under regular detail, with the department, in addition to which there are three field officers on temporary detail.

The Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives made a report on this bill, and were in favor of permanently increasing the number of officers in this department to a number sufficient for the performance of all its duties without making details from the line of the Army.

Mr. SEWELL. It is not necessary to read the full House report. Let the Secretary read the conclusions of our committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey asks that the report of the House Committee be omitted from the reading of the report.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the report of the Senate Committee contain all the facts that appear in the report of the House committee?

Mr. SEWELL. Yes; only in a much more concise manner.

Mr. INGALLS. That is satisfactory.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading, as follows:

The committee are of the opinion that, in view of the necessity for a strict investigation and inspection of all the accounts appertaining to the administration of the Army, besides the ordinary military duties of the inspectors-general, that the increase proposed in this department is necessary to the service, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, is now in order. The first case will be reported.

The bill (S. 1420) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States, was announced as first in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill has been laid aside informally heretofore to await the return of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN]. That will be considered as the order to-day.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

The bill (S. 1886) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill having been objected to was taken up by vote of the Senate, and is now pending, free from the five minutes' limitation of debate.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] is absent to-day, and he requested that this bill be passed over for the day without prejudice, retaining its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks that this bill be passed over, retaining its place upon the Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. PLUMB. I rise to inquire if that changes it from the position it is in now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. PLUMB. I will not object to the bill going over to-day, the Senator calling my attention to the fact that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], who desires to discuss the bill, is absent to-day. I have no objection therefore to the bill going over as requested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to say that, if the Senator from Arkansas is not here to-morrow, I shall make a motion to send the bill over again, because this whole subject was under his special charge in the Judiciary Committee, and there are very important considerations involved.

Mr. PLUMB. No one would go further than I to meet any wish of the Senator from Arkansas, or the Senator from New York, or any other Senator on this floor. But this bill is in somewhat of a chronic condition. It ought to be passed, or the Senate ought to say that it will not pass it, at a very early day. The Senator from New York is posted in regard to all that has preceded it, all the circumstances surrounding it, and can enlighten the Senate, I have no doubt, as well as any one on the subject. While I am willing to have the bill go over to-day, I do not wish by silence to seem to acquiesce in any suggestion that it may go over any other day if the convenience of the Senate should be consistent with its coming up.

Mr. LAPHAM. We shall see what a day will bring forth.

FRAUDULENT ISSUE OF PASSPORTS.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move to take up Order of Business

519, being the bill (S. 2098) to amend section 4078 of the Revised Statutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the Calendar the Senator from California moves to take up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I know the motion made by the Senator from California is not debatable, but I hope no one will object while I say that I sincerely hope the Senate will go on with the Calendar. I presume the bill to which he refers is a meritorious bill, but it has its place on the Calendar and will be acted upon when reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must remind Senators that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I object to the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves that the bill named by him be taken up. The question is on that motion.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The title of the bill does not explain anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section of the Revised Statutes referred to will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 9.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Although this is an important bill and ought to be passed at once, I will not insist on it now as there is objection made to it, and I do not wish to break up a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn. The Chair is satisfied that a quorum is present and will proceed with business unless objection is made.

RAILROAD MAIL TRANSPORTATION.

The bill (S. 1450) for the readjustment of compensation for the transportation of the mails on railroad routes was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. That can not be considered under this rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the bill is objected to and it goes over.

JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT JUSTICES.

The bill (S. 880) to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and to regulate proceedings before them, was announced as next in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill has been read in full and the amendments of the Committee on the District of Columbia have been agreed to. The bill is still open to amendment. The Chair is informed that one amendment has been once acted upon but has been reconsidered. It will be now read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 4, the Committee on the District of Columbia reported an amendment to insert after the word "dollars" the words:

Nor unless the appellant enters into an undertaking, with sufficient surety, approved by the justice, to pay and satisfy whatever final judgment may be recovered in the appellate court, and costs.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That no appeal shall be allowed from the judgment of a justice of the peace in any common-law action unless the matter in demand in such action or pleaded in set-off thereto shall exceed the sum of $20, nor unless the appellant enters into an undertaking, with sufficient surety, approved by the justice, to pay and satisfy whatever final judgment may be recovered in the appellate court, and costs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon this amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER subsequently moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and the motion to reconsider was entered.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The joint resolution (S. Res. 19) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the joint resolution will be passed over.

GABRIEL NEUDECKER'S PATENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1417) to enable Martrom D. Lewis, public administrator of the city of Saint Louis, in the county of Saint Louis and State of Missouri, having charge of the estate of Gabriel Neudecker, deceased, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of letters patent No. 70012, for a process of preparing tobacco, granted October 22, 1867, to said Gabriel Neudecker, deceased.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is there a report accompanying that bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLATT March 28, 1884:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred Senate bill 1417, to empower the Commissioner of Patents to extend letters patent numbered 70012, granted to Gabriel Neudecker, October 22, 1867, to Martrom D. Lewis, administrator of said Neudecker, deceased, respectfully report:

That they have duly considered said bill and the reasons in its support, adopt as their report the following report of the House Committee on Patents made thereon, and recommend the passage of the bill:

"On the 22d day of October, 1867, letters patent No. 70012, for an improvement in process of preparing tobacco, were granted to Gabriel Neudecker, of Richmond, Va.

"It appears from the memorial in this case, which is sworn to by the widow of the said Neudecker, that he was engaged in experimenting and developing the invention, for which said patent was granted, during the years of 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, and a part of 1867. The value of his labor during such period is estimated as reasonably worth $1,000 per annum, making a total of $5,000. It further shows that the inventor expended in materials not less than $350; that he paid out for hired assistance not less than $800; that he consumed and wasted tobacco amounting in value to not less than $350; that he paid the Government fees required by law for a patent, namely, $35; and that he paid out, in the way of professional fees, about $50. These several sums aggregate $6,685, expended in money and time on account of the said invention.

"It also appears, from the sworn memorial, that after the patent issued in October, 1867, the patentee used the process covered thereby in Richmond, Va., in the works of Neudecker Brothers, with which firm he was then connected. This user of the invention continued for about one year, when a failure of that firm, in November, 1868, terminated such user.

"The profits derived from this user of the invention are set down as not exceeding from $400 to $600. Allowing that $600 was the actual gain derived therefrom during this period, it thus appears that $6,085 have been expended in time and money on the invention in excess of the profits derived therefrom.

"It also appears from this sworn memorial that Neudecker was taken sick in 1869; that he moved from Richmond, Va., to Baltimore, Md., where he resided for about a year, when he moved to Saint Louis, Mo.

"At this latter place he and his family were, in the main, supported by relatives, he continuing in sickness and gradually declining, until he met his death in January, 1877, in consequence of consumption. He left a wife, Elizabeth, and four children, unprovided for.

"It is averred that in consequence of this long sickness and the financial condition of Neudecker the patent was not further introduced.

"So far, the facts in this case are strongly in favor of the prayer of the memorial. It appears, from a number of affidavits filed with the papers, that the invention is of great practical value, and that it is a benefit to the consumer, the tobacco laborer, and the manufacturer.

"Two hundred and eighty-one citizens, from several States, have signed petitions strongly urging the passage of this bill.

"In view of these facts, and the further fact that no opposition has appeared against the passage of the bill in question, your committee favorably recommend the same."

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am unable to see any reason why this patent should be extended from the facts stated in the report. However, I have no special feeling in regard to it, and shall content myself with voting against the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPORTIONMENT OF IDAHO TERRITORY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1021) to authorize the reapportionment of the Territory of Idaho into council and representative districts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill has been read and certain amendments reported by the Committee on Territories have been agreed to, and one is still pending. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 3, the Committee on Territories report, before the word "Monday," to strike out "first" and insert "fifth;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That the members constituting such board of apportionment shall assemble at the capital of said Territory and complete their work on or before the fifth Monday in September, 1884.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I wish that that bill may be laid aside informally for a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over informally for the present, if there be no objection.

CITIZENS' BANK OF LOUISIANA.

The bill (S. 85) for the relief of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana was announced as next in order.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That had better be laid over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is objected to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let it go over.

RAILROAD TO KEY WEST.

The bill (S. 779) for a survey and estimates for a railroad from the mainland to Key West, Fla., and for a canal connecting the same with the Saint John's River, for military and naval purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is reported adversely. I object to it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let it go on the other Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made and the bill goes over.

MINA M. GWYNN.

The bill (S. 1360) giving a pension to Mina M. Gwynn, of Kansas City, Mo., was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that go on the other Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, and the next bill reported adversely will be passed over in the same way.

TENEDORE TEN EYCK.

The bill (S. 1300) to authorize the President to restore Tenedore Ten Eyck to his former rank in the Army, and to place him upon the retired-list of Army officers, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over, objection being made.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that that bill hold its place under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill just mentioned may retain its place on the Calendar. Does the Senator from Missouri object?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection being made, the bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

JOHN G. ROSE.

The bill (S. 717) for the relief of John G. Rose was announced as next in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

TEXAS AND INDIAN TERRITORY BOUNDARY.

The bill (S. 1947) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRISON. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. This is a Senate bill that is now reached as Order of Business 465. Order of Business 633 is a House bill on the same subject; and if this bill is disposed of, that bill should be called up in connection with it.

Mr. VEST. I call the attention of the Senator from Texas to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read, unless objection is made.

Mr. HARRISON. I do object to that bill. We have on the Calendar, at Order of Business 633, a House bill on this same subject, and if any legislation is to be had it ought to be the House bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let this go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill being objected to goes over.

Mr. HARRISON. I am entirely willing that the friends of the measure shall substitute the House bill for consideration. That would be the right thing to do.

Mr. VEST. So far as I am personally concerned I should prefer to have the House bill taken up. The Senator from Texas who is now absent [Mr. MAXEY] requested that the bill should not come up in his absence.

Mr. HARRISON. Let it go over informally without losing its place.

Mr. COKE. I ask that the bill go over informally until to-morrow, my colleague being now absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over informally, retaining its place under Rule VIII.

W. H. TIBBITS.

The bill (S. 2004) for the relief of W. H. Tibbits was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that it appears from the records of the General Land Office that W. H. Tibbits did, in good faith, on the 4th of January, 1872, make homestead entry of the northeast quarter of section 21, township 9 north, range 11 east, in the State of Nebraska, and resided thereon for the full period of time required by existing statutes, and improved and cultivated the same; and that the same tract was patented to the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad at a time subsequent to the homestead entry, and sold by the railroad company to other parties.

The bill proposes to authorize W. H. Tibbits to locate one hundred and sixty acres of surveyed land which may be subject to pre-emption entry, his right not to be assignable, or to make homestead entry, without residence or payment of fee or commissions, for one hundred and sixty acres of land subject to such entry; or, if Tibbits shall make application to the Secretary of the Interior within one year, the Secretary may make payment to him in cash, at the rate of $2.50 per acre, for the number of acres of lands embraced in his canceled homestead entry, in full satisfaction of his rights and claims, in the same manner as in cases of repayment under existing laws.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Senator who reported the bill whether that limits the new location to the State in which the entry was made.

Mr. PLUMB. It does not limit it to the State.

Mr. CONGER. I think it should. In the proper place—I can not tell where it is from merely hearing the bill read—I shall move to amend by providing that the new location shall be within the State of Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan proposes an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. CONGER. The Secretary will find the proper place to insert it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please restate it.

Mr. CONGER. It is:

That such new location shall be on public lands within the State of Nebraska.

Mr. VAN WYCK. What is the point of the amendment? The bill refers to a homestead claim on Government lands, free from objections which have been heretofore made to issuing scrip. Why should it be limited to Nebraska? It would seem to be an act of injustice to restrict it to Nebraska.

Mr. CONGER. The objection to a general clause is that it makes it floating scrip.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. CONGER. It would be like the Valentine scrip. I oppose giving permission to anybody to go around and hunt up lands in an old-settled State, and in the hearts of villages pick out land that by mistake has not been properly disposed of, and locate on it under such provisions as this. In Nebraska, a new State, there is no objection to that, perhaps; but I have seen great wrong done by such scrip being located on lands. In my own county a man had lived twenty-five years on a tract of forest land, made a home, expended the labor of himself and family for twenty-five years in making that home, and it came out finally that by virtue of a grant by Congress of swamp lands the land had become State land; and this gentleman with his family, the State selling the land, was driven from his home by the decree of the United States court, with the patent of the United States in his hand to the land paid for twenty-five years before. He was without remedy. I tried in vain in the House, and my friends did in the Senate, to give some relief to a man who, with the patent of the United States in his hand, was driven from his home and from his land.

Such kind of opportunities of seizing upon land that has some defect in the title occur all over the older Western States, and this is another class which might be located as land-scrip on school lands. I think there should be a guard against permitting that class of rights of location or selection.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There may have been injustice in denying relief in the case to which the Senator refers, but that is no reason why justice should be denied in this case. Undoubtedly settlers are those who suffer most at the hands of the Government. They lose their homesteads, and when they lose them they lose all. They have no chance against a large railroad corporation or even a small one; and, therefore, it becomes a matter of absolute necessity, in order to do stern justice between the Government and its citizens, to grant relief in cases of this kind. There is no hardship in doing it.

This man years ago located his claim, but it was taken away from him by a railroad company. He located under the authority of the land officers of the General Government. He merely asks now the privilege to enter the public domain and occupy a quarter-section and become the owner of one hundred and sixty acres. The right conveyed by this bill is not assignable. It is a mere personal right. There is no reason why the claimant should be restricted to Nebraska any more than a citizen of Michigan should be restricted to Michigan. True, Nebraska is young in years, but her agricultural land is exhausted to-day; and when you give him land there you give him nothing; all the agricultural land is taken up, and he is driven to the arid lands, which now are almost valueless except by the expenditure of a large sum of money. He is in the situation to-day of a humble homesteader who has been robbed by an agent of the Government, and he seeks the mere privilege, which is all the bill proposes to give him, for himself to go and occupy and make himself a home, and as I have said before, his interest under this bill is not assignable.

Mr. CONGER. I have spoken on the amendment, and with the leave of the Chair I will now speak to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule limits the Senator to one five minutes, the Chair thinks.

Mr. CONGER. Upon each question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. CONGER. I reserved my right by saying that I would speak to the bill now, and not to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the question before the Senate; but the Chair hears no objection, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. CONGER. In regard to the bill which I had presented in behalf of one of my own people, the Senator from Nebraska, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and every one of the gentlemen who have recommended the passage of this bill, and every other Senator on this floor, so far as I could get their opinions, either publicly expressed or by their votes, refused to consider that extreme case of hardship where the bill proposed merely provided for the right of selection.

Now, this man had a homestead and was driven from it. I propose that he may select other land in the same State of Nebraska. It is ridiculous for the Senator from Nebraska to pretend or intimate before this august assembly, or in the hearing of the world, that it is possible that any Nebraska citizen could be tempted to go to any other of the inferior States to find a home after he has once lived in the State which the Senator from Nebraska so ably represents; and I am afraid, in his desire to show his love for his State and its institutions and its people, he will unwittingly find that he has overstepped the mark and lost some things that he has gained by a consistent, continual, bold, and heroic opposition to all corporations and all interests except that of the dear people of his State. I warn him against losing the advantages he has acquired by so much labor and so much pains.

Mr. PLUMB. This bill does touch upon a class of cases which has attracted a good deal of attention and probably has received as little consideration at the hands of Congress as any other that has in any way been brought to their attention.

The facts in this case, as they were found by the committee, are that Mr. Tibbits went upon a piece of land shown upon the Government plats at the proper land office to be Government land; that he received besides the assurance of the officers of the land office that it was Government land and subject to pre-emption entry. He made valuable improvements upon it, and lived there for a number of years. The improvements he put upon the land were probably worth more than the land itself at any time up to the time when he was evicted. It is not worse nor harder in its aspects than the case the Senator from Michigan has announced or many others that have come under my attention. I have given a great deal of thought to this question as to what the Government should do to meet what I consider to be its fair obligation in regard to persons who have been misled by its officers into entering upon the public domain and who have afterward been put off by reason of what was then found to be the superior claim of a railroad company. But so far as I have been able to give the matter attention, I have not arrived at any conclusion as to general legislation which it would be proper to enter upon. The committee, therefore, has taken up the cases as they have come and dealt with them as separate cases.

I do not remember the case that the Senator from Michigan has spoken of. I do not think that it was brought to my attention or that I in any wise opposed legislation in behalf of the person he mentions. But whether I did or not, this case I think has merit in it, and should receive the favorable consideration of the Senate.

The committee in reporting this bill inserted words in the fifth line which, as they thought, take this right out of the category of all the scrip which the Senator has so justly anathematized, and puts this party in a class by himself. This right of his is not assignable. He is simply authorized to locate one hundred and sixty acres of surveyed land which may be subject to pre-emption entry, and the right is not to be assignable. Consequently he can not receive a paper from the Land Office, or a piece of scrip which he may transfer to any one else by delivery or by assignment or otherwise, and this transaction therefore has no relation, as I think, to the scrip which has been issued under various acts of Congress and which has gone into the market and been sold and used for the purposes which the Senator from Michigan has very justly characterized.

We simply give to this party the right to take one hundred and sixty acres of land, and by reason of the fact that he has already lived on one hundred and sixty acres of land the requisite time under the law, and made the requisite improvements upon it, and paid the requisite fees, and done everything he could to acquire a perfect title, and did it in good faith, and did it relying upon the representations made to him by the Government officers, we thought he might very properly be relieved from the necessity of making any further settlement, or of paying any further fees in the completion of an entry of one hundred and sixty acres of land, which should, in some measure at least, be compensation to him for the loss sustained by reason of the misrepresentations of the Government officials on which he relied.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator allow me a word? With that explanation and this being but one case and not a general law, I withdraw the amendment which I offered to the bill. I can see some reason why there would not be the injury in this case that there might be from scrip, the right not being assignable and there being but one individual provided for in the bill. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

TEXAS AND INDIAN TERRITORY BOUNDARY.

Mr. MAXEY. Order of Business 465, being the bill (S. 1947) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas was informally passed over on account of my momentary absence. I ask that that bill be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill referred to will now be taken up, having been passed over informally a few minutes ago.

Mr. MAXEY. I want to make a motion in that case. Order of Business 633 on the Calendar, being House bill 1655, relates to exactly the same subject-matter as Senate bill 1947. I ask that the House bill be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the House bill relating to the same subject-matter as the pending bill will now be taken up.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1565) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Territories was to strike out all after the title of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert:

Whereas the treaty between the United States and Spain executed February 22, 1819, fixed the boundary line between the two countries west of the Mississippi River as follows: Beginning on the Gulf of Mexico at the mouth of the Sabine River, in the sea, and continuing north along the western bank of that river to the thirty-second degree of latitude; thence by a line due north to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Nachitoches or Red River; thence following the course of the Rio Roxo westward to the one hundredth degree of longitude west from London and the twenty-third from Washington; thence crossing the said Red River and running thence by a line due north to the river Arkansas; thence following the course of the southern bank of the Arkansas to its source in latitude 42 degrees north; and thence by that parallel of latitude to the South Sea; the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818; and

Whereas a controversy exists between the United States and Texas as to the point where the one hundredth degree of longitude crosses the Red River, as described in the treaty; and

Whereas the point of crossing has never been ascertained and fixed by any authority competent to bind the United States and Texas; and

Whereas it is desirable that a settlement of this controversy should be had, to the end that the question of boundary, now in dispute because of a difference of opinion as to said crossing, may also be settled: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to detail one or more officers of the Army who, in conjunction with such person or persons as may be appointed by the State of Texas, shall ascertain and mark the point where the one hundredth meridian of longitude crosses Red River, in accordance with the terms of the treaty aforesaid; and the person or persons appointed by virtue of this act shall make report of his or their action in the premises to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall transmit the same to Congress at the next session thereof after such report may be made for action by Congress.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the War Department, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of the United States in carrying out the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. MAXEY. I ask unanimous consent that we be permitted to continue the consideration of this bill until we get through with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will first announce the order of business and then put the question on the Senator's request.

The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 5461) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed with the bill which was under consideration at the close of the morning hour.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator from Illinois that this is a very important bill to settle a matter which ought to be settled promptly, and I do not think it will require five minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. CULLOM. If the bill will only take a few minutes for its disposition I shall not stand in the way of it. I hope it will not take long, and I will reserve the right to call up the unfinished business at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be passed over informally, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of House bill 1565.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to say in a very few words that the bill as it passed the House was the result of very mature consideration, and is in substance and essence the bill which at a former Congress passed the Senate without objection and without a dissenting voice. The House bill was referred to the Committee on Territories of the Senate, who reported it with a substitute; but in the mean time the same committee had reported Senate bill 1947, being No. 465 in the order of business, which is in terms the same as the House bill. Now, my purpose is to have the bill of the House passed, so as to get the survey made between Texas and the territory of the United States, and I will state that the House bill pursues the precedents, as I know, from 1823 without a single break, the precedents in the cases between the State of Georgia and the Territory of Florida, the State of Louisiana and the Territory of Arkansas, the State of Illinois and the Territory of Michigan. Beginning in 1823, there is not a single break in that bill from the precedents. The only object of the bill is to carry out the unfinished work contemplated by the act of 1858, a part of the boundary having been defined, but the rest was not done, and it is important to the United States and important to Texas that that boundary should be settled.

Mr. CONGER. The Committee on Territories in charge of this bill objected to the House bill on two points, and it could not have been reported by that committee with the feelings there entertained. One objection was that by the bill the boundary line between the Indian Territory and the State of Texas would be determined by the proposed commission; the landmarks determining which branch of the Red River, or what was the Red River, would be fixed by a commission without further action by Congress, and that it would be fixed by a commission consisting of the same number of persons appointed by the President of the United States and by one of the parties in interest, the State of Texas.

That objection, to my mind, was insuperable. The Government itself may make the proper inquiry. It is capable of ascertaining what the terms of the treaty mean, as far as they depend upon a survey and examination and the construction of the language in the treaty, independently of any joint commission between the State of Texas and the United States. It savors a little too much, without any umpire, of putting a party interested on one side to decide a question in his own favor, which I think is objectionable, and I think it is unnecessary.

On these two points—first, that one of the parties in interest is to have an equal voice in the decision, and next, that the final result is to be determined by the commission without reference again to Congress—the committee thought that the House bill was objectionable. We considered that the only matter to be settled was the geographical question as to the point mentioned in the treaty and designed to be the guiding point where the particular degree of longitude crossed the Red River, and by questions which have arisen since there is a dispute as to what stream, in the view of the treaty and of those who made the treaty, is to be considered the Red River for the purpose of ascertaining this crossing.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Territories, the chairman of the committee not being present, I will state is tentative. It is to ascertain by all the means which a commission might have—the treaty, correspondence, maps, views, anything that throws light on the question—which of two or three particular streams is referred to in the treaty, that region then being comparatively unexplored or somewhat unexplored. The result is to be reported to the Secretary of War, and by him, with all the information obtained, to be reported to Congress. I think that is the proper way in which the bill should pass, if it pass at all.

The Government of the United States has set apart a portion of this territory as an Indian territory for the benefit of tribes which are the wards of the United States; and there should certainly be the same care and watchfulness in regard to the territory appropriated to the Indians as if it was a neighboring Territory or State. For myself I should be unwilling to vote for the bill as it came from the House, but I am willing to support the amendment as reported by the Committee on Territories.

I regret that the chairman of the Committee on Territories, who investigated this subject more particularly, is not present to state in addition to what I have said the reasons which influenced the committee.

Mr. MAXEY. As I said before, the bill as it came from the House once before, on the report of this very committee, passed the Senate unanimously. The same bill in substance and essence as it came from the House was at the last session reported by the same committee without dissent, so far as I know, by the Senator from Missouri, and stands on the Calendar to-day. Subsequently the House bill came over, and after the House bill came over for the first time in this body the substitute now proposed by the committee was offered. Now, I say this to the Senator, so far from wanting the slightest privilege, all I ask or desire is that the line between the territory of the United States and the territory of Texas be fairly and honestly ascertained and found. When the Senator states that one of the parties in interest, to wit, Texas, is represented on the commission, I only reply that both parties in interest are represented on the commission, because on one side of the one hundredth degree of west longitude Texas has an interest, and on the other side the United States. The precedents which I consulted in drawing the bill were all the precedents from 1823 down. But as I see the Senator from Michigan thinks there is some advantage somewhere, I will withdraw my objection to the substitute and permit that to be adopted by the Senate, because I know that this thing ought to be settled some way, and I would rather have a settlement by the substitute, which is not as good as the bill, than have no settlement at all. Therefore I withdraw any objection I have to the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, reported by the Committee on Territories.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Let the title be read. It ought to be amended.

The Secretary read the title, as follows:

To authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last clause.

Mr. MAXEY. I can not see the point in that. If a line is to be run, if a commission is appointed on behalf of the United States and of the State of Texas, which is a fact, as the whole bill shows, why not state the fact in the title? The title recites the fact that commissioners on the part of the United States and of Texas are joined in the matter.

Mr. CONGER. But the amendment of the committee does not provide for a commission from Texas, but authorizes this examination to be made by the United States.

Mr. MAXEY. The committee has not changed the title, I understand.

Mr. CONGER. I say the amendment excludes the idea of a commission to be appointed by the State of Texas. Therefore it should not be recited in the title.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not understand that the United States is to run a dividing line between its own territory and a State without having the other party represented.

Mr. CONGER. The amendment which the Senate has adopted provides for an examination by the United States authorities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to say that the same words are used in the amendment that has been adopted which are used in the original bill.

Mr. MAXEY. The enacting clause of the bill shows that Texas is to be represented. I ask the Secretary to read it.

Mr. CONGER. My recollection was that the examination was to be made by the authorities of the United States and reported to Congress.

Mr. MAXEY. Not at all.

Mr. CONGER. If it is a joint commission in the bill——

Mr. MAXEY. It is a joint commission in the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Then I have no objection to its being in the title, although I was not aware that the State of Texas was to have a commission.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will look at the enacting clause of the bill he will see that that is the fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title will stand unless objection be made. The Senate bill on the same subject-matter will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. 1820) to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801.

SPANISH-AMERICAN TRADE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution of the Senate, passed December 16, 1884, I transmit herewith a letter of the Secretary of State, of the 19th instant, submitting a report containing certain information in the Department of State in relation to the foreign trade of Mexico, Central and South America, the Spanish West Indies, Hayti, and San Domingo, and also in relation to the share of the United States to the trade in question.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, January 20, 1885.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I call for the regular order of business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] in the nature of a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. CULLOM. The first thing I suppose is to read the House bill, which has not yet been read. I do not ask for it myself, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House bill will now be read.

Mr. INGALLS. The House bill was read the first and second time by title, I think, and then ordered to lie on the table. It is now called up for action.

Mr. HARRIS. The House bill went to the Calendar after being read the first and second time by title.

Mr. INGALLS. It should be read once at length.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will now be read as of course.

The Chief Clerk read the bill:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] in the nature of a substitute for the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. That had better be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the substitute, and read to the end of the twelfth section.

Mr. CONGER. Is the bill being read for amendment by sections?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). It is not now being read for amendment.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois whether his substitute proposes to deal with all the water ways of the country as well as the railways of the country? I understand from the reading of it that it does, while the House bill is confined to the railways of the country and the pipe-lines. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CULLOM. The substitute offered by me as it came from the committee does propose legislation in regard to water ways as well as railways. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has some amendments which he proposes to offer upon that particular point.

Mr. BECK. I expect to agree with him in that respect, but I suppose that the bill as it came from the House is now the bill before the Senate, and is first open to amendment before the substitute will be considered or amendments offered to it. After the text of the House bill is perfected, I suppose the substitute will then be offered to the House bill as perfected by the Senate amendments, and will itself be open to amendment, at which time the amendments of the Senator from Michigan would more properly apply, I assume.

Mr. CONGER. It seems to me, if the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If Senators will suspend a few moments, the Chief Clerk had not quite finished the reading of the substitute.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon; I thought he had.

Mr. CONGER. On that very point I wish to remark that I understood the bill was being read now for amendments, having been read on other occasions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the amendment is being read for information on the demand of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. CONGER. I give notice now that I have prepared amendments by which, in sections 12 and 13, the provisions relating to water carriage shall be striken from the bill.

Mr. BECK. I expect to agree with the Senator from Michigan that those sections should be stricken out, but it is not the time now to act upon the question.

Mr. CONGER. I supposed the proper time to offer those amendments would be on this full reading of the bill by sections. I do not understand that amendments must necessarily come to the House bill, the body of the bill now under consideration, before the substitute is amended. The substitute being offered for it, the substitute may be first amended, and then the original bill can be amended before the substitute is voted upon.

Mr. BECK. I do not so understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the substitute will be resumed.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment of Mr. CULLOM, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That for the purpose of providing for the regulation of commerce among the several States and Territories a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall be composed of nine commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one of whom shall be selected from each judicial circuit of the United States. Three of the commissioners first appointed under this act shall continue in office for terms of two years, three for four years, and three for six years, the respective terms to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. Any commissioner may be removed by the President for incompetency or malfeasance in office. Vacancies occasioned by removal, resignation, or other cause shall be filled by the President. And not more than five shall belong to the same political party.

SEC. 2. That the commission hereby created shall have and exercise the powers and discharge the duties defined and granted in this act pertaining to the methods and regulating the operation of all transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce, and to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to commerce between the States, and especially in the matter of the transportation thereof, so far as may be necessary to the establishment of a just system of regulations for the government of the same.

SEC. 3. That if any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce shall collect, demand, or receive, in the transaction of the business of interstate commerce, more than a reasonable rate of compensation for the transportation of freight of any description, or for the receiving, delivery, storage, or handling of property, or for the use or transportation of any railroad car upon its railroad, or on any of the branches thereof, or upon any railroad it has the right, license, or permission to use, operate, or control, said transportation company shall be deemed guilty of extortion, which is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor.

SEC. 4. That if any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce shall, directly or indirectly, by any rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person a greater compensation for any service it may render in its transaction of interstate commerce than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person for doing for him, in a like business and under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, contemporaneously, a like service, or if any such transportation company shall neglect or refuse to furnish the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of interstate commerce freights to one person that is at the same time furnished to any other person for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of such freights of the same class, and under substantially similar circumstances, such transportation company shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor.

SEC. 5. That whenever complaint is made to the commission, in such manner as it may prescribe, charging any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce with extortion or unjust discrimination in the transaction of such business, a statement of the charges thus made shall be forwarded to the transportation company, which shall be called upon to satisfy the complaint or to answer the same in writing within a reasonable given time.

If such transportation company shall within the time specified make reparation for the injury done, and the complaint shall be withdrawn, the case shall be dismissed, and the transportation company shall be relieved of liability for any other penalty for the particular violation of this act thus complained of.

If such transportation company shall not satisfy the complaint within the time specified, or if it shall neglect or refuse to answer the same as required, or if either party to the proceeding shall demand a hearing, and there shall appear to be any reasonable ground for investigating said complaint, it shall be the duty of the commission to investigate the matters complained of, to determine all questions of fact at issue, to record its finding, and to furnish a report thereof to both parties.

And if it shall appear that the transportation company has been guilty of either extortion or unjust discrimination as charged, it shall be the duty of the commission to give notice to such company to discontinue the practice thereof forthwith, and to pay the complainant within a reasonable given time the damages, if any, to which the commission may find the complainant justly entitled in consequence thereof.

And if such damages shall be paid as required, and the commission shall be satisfied that the transportation company has ceased to practice the extortion or unjust discrimination complained of, an order to that effect shall be entered of record by the commission, and the transportation company shall be relieved of liability for any other penalty for the particular act complained of.

SEC. 6. That if any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce shall neglect or refuse to pay the damages assessed against it by the interstate commerce commission, and to desist from the further violation of this act, it shall be the duty of the commission to certify the facts to the district attorney of the United States for the judicial district in which the act complained of occurred; and it shall be the duty of the district attorney, at the request of the complainant, to forthwith commence such proceedings, in the name of the complainant, as may be necessary to recover any damages sustained by him, or to compel the transportation company to comply with the provisions of this act, or both; and the circuit court of the United States for said district shall have jurisdiction to try said cause, without regard to the citizenship of the parties. Costs shall be awarded as in other cases; but in case judgment is rendered against the defendant, the court may, in its discretion, allow to the district attorney a reasonable fee for prosecuting said cause, to be taxed as part of the costs; and in case of failure to recover, the complainant shall pay the cost of suit, attorney's fees excepted.

Any such transportation company that shall be convicted under the provisions of this act of either extortion or unjust discrimination shall forfeit and pay for each offense a fine of not exceeding $1,000.

Any such transportation company that shall neglect or refuse to make such annual reports as the commission may require, or that shall neglect or refuse to answer any question or to produce any book, paper, contract, or other document, or properly certified abstract thereof, called for by the commission in making any investigation under the authority of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 for each offense herein described.

Any such transportation company or any person or persons that shall violate any of the provisions of this act not in this section specified, or that shall in any manner attempt to obstruct the enforcement of its provisions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000.

SEC. 7. That each commissioner shall receive an annual salary of $7,500, payable in the same manner as the salaries of judges of the courts of the United States. The commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive an annual salary of $3,500, payable in like manner. The commission shall have authority to employ and fix the compensation of such other employés as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. All necessary expenses incurred by the commissioners, or by their employés under their orders, in making any investigation in any other place than in the city of Washington, shall be allowed and paid on the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of itemized vouchers therefor. The commission shall be furnished by the Secretary of the Interior with suitable offices and all necessary office supplies. Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid to witnesses in the courts of the United States. All of the expenses of the commission shall be paid on the presentation of vouchers approved by the president of the commission and by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 8. That the commission may make such orders as it may deem necessary for the regulation of its business, and prescribe the forms to be used therein. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 9. That in making any investigation required by this act the commission shall have power to summon and require the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths, and to require the production of all books, papers, contracts, and documents, or properly certified abstracts thereof, relating to the matter under investigation and necessary for the information of the commission in connection therewith. The commission is hereby authorized to conduct investigations in such portions of the United States as it may deem necessary, and for that purpose may delegate the powers conferred by this section to any member or members of the commission.

SEC. 10. That the commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce, to fix the time and prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such companies specific answers to all questions upon which the commission may need information. Such annual reports will show in detail the amount of capital stock issued and the amounts paid therefor; the dividends paid; the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the company's property, franchises, and equipment, with a complete description of the same; the number of employés and the salaries paid each class; the amounts expended for improvements each year, and how expended; the monthly earnings and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources; the monthly operating and other expenses; the balances of profit and loss, and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the company each year. Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations concerning fares or freights, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts with other companies, as the commission may require.

SEC. 11. That the commission shall, on or before the 1st day in December in each year, make a report to the Secretary of the Interior, which shall be by him transmitted to Congress, and copies of which shall be distributed as are the other reports issued from the Interior Department. This report shall contain such information and data collected by the commission as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the regulation of interstate commerce, together with such recommendations as to additional legislation for the regulation of interstate commerce as the commission may deem necessary. And said commission shall precede its first report with an investigation of the subject of interstate commerce, which shall embrace the subjects of establishing a system of both maximum and minimum charges for transportation, and for the preservation of free competition within the limits so fixed; for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever, either in favor of or against cities, towns, or other localities, whether the same be competing or non-competing points, and for applying the same principle to transportation for individuals, firms, associations, or corporations in all matters relating to commerce among the States; for the preservation and enforcement of the right of shippers to select the lines and parts of lines over which their shipments shall pass, to the end that said commerce among the States may avail itself of the all-rail or part rail and part water routes of the country; for the prevention of such pooling arrangements and agreements to refrain from just competition as may tend to impose unreasonable burdens upon said commerce among the States, and for the protection of said commerce against unjust exactions based on a class of securities commonly denominated "watered stock;" and said commission, in conducting said investigation, shall be guided by such rules of action as will be fair, just, and equitable toward all of the interests involved, whether the same be private, public, or corporate, connected with the subject of commerce among the States.

SEC. 12. That the route of any transportation company engaged in interstate commerce shall include all the railroad and water routes in use by such company, whether owned by said company or used by it under license, lease, or permission otherwise given. And it shall be unlawful for any transportation company as aforesaid to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, expressed or implied, to prevent, by change of time schedule, carriage in different cars, or by other means or devices, the carriage of interstate-commerce freights from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, whether said freight is carried on one or several railroads, or partly by rail and partly by vessel. And no break of bulk, stoppage, or interruption made by said transportation company shall prevent the carriage of any interstate-commerce freights from being and being treated as one continuous carriage from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such break, stoppage, or interruption was made in good faith for some necessary purpose, and without any intent to avoid or unnecessarily interrupt such continuous carriage or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 13. That the term "transportation company engaged in interstate commerce," as used in this act, shall be deemed and taken to mean any corporation, company, or individual now owning, operating, or using any railroad or railroads, or any vessel or vessels, in whole or in part, or that they may have the right, license, or permission to operate, use, or control any railroad or railroads, or any vessel or vessels, in whole or in part, provided said corporation, company, or individual is engaged in the business of transporting freights or property of any description by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, from one State into another State or Territory of the United States, or from any Territory into any State or any other Territory; and the provisions of this act shall apply to all persons, firms, and companies, and to all associations of persons or companies, whether incorporated or not, and to all associations of corporations engaged in thus transporting freights or property of any description, in the manner above set forth, from one State into any other State or Territory, or from any Territory into any State or any other Territory.

SEC. 14. That the sum of $60,000 is hereby appropriated for the use and purposes of this act for the fiscal year ending June 30, A. D. 1885, and the intervening time anterior thereto; and it is expressly provided that no pending litigation between railroad companies shall in any way be affected by this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], which has just been read.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to offer some amendments to the original House bill in order to perfect the text of that bill before the amendment in the nature of a substitute is passed upon, and I suppose my amendments to be in order first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are.

Mr. BECK. The first amendment I offer will be to strike out all after the word "reasonable," in line 14 of the first section of the House bill, down to and including the word "person," in line 31, in the following words:

And any person or persons having purchased a ticket to be conveyed from one State to another, or paid the required fare, shall receive the same treatment and be afforded equal facilities and accommodations as are furnished all other persons holding tickets of the same class, without discrimination; but nothing in this act shall be construed to deny to railroads the right to provide separate accommodations for passengers as they may deem best for the public comfort or safety or to relate to transportation relating to points wholly within the limits of one State: Provided, That no discrimination is made on account of race or color; and that furnishing separate accommodations, with equal facilities and equal comforts at the same charges, shall not be considered a discrimination. Nor shall any railroad company or its officers charge to or receive from any person who is to be conveyed from one State or Territory into another any sum exceeding 3 cents per mile for the distance to be traveled by such person.

May I suggest one or two other amendments, so that I may make a few remarks in reference to all of them at the same time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection they may be stated for information.

Mr. BECK. In section 4, line 5, after the word "same," I move to strike out the words "for a shorter than for a longer distance, which includes the shorter" and to insert "for any distance less than the whole length of the line than is charged for similar service over the whole length of the line;" so that the section will read:

That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for any distance less than the whole length of the line than is charged for similar service over the whole length of the line, on any one railroad or pipe-line; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road or pipe-line in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

I propose also to amend, when the proper time comes, in section 5 of the bill, line 19, by inserting after the word "changed" the words "so as to increase the rates or charges;" so as to read:

And no such schedule shall be changed so as to increase the rates or charges in any particular except by the substitution of another schedule containing the specifications above required.

The object of this amendment is to allow the roads, if they desire it, to reduce their rates without giving five days' notice. The public will not complain of that, so that they publish the schedule afterward. One of the grounds of complaint now is that there is a fixed rate and that the companies can not accommodate themselves to change with other roads. The provision is that they shall not increase the rates without five days' notice, but they may reduce them, so they put the schedule up. There may be other amendments that I shall propose, but I indicate these for the purpose of saying a few words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] first offered.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I feel that we are now for the first time really considering how far and in what way Congress can and ought to regulate interstate commerce over the great railroads of the country. It has been confessed for weeks by the managers of the Senate bill that there was not only no hope of passing it through the House, but that there was no intention of even asking the Senate to vote on it as an original proposition. It is now abandoned and returned to the Calendar to die. All that can be said in favor of the long debate we have had on it is that Senators may be better prepared to vote on the propositions involved in the bill of the House and on the amendments or substitutes that may be offered to or for it than they would have been if the debate had not taken place, and perhaps some consolation may be drawn from the fact that if we had not been engaged in that we might have been doing something worse.

It has been conceded all along that if we intend to do anything practical it must be by taking action on the bill sent to us by the House. Of course every section and line of the House bill is subject to amendment before any substitute for it, or, rather, any amendment in the nature of a substitute, can be considered, and when the substitute or amendment of that character is taken up every section and line of it is subject to amendment before a vote can be reached on the proposition as a whole. The Senate will depart from its usual mode of proceeding if it does not exercise its rights in all these regards freely. Never having observed that a debate in this body on any proposition convinced those who were in a minority when the vote was against them or either exhausted or curtailed debate when like questions were presented in another form, I have insisted that the debate on the Senate bill which has for weeks blocked all other business was useless.

Another suggestion which I regard as of value is (assuming that we really desire to pass a law of some sort on this subject) that we are far more likely to reach an agreement with the House by retaining the provisions of the bill sent here as the result of long and careful deliberation by that body, amended, if you please, as the majority of the Senate desires, than we can if we, without consideration, as the motion so promptly made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] indicates, substitute bodily the proposition which he will call the Senate bill, striking out and ignoring bodily the bill of the House. If that is done, it simply leaves the conferees of the two Houses, when they meet to consult, in direct and absolute antagonism, each presenting a different system, with no sort of chance for the conferees of either to accede to the propositions of the other without an absolute abandonment of the action taken by one or the other of the co-ordinate bodies.

Of course, when I hear the managers of the Senate bill proclaim on this floor their anxiety to pass some law, to do something practical on this great question before we adjourn, I am bound to give them credit for sincerity; but I can not help believing that every movement that has been made, every step that has been taken so far, has been in the direction of making an agreement with the House more and more improbable, if not impossible. The railroad managers and their attorneys, with the same knowledge we have in regard to the action and temper of the House, could not have devised a plan to secure no legislation during this short session more likely to be successful, and at the same time induce the country to believe that an earnest effort to do something was being made, than the course that has been and is being pursued here. More than a week has passed since the House bill was laid before us; it is now for the first time looked at, and had not even been read at the Clerk's desk before a motion to strike it all out and substitute totally different propositions was made and a vote asked upon it.

The Committee on Railroads was urged a week ago to take the House bill and all the Senate propositions, and, after consultation and deliberation with all the bills and amendments before them, advise the Senate what course to take in order to secure some practical legislation. The chairman of that committee and his friends defeated that proposition, and a week has been spent in debate on propositions—I will not say intended, but the obvious effect of the adoption of which, as now proposed, is to render any agreement between the two Houses on any measure almost if not absolutely an impossibility. Thirty-eight working days only remain before this Congress dies. If we are not deceiving ourselves or deluding our constituents, ought we not to try to agree with the House as far as possible, and not ruthlessly strike down all their carefully considered work? Both the House bill and the Senate's substitute assume that we have jurisdiction over the subject-matter under the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, and no one will deny that whatever Congress may authorize to be done by or through a commission it has power to do directly by its own authority; while some of us, of whom I am one, believe that there are many things in regard to prescribing the rules and regulations by which interstate commerce shall be governed which Congress can direct under its delegated power and enforce through the courts of the country which it can not transfer to any commission.

If the argument made on last Friday week on this floor in that regard by the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] has ever been answered by any advocate of any of the Senate propositions for a commission I have failed to observe it. Surely it was worthy of serious consideration by the advocates of such a commission as the Senate proposes to substitute for the House bill. I have regarded their failure to respond as a confession of the truth of the positions assumed by the Senator from Arkansas, to which I need not add anything. The House bill obviates all these difficulties; it deals directly with the subject; it opens the courts to all who are aggrieved, and submits all constitutional questions which may be raised in regard to its action to the tribunals organized and empowered to pass upon them. It does not undertake to decide what roads are under State control, or which of them come under the jurisdiction of Congress; it asserts the right and the duty of Congress, prescribes the rules and regulations under which railroads may engage in commerce among the States; it assumes that railroads are public highways and their managers common carriers; that all the people have equal rights in regard to the transportation of their goods over them; and that whenever the managers of these roads undertake to extort unreasonable charges from or make unjust discriminations between men engaged in transporting goods over their roads from one State to another they shall be punished.

The Constitutions of many of the States and the laws in nearly all of them contain provisions, in one form or other, almost identical with the provisions of the House bill in regard to the local railways and the commerce which they carry exclusively within their several jurisdictions, all assuming an undoubted right to do so without infringing the vested rights of the railroad companies, and all the States concede that as to interstate commerce the exclusive jurisdiction to enact laws, prescribe and enforce rules and regulations governing it is vested by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States. Obviously the several States have no power over the commerce which is moving from New York to San Francisco, and vice versa, through numerous States and Territories. If Congress has not, the strange anomaly is presented of State commerce being protected against extortion and discrimination by local State authority, while the immense interstate commerce, which covers perhaps nine-tenths of all our exports that can not be taxed, is left without protection against the rapacity of railroad managers, who may impose taxes in the form of charges for transportation far in excess of any tax Congress would ever venture to impose; thus destroying the right of our citizens to export their products more effectually than by any other means. Not only so, but by discriminations in favor of one set of men or of favorite localities the railroad managers can enrich and build up men and places as they please, and impoverish or break them down to suit their interest or caprice.

The distinguished gentleman from Texas, Judge REAGAN, after whom the House bill is properly named because of the energy, ability, and earnestness with which he has pressed it, gave a very striking illustration of the absolute necessity of Congressional control to prevent ruinous discriminations in favor of influential shippers of freight, to the ruin of their competitors, when he said in a debate elsewhere:

> In the legislative investigation in New York three years ago it was shown that the railroad companies had allowed and paid rebates to the Standard Oil Company to the amount of $10,000,000 in sixteen months, and yet we have no legislation to prevent or to punish these great wrongs committed by this vast power. In the world's history there is no instance of the exercise of such powers affecting so many people and such great interests as these which is not controlled and regulated by law except alone the American railway system. Assumptions have been made that the common law furnishes remedies for these evils. I will show as I proceed that it does not.

The House bill declares that a repetition of such conduct as that developed before the legislative committee of New York in granting to the Standard Oil Company or anybody else rebates or drawbacks or reduced charges in any form not given to every other citizen transporting the same things at the same time shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, and the courts of the country are opened to all who complain on either side. There can be no question that if Congress has the power it ought to be exercised to the fullest extent. The House bill presents the direct mode of doing it.

Let it be borne in mind that the position taken by the railroad companies all through the progress of these measures, in their arguments before the committees and everywhere else, has been that Congress has no power over them and no authority to control them; that it has no right to punish them even for extortions and unjust discriminations such as the Standard Oil Company transactions illustrate. I have before me the argument of one of the ablest lawyers, representing leading railroads, sent to me the other night, perhaps to convince me that I was wrong in the views I entertain—an argument made by Hon. John C. Brown, general solicitor of the Missouri Pacific, Texas and Pacific, and Saint Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Companies, before the House Committee on Commerce on the 26th of January, 1884, in which he begins by saying:

> I beg to say that I am here as the accredited representative of over 6,000 miles of railway in the Southwest, which pay taxes upon values amounting to over $100,000,000 and employ between 40,000 and 50,000 men.

On page 16 of his printed argument he makes this statement:

> But for Congress to declare that it is unlawful for a railway company to charge one citizen of a State more than another citizen of the same State for contemporaneous transportation into another State of like commodities, I apprehend will not be seriously insisted upon. Certainly no warrant can be found for it in the Constitution.

That is the position taken by all of them, not in debate in either House, perhaps, but taken by all the railroad companies, so far as I know, who have been heard before our committee. Proceeding with his argument, on page 22 he puts the following interrogatories:

> Has Congress the constitutional authority—
> 1. To make it unlawful and fix a penalty for a railway company to charge one shipper in a State more than another shipper in the same State for the transportation of property from that State into another?
> 2. To make it unlawful for any discrimination to be made by a railway company between shippers of the same State, either in facilities to be furnished, or manner of shipment, or expedition of the service from that State into another?

He contended before that committee elaborately and learnedly that no such constitutional power exists in Congress. That is the question that I desire to have settled now in the promptest and most emphatic manner. If the States have the right, as the Supreme Court has decided they have, and all their constitutions and laws are based upon their now unquestioned power to regulate commerce within their respective borders, surely all that great body of commerce which passes from one State to another which the States do not pretend to have any power to regulate or pass laws for the government of must be vested in Congress. If the Congress of the United States has not authority, then the railroads are masters of the situation, and both the bill of the House and the substitute presented by the Senate committee fall to the ground. The simplest way to test it and to settle it is to test the question in the direct form in which the House has put it, and let the aggrieved party go to the courts and settle these vital questions without being entangled by any question as to the legality or illegality of an intermediate commission.

It being conceded that it is only through the House bill that any action can be taken which will be available for any purpose at this session, surely the Senate will be only playing into the hands of the railroads by preventing any legislation at all if we strike out these provisions of the House and substitute a new bill of our own, the provisions of which the House have by an immense majority rejected. It would be the merest farce to send it to them and ask them to abandon all their action, which the Senate knows now they will not do and their conferees can not consent to.

What harm, I ask Senators, can come from adopting the first and second sections of the bill of the House instead of the provisions proposed in the Senate in regard to discriminations, rebates, drawbacks, and those things which both bills denounce as illegal? None. Are Senators in earnest? Nobody will be deceived by specious talk about desiring to do through a commission this, that, and the other thing, when we know now that nothing will be in fact done unless we approach it substantially in the same manner as the House has done, especially when the mode prescribed by the House is better, simpler, clearer, and beyond all doubt constitutional as to its method of enforcing its mandates. If we have the power at all why should we avoid an agreement by seeking to adopt another system which we know the other House has rejected and will never look at? It can not be the purpose of Senators to pretend to want to do something and at the same time to make sure that they will do nothing. Yet the effect of their action is just as absolutely certain to end in no legislation as if they intended that it should do so.

It is no use to say that the House is as responsible as the Senate for the disagreement. That amounts to nothing, even if true. But it is not true. They have sent us a bill in the usual form of legislation to cure admitted evils. We agree that the evils exist, but we refuse to consider the remedy proposed unless the House places the power in the hands of a commission and departs from all the forms usually adopted by Congress in the passage of laws.

Can there be any question that a direct, positive law ought to be passed without reference to a commission or any other sort of circumlocution, making it impossible for any railroad to repeat the offense shown, as I have read, before the Legislature of New York—that $10,000,000 had been given in the form of rebate or drawback to the Standard Oil Company in eighteen months?

I have no doubt that nine-tenths of it was given back to that company when it was in direct competition with citizens of the same State who were shipping oil over the same roads and at the same time into another State. Yet we are told by the railroad lawyers that we have no power over that subject and that no man will seriously assert that we have. I assert it very seriously. The House of Representatives have asserted it more seriously, and I assert that the absurdity is too great to be seriously argued that freight passing from New York to San Francisco and vice versa through States and Territories must be left forever absolutely to the mercy of any body of men who may be controlling the railroads of the country and that Congress has no power to interfere with them. No matter what extortions they may exact or what discriminations they may make, no matter though they do give the Standard Oil Company $10,000,000 advantage over its competitors in eighteen months, we are told that we shall not, and can not, and it is unconstitutional for us to attempt to say that equal justice shall be done by those roads to all men who are doing business over their lines, and that no class of our people shall be driven from the markets of the world with their products through the favoritism shown by railroad managers to their competitors.

If we settle nothing but that and leave all the rest for a commission to report and advise us what else we ought to do, we will have taken a great step forward in the assertion of our power to regulate the railroads of the country. If we can not do that much, there is no use in trying to do anything. I have no doubt the courts will sustain us and decide that the railroads of this country are public highways, that their officers are managers or trustees over a great public trust. Will it be contended that the Congress of the United States would have given millions and millions of acres of public lands to the States long before 1860 to aid them in building their railroads and enough for a great empire through our States and Territories to railroad companies since 1860 to build railways—lands belonging to all the people; lands upon which the poor men of the country would have a right to settle as homesteads and take up as pre-emptions—but for the fact that it was given by Congress to great railway corporations, or to the States to aid them in building railroads for public highways, or unless those public highways were to be maintained and carried on for the common and equal use and general good of the whole people? Can it be successfully maintained that a railroad has the right to condemn private property and take it for any other than for public use when they get control of it? Will any one contend that they can lawfully say to one farmer, "You may transport your grain by paying us a dollar a ton," and to his neighbor, "You shall not transport your grain over this road unless you pay $5 a ton," although both are going from Dakota to New York, or both may be seeking a market in Liverpool, if you please?

That is the claim of the railroads. That has been their conduct in regard to the Standard Oil Company. Ten million dollars was given back in eighteen months to that single corporation. I use it as an illustration, but that illustrates all. If they have the power to do that and Congress is powerless to prevent them, they have the power to say, "Our roads are private corporations; we will run them as we please; charge one citizen double what we charge another;" or say to any one, "You shall not haul over our road unless you give us half the profit you make, or you shall not run over it unless you first sell your produce to us at our own price; then, and then only, we will haul it." They have a right to do all these things if their view of their power and our want of authority over them is correct.

I repeat, the first question to settle is the authority of Congress to see to it that the public highways thus built by the condemnation of private property, by the donation of lands, and by bonds and money given by the United States or by taxes levied on the people, are operated in the interest of all the people equally, and that justice is done to all and to all alike. That is what I desire to settle first.

To show that even the railroad companies have no great respect for commissions, I observe, in the same argument from which I have read, Mr. BARKSDALE, of Mississippi, put a question to the distinguished gentleman who was arguing the case. Mr. BARKSDALE said:

> Admitting, for the sake of argument, which I do not, that the case you gave of the roads in Louisiana and Texas illustrates objections to Judge REAGAN'S bill, is the proposition to establish a commission to regulate freights amenable to the same objections?
> Governor BROWN. To appoint a commission, and give them power to fix rates, would be just as objectionable. I would rather that Congress do it.

Even the railroads say, Let Congress act directly when they assert their constitutional power; let them make the test as to their right under direct laws, as they seem willing to do. Much more might be said on that question, but I must hurry on, as I do not propose to make an elaborate speech or a constitutional argument.

One reason why I offered the amendment I did to the first section of the House bill is, because that section introduces a number of subjects not necessary to the test of the question of power. Here is one provision found in the section:

> Nor shall any railroad company or its officers charge to or receive from any person who is to be conveyed from one State or Territory into another any sum exceeding 3 cents per mile for the distance to be traveled by such person.

I do not care to go into that question at all. Here is another provision:

> Provided, That no discrimination is made on account of race or color.

I do not care about going into that. The first section of the bill would read, after the matter is stricken out as I propose, just as it was presented by Judge REAGAN to the House of Representatives. I have the original draught in my hand, and the clause would remain as he first presented it, clear of all these embarrassing questions if the words I suggest are stricken out. Another reason why I suggested that these clauses should be stricken out is that the question might be met fairly and distinctly without embarrassment from doubtful provisions. The other amendments I suggest to other sections will, I think, get clear of one class of evils, if we do not reach all; that should not prevent us from trying to get rid of some, and assert our right to deal with others hereafter if it should be found necessary to do so.

The bill as it passed the House provides that there shall be no greater charge for a shorter than for a longer haul over the same part of the roads. We have heard arguments time and again to the effect that some parts of a road are very difficult and some parts of a road are very easy to haul over, and many complain that such a provision would embarrass the roads. But the suggestion I make by way of amendment, and it is merely a suggestion, is that they shall not charge for any distance less than the whole length of the line more than is charged for similar service over the whole length of it.

I remember that some years ago Mr. Daggett made a very elaborate argument in the House of Representatives, in which he proved, and the same facts have been stated on this floor time and again—I have heard it from the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR], and I have never heard it contradicted—that it is very usual for the Pacific roads to charge, say, $300 a car from Omaha to San Francisco and $800 for a car-load precisely like it run on the same train from Omaha to Virginia City, which is six hundred or eight hundred miles nearer Omaha than San Francisco. That is either extortion or unjust discrimination, or both, and ought not to be allowed. If the road is allowed to charge as much to Virginia City from Omaha as its charges to San Francisco, that is all that ought to be permitted. My proposition can work no injustice when the rights of all sides are looked to.

It was stated in a very able argument, which I have before me, by Judge Black, of Pennsylvania, that it was no uncommon thing at that time for the Northern Central road, running from coal mines in Pennsylvania to Baltimore, to charge from $1 to $1.50 a ton more to carry coal to York, sixty miles north of Baltimore, than to carry the same amount of coal to Baltimore on the same train and in the same class of cars. That destroys all competition in any business depending on coal. It was proven before the committee of the House that a railroad would haul a bale of cotton from Memphis to New Orleans for $1 a bale, and charge $3 per bale from Winona to New Orleans, which is one hundred and twenty miles south of Memphis and nearer to New Orleans, on the same line. I am seeking to guard against that class of discriminations without going into any other questions now. There can be no injustice in saying that no railroad shall charge for hauling over a part of its line more than it charges for hauling over the whole length of the line.

It will not do to say they have to haul more cheaply from Memphis because of competition, as will be contended in the Winona case, for example, because there is competition with the river, and therefore they are compelled to make up a profitable through haul by charging enormous rates to the people of Winona, who can not reach the river. The very evil I propose to provide against is that a railroad shall not be permitted to reduce its rates below the cost of hauling at the end of a line in order to run off some competing line or water way, so that they may absorb the trade; and the moment they run off their competitors put up the price to what they please, and in the mean time make up the loss they incur on the through hauls by doubling, trebling, and quadrupling the charges upon the products of the people along the line, as they do, by charging $3 a bale from Winona to New Orleans, while only $1 a bale is charged from Memphis to New Orleans.

If they can not run in fair competition with the river from Memphis, let the river take the freight and let the roads take what they are legitimately entitled to; but to give them power to tax double, and treble, and quadruple, what the carriage is worth to the people all along the line to pay them the losses they see fit to make by hauling too cheaply from the end of the line in order to run off a competing line ought not to be tolerated. If they are common carriers on public highways, as I assert they are, all the people of this country ought to be treated with decent if not exactly equal fairness; and no body of men should have the right to lay unjust tribute on the people along the line who can not help themselves to make up for losses that they have sustained by their gambling at the end of the line in order to drive off competition, because they only haul for less than they can afford to haul for in order to get control of the trade and thus destroy competition, so that they may charge what they please after the competitor is driven out of the business. I will not speak of the evils of the pooling system now; others will discuss that; it would take too much time, and I do not desire to weary the Senate.

There are serious questions about many other things, but when we allow the railroads to charge as much for hauling over any part of the road, as my amendment proposes, as they see fit to charge for hauling over the whole line, that ought to satisfy any body of men who profess to be dealing with anything like decent fairness in transporting goods.

The other amendment I suggest is in line 19 of section 5, where they are required to keep schedules. Where it is provided that no such schedule shall be changed without five days' notice, I propose to add: "So as to increase the rates or charges in any particular except by the substitution of another schedule." That gets clear of a difficulty which they claim this legislation would impose upon them. It has been argued by their attorneys and agents everywhere that if we require them to fix a schedule and to hold to it until notice of change has been given for five days, some competing railroad not carrying on interstate commerce, or some competing steamboat company, will put down their freights not being covered by this law and take their trade away from them.

My amendment will allow them, if that is attempted at any time, to reduce their rates without giving any notice. The country will not be injured by that, and there is no danger of their freight being taken away from them by any competing line increasing its charges. They will not be hurt by their competitors putting up their rates, but I propose to give them the right to reduce without notice, provided they publish the reduced schedule afterward and give the people notice of what they intend to charge them thereafter. I think my friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has that amendment in a better shape than I proposed it, but it embraces I believe the same idea, does it not?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, the same idea exactly.

Mr. BECK. The language of the Senator's amendment, to which he now calls my attention, is:

Provided, That there may be a reduction of rates prior to the posting of such new schedule; but in such case the new schedule shall be posted as aforesaid within five days after such reduction shall be made; and said schedule shall also specify the date at which the reduction commenced.

That is better language; it has been more carefully considered. I insist that that is a proper amendment and is just legislation. Why? The men of this country who are purchasing wheat or hogs or cattle or anything else have a right to know by looking at the schedule of a road what is going to be the cost of transportation. They can not buy safely unless they do know, and they can only know through the printed schedules posted up what rate is going to be charged them. Suppose I am a merchant in New York and desire to buy a car-load or a train-load or any number of train-loads of wheat from farmers in Minnesota, Dakota, or anywhere else, that I wish to sell in Liverpool, the first thing I must do is to ascertain what the Liverpool price is, then what will be the cost across the ocean; then what will be the rate of transportation from Saint Paul or the Red River of the North to New York. I can see all that by the printed schedules of the railroads.

But if those railroads have a right at any moment without notice, after I have bought my wheat, to double or treble the cost of transportation without warning, they may bankrupt me in an honest effort to buy at a fair price the crop of that country. That ought not to be allowed; no manager of a public highway ought to be allowed to do it. He may do it just at the very moment the merchant had made the purchase and was about to ship it at the rate published; he might have made money at the advertised rate, but when the road doubles or quadruples its charges, and there is no other way of shipping it, and no competing railroad that can be reached, and makes the purchaser pay $500 a car where he only expected to pay $200, the man may be bankrupted if the transaction is a large one; he is injured no matter how small it is.

We all know that Congress can impose no tax upon exports. The Constitution prohibits that from being done. But if we allow the railroads to do as they please and to charge what they please and discriminate as they please, and put up their rates of tariff charges for hauling whenever they please, they can by increasing the cost of transportation impose a tax upon the exports of this country far beyond what any Congress would venture to do. If Congress could impose a tax it would necessarily be a uniform tax, bearing equally upon all men and well known and understood of all men, and the representatives of the people would be instructed to get clear of it if it was intolerable; but when the railroads act under the powers they assert and now have they can discriminate in favor of one man and against another. They can double their rates without any notice. In short, they can make or break men in their legitimate business; they can build up or tear down towns and villages, even cities, just as they please, and they will very soon, unless they are checked, control both Houses of Congress, if they have not got the power to do it now.

It is a question whether Congress has the power and whether it has the courage to exercise that power to say to these corporations, "You are our agents when engaged in carrying on interstate commerce; your roads are public highways, authorized to be built and carried on for the benefit of the people; we gave you lands, we gave you bonds, we gave you the right to condemn private property, we gave you all proper facilities; we desire you to be prosperous and make reasonable profits; all your possessions shall be protected, but all the people of the United States shall have equal rights and privileges over your roads, and you shall give them fair notice before you attempt to make any charges whereby they could be injured or bankrupted in their honest ventures."

Mr. President, I do not desire to go a step further than is necessary to take fair control over the roads and require them to do justice. I do not seek to cripple any of them. I do not speak of them as extortioners or in any other disrespectful way. They have built up the country and rendered long hauls possible; but I want them to be regulated as all men engaged in public trusts are, and to require them as common carriers to do equal justice to all men. The House bill, as far as I see, in declaring that they shall not discriminate between one man or one set of men and another, that they shall not by rebate, drawback, or anything else give anybody an advantage, surely does no injustice. When it says that they shall charge no more for hauling over a part of their road than they do for a haul along the whole line, surely it gives them the right to charge all that they ought to have for the short haul; and when it says, "You may reduce your schedule but you shall not without notice increase the rates, because traders and business men can not operate if they are at your mercy," no harm can be done by that.

When these things are done, or something like them, then I am willing to have a commission appointed—not a commission to legislate, not a commission to try causes, not a commission to meddle with railroads or their business, but a commission to investigate, to ascertain whether in the laws we have passed we have done the roads injustice, and if so, advise us so that we may correct them. If there are still other things to be done, let the commission advise us, so that we may proceed still further in the direction of regulating the commerce over these roads.

When I voted the other day for a commission of nine instead of a commission of five, it was with the idea that we would so amend these bills as to make it a commission to give Congress information, and nothing else. Let it be a commission of able and learned men; let them be well paid (I do not care what it costs, so the work is well done); one residing in each United States judicial circuit within the United States, who can consult in his own neighborhood relative to the evils growing up there. For example, I believe Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and perhaps Illinois, form a circuit. I am not very sure. The Senator from Indiana will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. CULLOM. It is Michigan instead of Illinois.

Mr. HARRISON. We have not the pleasure of having Illinois associated with Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I am wrong, I suppose, as to the boundaries of that circuit. No matter, I will put it this way: Two or three or four States form that circuit. If we appoint a commissioner who resides there he will be in close proximity, and in a position to consult with the State commissions that have been appointed, I believe, by all those States. Kentucky has its commission, the other States have their commissions, to look after their State commerce. If we appoint a United States commissioner who resides in the circuit they can meet at Chicago or Louisville or anywhere else, and our commissioner can hear the grievances that are complained of in respect to State commerce, and compare them with the grievances in regard to interstate commerce. That commissioner thus consulting with the local commissions inside of the circuit, and each commissioner consulting with the local commissioners inside of his circuit, can get together at Washington, or somewhere else, three or four times a year, and they can report all the facts and lay all the grievances before Congress, and we can see what ought to be done to remedy them. If we have done anything in this bill that we ought not to have done, if we have gone a step too far in regard to regulating the railroads, the commissioners consulting with the State commissioners can report to us, from time to time, wherein we ought to modify our law.

That is the sort of commission I desire to see inaugurated. That is the kind of commission that is clearly constitutional; but more good will be done by taking jurisdiction by this bill, by giving the railroads to understand that we have the power and we intend to exercise it in regard to flagrant wrongs, and that we have appointed a commission to look into their conduct and to investigate. It is said that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. The prevention of wrong will be more valuable than all the cures of the evils, for the evils will never occur to one-tenth part of the extent they have occurred when jurisdiction is once assumed. Do you think, under a law like this, punishing men by fines and imprisonment, the Standard Oil Company could ever have received $10,000,000 in eighteen months by way of drawback against competitors? The very fact that we have assumed jurisdiction over them, and that we have appointed commissioners to act in conjunction with the State commissioners to watch and to report their action, will make all the managers of these roads infinitely more careful than they have been. So long as they are taught to believe, as they are by all their counsel and all their agents, that they are beyond our control and above us and can defy us and that we can not interfere with them no matter what they may do, the first question to settle is to get that idea out of their heads, and the House bill settles it directly, makes its determination easy, sends them to the courts, so that no troublesome constitutional question intervenes.

I said to the Senator from Michigan that I expect to vote with him in regard to the water ways. This question is big enough now in dealing with the railways of the country. These railways are highways, upon which nobody can go except the owners and controllers of the corporations. They have a monopoly of their use and the right to charge what they please unless we regulate them in that regard, and they claim the right to make discriminations against anybody who may be obliged to use them. They may have destroyed the only other highways the people had before the railroad was built, as they have done virtually in my State, as my colleague knows, thereby destroying the means men had before of getting their crops to market, and then by discrimination and other favoritism or extortion, if you please, placed the country at their mercy. I am not charging any of these things upon railroad managers in Kentucky, but the power they have to do these things makes it important to control them everywhere by legislation, so as to obtain equality and justice. The water ways bear no such relation to the people. They are free.

Every man at Louisville or Cincinnati or anywhere else, if he has money enough, can put his barge with goods on the Ohio or Mississippi, can float it down to New Orleans, land at any public wharf, and ask no favor of any railroad or steamboat corporation. Nobody can exclude him from the use of that water way. Therein lies the distinction, if there were no other, between the railroad and the river and lake and other transportation by water. The one is a free highway; the other is a highway granted to a corporation with the exclusive right to use it, and it is very proper that we should in this bill seek to regulate the use of that highway of which we have given any body of men the exclusive use, without bringing up the question further of regulating free water ways of which everybody has the use and from which nobody can be excluded.

Let us deal with one thing at a time. This, as I said, is a beginning, is going to be resisted earnestly enough. I seek to go just as far as it is perfectly safe and proper to go without injuring the roads, and am willing to postpone further action till a commission is appointed to investigate and consult and report to Congress what they learn in regard to what ought to be done further, or what ought to be undone that has been done. I seek to inaugurate a system that will work harmoniously. That done, the good relations that ought to exist between great corporations of this sort and the people all along their lines will be brought about, and it will restore confidence. Then good feeling will prevail, and it will not be two years before the railroads will thank Congress for having taken it in hand and stopped a great many evils that they in their contests with each other bring about and are often unable to avert.

As I said, I had not prepared myself to argue these great questions as I ought, but I am prepared to say that those of us who earnestly desire to do something will do great injustice to ourselves if we do not amend the House bill as best we can, and keep that bill in its substance before both Houses, so that when a conference is agreed to, as it will be, we can see if our committees can not agree upon something practical, and not go off at a tangent on divergent lines, one House going one way and one the other, getting so far apart that our conferees can not do anything, and will not be expected to do anything, and all that the railroads and their attorneys want will be accomplished by having two variant bills plausibly advocated, and yet so arranged as to make it perfectly apparent that we are not going to curtail their power and privileges, which is exactly what they want.

That is all I care to say at present.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I had intended to submit some extended remarks on this subject, but it has been so fully discussed, the grievances complained of have been so plainly presented not only in the Senate but elsewhere, that I only care now to give my reasons for the vote I shall cast on the pending measure and to discuss the essential distinction between the House bill and the Senate bill.

I recognize that railroads are high up among the greatest means in the development of this great country, that they have enabled the people to utilize immense areas of agricultural and timber lands in the great Southwest and far West which without these means of transportation would yet be waste land. I recognize all that. I have no prejudice against railroads. I recognize their incalculable value in intercommunication, in the spread of intelligence, and cementing more closely the Union. I never owned any stock, any bonds, or any interest of any kind or character in railroads, and do not now, and am not and never was a railroad attorney. I am not a shipper, and have no further personal interest in freight rates than what I pay for the freight of articles for family use. I can say, therefore, that I am impartial.

The only question, it seems to me, necessary now to be discussed, because all others have been fully elaborated, is, Shall we adopt a commission system for the ascertainment of grievances, or shall we declare certain known grievances to be unlawful, and place in the courts the power to hear, judge, and determine as to them? That, it seems to me, is the only question.

A great deal has been said in respect to the power of Congress to touch the subject at all. If I doubted that Congress had power, I should vote against any measure, however great the grievance might be. I believe the salvation of this country depends upon a strict adherence to the Constitution in all its parts. It is known that the origin of the present Constitution was in the fact, first, that the old Articles of Confederation gave to Congress no power of taxation for the purpose of supporting the Government; and second, that under those articles Congress had no power whatever over commerce with foreign nations or among the several States. These two causes brought about the assembling of the convention which framed our Constitution, matchless in conception, and whose principles, without jar or confusion, meet the expanding necessities of the American people.

The Constitution declares that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." Whatever power is embraced in a fair construction of those words Congress undoubtedly possesses, and possesses exclusively. I remember the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland, in 4 Wheaton, one of the greatest questions that ever occurred in the judicial history of this country, grew out of the United States Bank charter. In that case—I am speaking entirely from memory—the United States Bank had been chartered by Congress, and the State of Maryland undertook to levy a tax upon the stock of that bank. The charter was granted under that clause of the Constitution which says "Congress may borrow money on the credit of the United States." That is an unqualified and unlimited power. It does not point out how the money shall be borrowed. It simply says Congress shall have power to borrow money on the credit of the United States. When that case went to the Supreme Court, the court, through the Chief-Justice, said that the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States being vested by the Constitution in Congress and without qualification or limit, the means and method whereby that power might be made effective were in Congress, and the attempt of the State of Maryland to lay any tax upon the bank to that extent crippled the power of Congress and was in its nature the assertion of a power vested in Congress, and more, that the power being without limitation or qualification in Congress, it was exclusive. That principle is settled there.

It has since been applied to every bond issued by the United States. In Gibbons vs. Ogden, in 9 Wheaton, the same principle is reaffirmed in that great interstate-commerce case which arose between the United States and the State of New York. If Congress has the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, then what do we mean by that regulation of commerce? It has exercised power over commerce from the foundation of this constitutional Government. It has done it by its navigation laws, its tonnage laws; it has done it by acts passed at the very first Congress that assembled under the Constitution; it has done it ever since. It prevents a steamboat from being loaded in our waters unless it is under a licensed pilot and is a licensed steamboat. It makes unlawful any contract to employ a boat unless it has a licensed pilot and is a licensed boat. It makes it unlawful to hire such a boat, to make a contract for such a boat, and it is unlawful on both sides. Both contracting parties to such a contract, according to the navigation laws, violate the act.

In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden the Supreme Court asks, through Chief-Justice Marshall, if commerce from one State to a distant State must pass through intermediate States, can it be said that the intermediate States can obstruct that commerce? That question itself is a most powerful argument in favor of the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States. To the full extent of the reserved powers of the States I concede that Congress has no authority whatever; but to the full extent of the granted power, the Congress of the United States is supreme under the Constitution, because the Constitution itself says that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

If, then, the House bill is within the scope and purview of the commerce clause of the Constitution I have quoted, no constitutional obstruction is in the way. And the same of the Senate bill.

I concede and have always conceded that to the extent of the granted powers an act of Congress under the Constitution is supreme; and the only question as to the pending measures is, do they fall within the granted power? I assert the authority of the General Government to the extent of the granted powers as fully and freely as I would resist an attempt on the part of Congress to exercise any of the reserved powers of the States.

Mr. President, what does the Senate bill attempt to do? It raises a commission of nine persons. I have examined with great care to find what they are to do; and I must confess that the duties of the commission to my mind are very vague and indefinite. I do not exactly see what they are to do. They are authorized to send for books, persons, and papers, and to examine witnesses—they can do all that—and to "investigate the matters complained of, to determine all questions of fact at issue, to record its finding, and to furnish a report thereof to both parties."

One of the grand characteristics of a court is that it can hear and determine. Is this a court? Is it designed to be a court? If so, undoubtedly the Senate bill is unconstitutional, because the judges of the courts of the United States must hold their office during good behavior, and these commissioners do not hold their office during good behavior, but for a term of years. Are they invested with judicial powers? Then where have you the authority to invest a commission outside of a court with judicial powers? No such authority exists.

But suppose that this commission goes out and hears and determines and gathers up all this great body of facts, and furnishes one copy to the railroad and the other to the party claiming to be aggrieved, what then is to be done with this testimony or with these papers after they are obtained? That question was asked one day last week—I believe Saturday afternoon—of the Senator in charge of the bill. Are they evidence? If they are evidence, how do they get to be so? I do not know of any method of getting evidence before a court in the form of depositions save and except by a commissioner of the court. It must be a commissioner of the court that takes depositions. These men are not commissioners authorized to take depositions. A United States commissioner is a part of the machinery of the court itself and he is authorized by the court to take depositions. Those depositions properly taken and properly returned are evidence before that court. But these facts that are ascertained by this commission are not evidence.

Well, in reply to the question asked him, "What are you going to do with them?" the Senator in charge of the bill said he was going to send them to the district attorney. In other words, after you have gone to all this expense of $5,000 each for your nine commissioners, your $3,500 for your clerk, with the privilege under this bill of any number of employés that the commission may deem proper over and above the pay to the commissioners and their clerk and office-hire, stationery, and all that, making an enormous amount of money—after you have gathered up all these facts what are you going to do with them? Are they evidence before a court?

It is admitted that the commissioners can not adjudge between the parties, because that would make them a court beyond all peradventure, but these facts are sent up, as gathered, as memoranda to the United States district attorney for him to prepare an indictment or the necessary petition in equity, as the case may be, to bring the railroad company complained of before the court.

Then, after all this has been done, what next do you do? You have to take all these papers in order to prepare the indictment or petition, and the district attorney says that the testimony of A in Ohio or B in Texas or C in Iowa is important to the ascertainment of the facts in the case, and you have then got to send out to a United States commissioner and gather up in due form of law all these facts developed by the data furnished by the commissioners to the district attorney. There you have a double labor and expense. In other words, the whole machinery of the commission to my mind is cumbersome and ineffective. If it has the power to be effective it is judicial power, and if it has the judicial power to be effective then it is not a constitutional power, unless we create it into a court, as we did the Court of Claims, unless we create a court and permit them to hold their offices during good behavior, and make it, as we did the Court of Claims, a court of investigation, limited, as to this commission, to railroad matters. The bill does not pretend that this commission is to go out and gather up information as the basis of legislation, but as a sort of friendly mediator without effective power to adjust controversies, or failing in that, to lay the huge pile of facts unauthenticated as testimony before the district attorney.

So I can not see for the life of me what is the object of this commission. It is not the character of commission to which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] referred—and I have not much use for commissions any way—a commission to go all over the land and gather up evidence in order to enable Congress to proceed understandingly. That is not the nature of this commission; but the commission here, according to the wording of this Senate bill, is:

To investigate the matters complained of, to determine all questions of fact at issue, to record its finding, and to furnish a report thereof to both parties.

Then when you come to test it to the bottom they do not determine the facts; that is done by a court, and this investigation which they make is nothing in the world but an investigation for the purpose of furnishing data, as I understand, to the district attorney. It is the most remarkable proceeding I have ever heard of, and I do not think it will do.

What is the use of attempting "to determine all questions of fact at issue" when they can determine nothing? What is the use of recording "its finding" when its finding binds nobody?

Come, then, to the House bill. I concede at the outset that any legislation in respect to railroads is in its nature tentative; it is bound to be so. Where we have a great complicated machinery as delicate in its operation as a watch, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, extending from the lakes to the Gulf, over all this broad land, with its connections and interconnections and arrangements with each other—when you have such a system as that, any attempt whatever at legislation, in its very nature, being as it is now new legislation, must be simply tentative. It can not be otherwise. But you want to start. If it be true, and of that fact I have no doubt, that there are grievances, and well-grounded and well-ascertained grievances, against the railroads, we should, if we have the power, remedy them. The great body of the people of the United States whose raw products or manufactured goods are shipped on these roads are, as we know most of them are, complaining, and especially so on the part of the agricultural community, who always work hard and still remain comparatively poor, while the high officers of railroads are growing fabulously rich. Men who a few years ago, within your memory and mine, were poor are now worth their ten, fifteen, or fifty millions of dollars. If we have the constitutional power, a remedy should be applied. On that point I beg to say that the House bill is in the spirit and letter of the Constitution in my judgment. While Congress has never exercised the power in the regulation of commerce to the extent provided in this bill, I am clearly of opinion that it is constitutional and would be upheld by the Supreme Court.

Recurring to the widespread complaint, I beg to say that where there is a gathering up of wealth from the great body of the community, and a transfer of that wealth into the hands of the few, there is necessarily complaint. That country is the happiest and most prosperous where wealth is equitably distributed among all the people—none very rich and none very poor. That country is in a dangerous attitude where the few are rich and the many are poor, and day after day we are getting more and more in that condition, and the people find that these railroads have a power over them which is absolutely enormous.

It is the height of unwisdom on the part of railroad companies to resist reasonable and fair legislation. It is to their interest, as to all, that justice to all be done. Why, sir, take the case of four, five, or six men in the city of New York, who can sit down and raise the price of transportation of your wheat 5 cents on the bushel in ten minutes. What does that mean? Millions of dollars transferred from the earnings of the people to their pockets. So they can, as they do, change the rate of freight, and put an additional dollar per bale on our cotton which we raise in Texas and the other Southern States, and which we send to New York and Boston and Liverpool. Suppose they raise that a dollar on the bale, and what does that mean for Texas? A million dollars on one single article; and they can do it in five minutes and you have not now the power to stop them, and they do it by the comparatively trifling increase of two mills or one-fifth of 1 cent on the pound. But that one-fifth of 1 cent per pound takes $1,000,000 out of the pockets of the people of Texas and transfers it to theirs.

These are grievances that strike at and touch the sense of justice of an honest man. Who will say that it is right to charge me as much for hauling a car from New York to where I live in North Texas at Paris as to haul it to Galveston, four hundred miles beyond? There is not any justice in that. No amount of fallacious reasoning can make any man believe that is right. That is one of the causes people have to complain of. And there is the charging of more for a short haul than for a long haul of the same character. That is not right.

Another is that where roads are competing, and thus a fair show for justice, they combine and pool their issues. Another is the buying up or leasing all roads by a few corporations. Take the roads of my State. You can not get into Texas from the north side or the east without passing over the roads of what is known as the Gould Southwest system. Every road which enters into the State of Texas on the north and east, except the Texas and New Orleans, from Houston to New Orleans, are under the same control.

In the town where I live when Mr. Thomas Allen controlled the Saint Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Road, leading from Saint Louis to Texarkana, and the Missouri Pacific and Missouri, Kansas and Texas, leading from Saint Louis to Denison, were under different control, the agents of both companies were there seeking for business to Saint Louis, and a very large business was done. Two weeks after that purchase was made of the Iron Mountain Railroad by the Missouri Pacific combination, away went up the price per car from Paris to Saint Louis. Was there any additional expense to the road? Before that purchase it was immaterial to our shippers which way they went out, whether by Texarkana or Denison, the price was the same; and yet as soon as the Iron Mountain Road passed under the same control and dominion as the Missouri Pacific system, the price per car went up. These are grievances that the people complain of.

So long as the roads were under different ownerships there was fair competition. After the purchase made the shippers were at the mercy of the Missouri Pacific combination.

It is just such things which produce discontent. The intelligent sentiment of the country is in favor of fair play, but it favors fair play all around the board.

But a short time ago, during the last cotton crop, when I was at home last fall, the price of freight on a bale of cotton was raised from Paris to New York a certain amount, I do not remember how much. What was the consequence? The day the new arrangement went into operation cotton buyers, as a matter of course, lowered their prices per pound on cotton. The people inquired the cause. There were the reports of the prices in Liverpool and in New York. Cotton had not gone down. The prices in these great markets were as good that day as the day before. Why, then, was it that cotton went down? The cotton buyers had to explain to them, "The reason why it has gone down is that freight has gone up."

Wherever this vast power is in the hands of any corporation it will be used unless there is some controlling power in law above the corporation. Recognizing as I do that railroads are a grand instrumentality of civilization, I look upon them as creatures of the law with special privileges and subject to lawful and just control. Like fire, which is one of the inestimable blessings God gave us; but you have got to control it, you must keep it in check, or it becomes your master. So, sir, railroads must be controlled by law the same as other natural or artificial persons. I would not favor any law to bear upon anybody which I thought oppressive. I believe the provisions of the House bill conservative and reasonable, and I think it would be a most unfortunate thing to let this Congress adjourn without some legislation in the right direction. I think this is in that direction.

I want to give railroad companies equal and exact justice, and alike with everybody else, neither greater nor less.

This bill ordinarily called the Reagan bill, the House bill, pursues the old-fashioned course as we all understand it; points out and makes unlawful certain acts which are specifically named in the bill, for a violation of which jurisdiction goes to the courts in the usual and ordinary way. That is the simple way of doing it. The grievances set forth in that bill are those which are recognized all over the land as being grievances. It is eminently a conservative bill.

I do not expect any bill to leap out of the brain of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] like Minerva out of the brain of Jove—perfect.

I do not expect that from the brain of any human being on earth. The question before the Senate is a complicated question. It is a knotty question. It is a difficult question, and the ablest lawyer in this land, the most experienced man in this land, is not disparaging his reputation by admitting it is difficult of comprehension. But where there are known causes of grievance let us begin with those. Here we have the constitutional power, as I think we have, and then as the years roll by experience will show what changes and additions to make. If we have gone too far in one place we can modify it; if we have left out some other important matter we can insert it. We can go on altering and amending until in the course of a few years we have a good and commendable system.

I do not know of a valuable statute in respect to an important controverted question on the books that is not the result of time and experience suggesting important changes. I know of no statute which has not had to be amended if it was one of great practical importance. The human mind is fallible. We can not reach out all at once. We have to take things by degrees, and this is especially true of a subject so vast and complicated as railroad management, and how far it may be justly controlled by law.

I believe that the commission system will do no good. It will be of no value. I believe that the House bill is a conservative bill. I can not point out its defects, if any, for I do not profess to be perfect in railroad information; but I do know that, as far as these points complained of are concerned, they exist. Now let us start with them. Let us give to the courts jurisdiction over these things which we declare to be unlawful, and let the courts proceed in the usual way. We create no new bodies. We do not create a commission which has vague, indefinite powers, and which amounts to nothing except to gather up data for the district attorney; and if it goes beyond that and becomes invested with jurisdictional power, then we have no right to erect that commission, unless at the same time we make it a court inferior to the Supreme Court which Congress may establish from time to time. We have that power, and you may call that court what you may, but whatever name you call it, it is a court if it has jurisdictional powers, and as a court its judges must hold during good behavior.

I do not doubt that everybody is sincere; but some of us honestly believe that there ought to be legislation and others doubtless honestly think there ought not to be. Some of us believe that the country thinks so—not the ignorant and thriftless, but the most enlightened men in this land. Men of ability, men of experience, men of large business throughout the United States believe there is a necessity for some control of railroads and that Congress has the power. Farmers, a very intelligent part of the body-politic, almost universally believe it. I believe it, and if we intend to begin there is no better time than now, and if we begin let us begin with a bill which will bring up the only conceivable question that can be brought before the courts as to the bill—that is to say, has Congress the constitutional power to regulate freight charges, &c., of railroads? That tests the whole question, for no one can say that if we have the power to declare these acts unlawful we have not the power to hand them over to the courts to hear and determine. That is the proper place for them, and there that will be the only question. That being settled affirmatively, we can go on improving the legislation here and there as time and experience dictate. If the bill is not broad enough, amend it. If it is too oppressive or too severe, amend it, and in the course of time we shall have, in my judgment, a fair system for the settlement of these grievances between the people and the railroad companies.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Texas will yield, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MAHONE. I ask leave to have printed an amendment which I desire to offer at the proper time to the substitute for the bill under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). The proposed amendment will be received and printed if there is no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 20, 1885.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ANTHONY EULOGIES.

Mr. ELLIS. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. CHACE. Pending that I ask now, Mr. Speaker, that the House assign 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon for the consideration of the Senate resolution in regard to the death of the late lamented Senator ANTHONY, of Rhode Island.

Mr. ELLIS. I hope there will be no objection to that.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HITT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for to-day, on account of important business.

LOCKAGE OF SAULT SAINTE MARIE'S CANAL.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of the Chief of Engineers in regard to the insufficiency of the lockage of the Sault Sainte Marie's Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

HOLDING LANDS BY ALIENS PROHIBITED.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back a bill (H. R. 5266) to prohibit aliens and foreigners from acquiring a title to or owning lands within the United States of America; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DRAWBACK ON DUTIES, ETC.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back the bill (H. R. 7651) to amend section 3019 of the Revised Statutes, relating to drawback on duties on imported material when manufactured and exported; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to dispense with the morning hour to-day.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

Mr. ELLIS. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SINGLETON. I trust the House will not resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the Indian appropriation bill at this time.

Mr. ELLIS. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. SINGLETON. I propose, if I can, to get up the Congressional Library bill this morning, and I hope there are friends enough of that measure who will assist me to take it up.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to ask, after the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana is voted down, if it will not be in order for me to move to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider the educational appropriation bill? I desire to say, if his motion is voted down, I will make that motion.

The SPEAKER. It would be in order to move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but not for any particular bill.

Mr. WILLIS. But I can indicate that is my object.

The question was put on Mr. ELLIS'S motion.

The SPEAKER. The noes seem to have it.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 103, noes 30.

Mr. WILLIS. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. ELLIS and Mr. WILLIS.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 125, noes 54.

So the motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House takes up for consideration the bill (H. R. 7970) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The first reading of the bill has been dispensed with, and the Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the committee I hope to make such an explanation of this bill as will perhaps prevent a good deal of debate in its passage when under consideration by paragraphs. The estimates for this branch of the public service for the fiscal year amounts to $7,328,049.64; the recommendations of this bill are for $5,664,135.80. The recommendations are therefore $1,663,914 under the estimates. The law of the current year provided $5,859,402.91; the recommendations of this year are $5,664,135.80; so that the recommendations of this bill are $195,267.11 below the law of the current year.

I would say the reductions are in the estimates for the support of the Indians. It has been the policy of the committee for several years to endeavor to make the Indian more self-sustaining, and for that purpose there has been a gradual decrease of the support given him by the Government, letting him know in this way that there was coming a time when he would be totally dependent on his own exertions, and therefore that it would behoove him by industry, by improving all the advantages about him, to become self-sustaining.

There is one exception to this general decrease in the estimates for the support of the Indians, and that is with regard to the Indians in Montana Territory. The items for the support of these Indians have been increased about $53,000.

Right here, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make an explanation personal to myself and personal to the committee. There has been a great deal of distress among the Indians in Montana Territory. The condition of these Indians in the winter of last year and in the early spring was pitiable indeed. They actually starved to death, some of them; many of them died for necessaries of life. When this condition was made known to the Committee on Appropriations in the early portion of the long session of Congress by estimates sent to us from the Indian Office, and as soon as the matter could be considered, the total amount asked for was promptly forwarded to them.

I would like to put on record, sir, what has been done for these Indians during the past four or five years. I hold in my hand a tabulated statement of the expenditures made for the support of the Montana Indians from and including the year 1881 down to 1885, the present year. In 1881 there was appropriated for their support the sum of $282,000. In 1882, we appropriated $267,000. In 1883, $277,000; in 1884, $343,000, and in 1885, $296,000. The appropriation for 1884 was originally fixed at $243,000. That appropriation was cut down because there was no complaint of any deficiency from the Indians, or that a certain state of facts existed in connection with them of which the committee was in ignorance. Hitherto the Indians in this Territory had been largely supported by game found upon their reservations, by the ordinary avocation of hunting. But without the knowledge of the committee, uninformed by the Department of any change in this condition of affairs, believing that the game which had entered so largely into their livelihood on the reservation in preceding years still existed, and in accordance with a well-settled and as we believed a wise policy on the part of the committee, their support was cut down for the year ending June 30, 1884. But the fact was that the game was gone. The buffalo had disappeared from the reservation; their crops had totally failed; and consequently, without any fault on the part of the Committee on Appropriations—the Committee on Appropriations of the last session of the Forty-seventh Congress—and without any knowledge on the part of that committee of this condition of affairs, inadequate appropriations were made. When this state of facts was made known to the committee of this Congress the committee promptly gave every dollar that was called for by the estimates. We appropriated the full amount of the deficiency estimated by the Department—that is to say, $50,000. The Senate increased the appropriation $50,000, which increase was promptly concurred in by this House.

When we came to frame the bill for the present year, we based it upon the appropriations for 1884 plus this deficiency for $100,000, believing that that sum would be ample. Notwithstanding that, however, we are again informed by the Department that there will be suffering among these Indians unless relief is promptly sent to them. Therefore, when the deficiency estimate reached the committee it was promptly considered, and on the 6th day of this present month the $50,000 deficiency asked for by the Department was immediately made available for the support of these Indians.

Notwithstanding these facts, a certain gentleman connected with the "Indian rights" department has seen fit to write me an open letter, and has seen fit to let loose upon my devoted head the anathemas of the press East and North—one Mr. C. C. Painter, I believe, a member of the Indian Rights Association, one of those self-constituted friends of the Indians, coming here by what credentials I do not know, appearing frequently before the committee and urging us to discharge our duty.

In the letter of Painter, which was published in the New York Tribune, appear the grossest misrepresentation and statements which he should have known were utterly and infamously false. I desire now, sir, to place on record here the full history of this matter in order that that gentleman, who is represented to be a minister of the gospel, may either inform himself properly before he undertakes to write a public letter to anybody, or else that he may refresh his memory with the story of Ananias. [Laughter.]

In the matter of education, Mr. Chairman, the increase in this bill over the law of the present year—that is, the amount of increase recommended by the present bill—is $20,200. I am glad to state to the committee that the report from all the industrial schools, from all the educational institutions of the United States where these people are being taught, is most satisfactory in its character. From every quarter we learn that the Indian is disposed to work, disposed to learn, and that in the large majority of cases they are making most commendable progress in education and the arts of civilized life. I believe that this work of education should be persevered in. I believe that it is one of the main essentials which are to give a permanent, peaceful, and civilized solution to this important question.

Some new legislation is recommended upon this bill, to which I shall now invite the attention of the committee. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs complains that the penalty attached to selling intoxicating liquors to the Indians is so low that men do not mind conviction, and that it does not result in breaking up the traffic. He reports that they are frequently arrested, frequently tried and convicted and sentenced to a day's imprisonment and $1 fine; that they stand the imprisonment, pay the fine, and then go on with their traffic; and we have been earnestly urged by him, and indeed by the voice of humanity in our own hearts, to increase the penalty so as to make it a terror to these people and endeavor to stop the liquor traffic among the Indians. It is necessary to do this, Mr. Chairman, for vain are all educational appliances and efforts, vain are all industrial schools, vain are all the soft and civilizing influences which may be brought upon him, and with which we endeavor to civilize the savage heart, if you permit men to go in their midst and infrenzy the devil in the savage nature, and pull him back to make a double savage of him.

Therefore, in accordance with the recommendation of the Department, we so amended and re-enacted a section of the Revised Statutes as to make this punishment the minimum. The section is amended and re-enacted so as to read as follows:

SEC. 2139. No ardent spirits shall be introduced, under any pretense, into the Indian country. Every person who sells, exchanges, gives, barters, or disposes of any spirituous liquors or wine to any Indian under the charge of any Indian superintendent or agent, or introduces or attempts to introduce any spirituous liquor or wine into the Indian country, shall be punishable by imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than two years, and by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $1,000.

And it goes on to re-enact the balance of the section. I believe the wisdom of the committee will sanction this change.

The Department urged upon us very strenuously—and I call the special attention of the committee to this—to give discretionary power to the President of the United States to disarm certain Indians within his discretion. The section which we propose reads as follows:

SEC. 8. That whoever shall furnish to any Indian, by barter, sale, gift, or exchange, any gun, rifle, pistol, or ammunition, or munitions of war, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years: Provided, That this provision shall not apply to the civilized tribes of the Indian Territory; and that the Secretary of the Interior may issue such permits to Indians for the purchase of arms and ammunition for sporting purposes as he may deem proper: And provided further, That the President of the United States may, in his discretion, disarm such Indians as in his judgment may seem best to preserve peace and prevent depredations. All arms thus taken shall be received by the Secretary of War, who shall report all arms received by him, from what tribe taken, and the just value of said arms; and Congress shall appropriate the requisite funds to pay for all arms taken, and said sum shall be paid to said tribe, and, as near as may be, to the original owners of said arms, or their heirs.

We believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is a wise and salutary provision. We believe that its very enactment will prevent depredations and disarm hostilities. We know that there are especially two tribes, the Sioux and the Northern Cheyennes, and that there are also the Apaches and Utes, all of whom are thoroughly armed with the best weapons of war; that they are by treaty stipulation provided with every thing they need by the Government; that they are indisposed to work; that there is no necessity for them to work, because they are supported by the Government under, I believe, unwise treaty stipulations; and they constantly realize the old adage that an idle brain is the devil's workshop, and they interfere with peaceable Indians, and are constantly threatening hostilities and depredations. We believe if they find out the discretion is with the President of the United States to disarm them, that fact itself will incline them to peaceful pursuits, and deter them from depredations on other Indians and on white settlements.

I desire now to call the attention of the committee to the claims of the Pottawatomies and Cherokees for unfulfilled treaty stipulations. By the treaty of 1868, the tenth article of the treaty, the United States bound itself to ascertain the difference between gold and currency, our treaty stipulations being to pay certain annuities to the Pottawatomies in gold; and in 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, and 1867 we paid their annuities in currency, when there was a great difference between the value of gold and currency. By article 10 of the treaty of 1868 the United States bound itself to ascertain the difference between gold and the currency thus paid, and to pay the same. In pursuance of that treaty we appointed a commissioner, who took into consideration the annuities paid to the Pottawatomies and the value of gold as compared with currency during those years; and he reported there was a balance due the Pottawatomies on this account of about $49,000.

By the same article of the treaty we bound ourselves to ascertain how much we owed them on account of unfulfilled treaty stipulations from 1819; ay, sir, from 1795 up to this time. That commission was appointed and ascertained that we owed those Indians $267,000. Now, my judgment is that that sum ought to be paid and that it ought to be appropriated for. It was found to be due by the commission constituted by us under our treaties and under our acts of Congress, and justice demands that it should be paid. But there was this trouble in the way, we did not know exactly what pro rata was due the several bands of this tribe. There is one band in Michigan, the Huron band; one in Kansas known as the Prairie band; another band in the Indian Territory known as the Citizens' band; still another band in Kansas, a portion of the Citizens' band. The committee was unable to determine what pro rata of these amounts should go to the respective bands. They therefore believed the whole matter should go to the Court of Claims for ascertainment of the facts and law, and finding out the proper bands to whom the sums should be paid.

The same difficulty existed with regard to the Cherokees on account of unfulfilled treaty stipulations with the Cherokees, from whom we obtained so magnificent a domain east of the Mississippi River. We appointed a commission in 1882 by a law which passed this House and the Senate and received the approval of the President to find out what balance we owed them; and that commission has reported that we owed them—all the Cherokees, the Old Settlers, the Cherokees east of the Mississippi River—somewhere in the neighborhood of $750,000, with interest during a long series of years. It is a matter which has arisen to torment us now, and which has assumed great proportions because of our violation of treaty faith with these Indians. Had we fulfilled our treaties with them and with the Pottawatomies and with the Cherokees, as we should have done year by year, this would not have come to vex our souls to-day.

But there was the same difficulty in the minds of the committee. We did not know what proportion of the amount so ascertained to be due should be paid to the respective bands of Indians, and therefore we have referred it to the Court of Claims that they may ascertain the facts and direct the payment in the proper way.

There is one other clause, the one in regard to claims against Indian treaty funds on account of depredations. In our treaties with all these Indians there are clauses providing that if they commit depredations upon the property of whites the cost of such depredations, ascertained and reported by the Interior Department, shall be paid out of the tribal or treaty funds. That provision has not been carried out. It has been neglected from year to year until those claims piled up in the Interior Department have grown to the large sum of $5,000,000, Congress neglecting from year to year to provide for their payment out of the tribal funds as stipulated in the treaties.

The United States Government is the trustee of those funds; the United States Government, with these claims acknowledged and with a provision made for their payment out of the tribal fund, has yet paid over that fund in full to the debtor, and therefore I believe that if the question ever comes before the courts it will be found that that action has rendered the United States responsible for every dollar of this indebtedness.

In regard to this matter the committee has provided that the Secretary of the Interior, before the next meeting of Congress, shall present to Congress a full statement of all these claims, the name of each claimant, his post-office address, the name of the tribe by whom the depredation was committed, the amount ascertained to be due, and the clause of the treaty which stipulates for the payment of the cost of such depredation; and when the next Congress shall be face to face with this question, and shall have all the facts before it, we believe it will recommend a pro rata payment from year to year, in order that these claims may be finally adjusted. But the committee, believing that the Indians should be made to remember the treaty obligations which bind them to pay for these depredations, has put in some few claims against the tribal funds. They are those which have been particularly urged by members of Congress, and there are, I suppose, twenty or twenty-five of those claims that have been put in here, more as a reminder to the Indians that the cost of these depredations must be paid out of their funds than for any other purpose. We hope and believe that, with all the facts before them, the next Congress will legislate intelligently and wisely upon this question and pave the way for its gradual and final settlement.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that is about all that I have to say in explanation of the clauses of this bill.

My own idea of this general Indian question—and this is the last time I shall present this bill here, my term of service being about to expire—my own idea is that the future legislator will find the solution of the Indian question in another way.

I believe that if a commission were appointed with power to go out into the Northwestern country, and from some of the territory of the United States select an Indian reservation similar to the present Indian Territory, but not so large, and then negotiate treaties with the tribes whereby they would all agree to abandon their present reservations and go to this new reservation, where you could concentrate your industrial schools, where you could concentrate your agencies, where you could concentrate your missions, where you could establish and concentrate depots of supplies, where the inspection, because of its narrower circuit, would be more rigid and thorough, where you could concentrate all the energies and all the appliances of your civilizing machinery, thus giving to the Indian the protection of courts and of law, and holding up before him the hope of civilization and citizenship—if that plan were adopted and carried out, I believe that in the course of ten or twelve years the Congress of the United States would not be called upon to sit in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering a bill for the support of any Indian tribe.

I believe that the Indians would become self-supporting, and that they would thus develop a capacity for citizenship which would lead to their organization first into a Territory, with Delegates upon this floor, and ultimately as a State to be admitted into this Union, with Representatives and Senators in Congress to take care of the interests of their people. I put this on record for the consideration of gentlemen who may follow me in the preparation of this Indian bill.

And now, Mr. Chairman, if there is any question that any gentleman desires to ask in relation to this bill, I will endeavor to give him such information as I can.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Louisiana what is the Indian population, exclusive of Alaska?

Mr. ELLIS. I think about 260,000.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. How much is appropriated by this bill for the education of the Indians?

Mr. ELLIS. One million nine thousand and forty dollars.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. That does not include appropriations made under the specific articles of treaties?

Mr. ELLIS. That is for the support of schools alone.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. But I find in this bill, in regard to each tribe of Indians, a specific appropriation for teachers and for schools, and then, outside of that, I find an appropriation of $1,011,000 for other educational purposes.

Mr. ELLIS. The bill appropriates for the support of schools $575,000. Added to that there is an appropriation of $20,000 for Alaska. Added to that, for the support of the industrial school at Arkansas City, there is $30,000; for the support of the Indian school at Carlisle, Pa., $76,000; for the support of one hundred Indian pupils at Saint Ignatius Mission school, Montana, $10,000; for the support of the Forest Grove industrial school in Oregon, $41,500; for the support of one hundred and fifty Indian pupils at Genoa, in Nebraska, $29,750; for the support of the school at Hampton, Va., $19,000; for the support of fifty Indian pupils at Lawrence, Kans., $66,300. Then there is an appropriation out of the unexpended balance for the support of schools for the year 1884 for the Indian industrial school for boys on the Flathead Indian reservation, $2,000. That is a deficiency. For the support of the Lincoln school at Philadelphia, Pa., there is appropriated $33,400. Then for the care and support of five hundred Indian pupils at other industrial schools there is an appropriation of $83,500; and for the transportation of Indian children to and from school (which is for educational purposes) the sum of $30,000.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Chairman, I find on looking over this bill that there is an appropriation of about $150,000 for the education of the different tribes coming under treaty stipulations, and, as stated by the gentleman from Louisiana, about $1,011,000 for other educational purposes.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that of an aggregate appropriation of five and a half million dollars for all Indian purposes about one-fifth is applied to education. Now, although I feel as kindly toward the Indians as can any member of the committee, and desire to see their educational facilities promoted, I think it out of all proportion that one-fifth of this sum of five and a half million dollars should be appropriated for educational purposes. I think the Committee on Appropriations must be at fault in proposing to appropriate such large sums of money for the education of the Indians at points so remote from where they reside. It does strike me that if the Government should keep up this policy of education these schools should be located nearer to where the Indians belong, thus saving at least that much to the Government on account of transportation. There is no kind of question in my mind that just as good schools could be established in Missouri, in Kansas, in Iowa, and in Nebraska as the schools which have been established in more distant portions of the country. I do not believe it correct policy that so much of the money appropriated for the Indians should be consigned to this particular use.

Without undertaking to criticise any further the details of this bill, I believe that the appropriations are not in general as specific as they should be made. I submit to the Committee on Appropriations for their future consideration that where they report an appropriation for the civilization of the Indians the amount of the appropriation for such purpose should be expressed, where they report an appropriation for the support of the Indians that amount should be stated, and so on. Many of the items in this bill appropriate from ten thousand to fifty or one hundred thousand dollars for the support, for civilization, for clothing, or for education of the Indians. It is impossible to take this bill and dissect it, as I attempted to do last evening, and determine how much is for the education of the Indians, because large sums of money in which education is included apply also to the support or civilization of the Indians. I think it would be wise policy on the part of the committee if they would in making up the appropriation bills specify what amount is designed for the support of the Indians, what amount for their education, what amount for clothing, what amount for hospital stores, &c., giving each item under its particular head.

By an examination of this bill it will be found there are thirty-five different paragraphs providing for the support and civilization of different tribes. Sometimes these paragraphs do not only include subsistence and civilization, but include the purchase of goods, education, clothing, medicine, medical attention, care of the aged and sick, and promotion of the comfort of the Indians. These different paragraphs aggregate within a fraction of $1,000,000, and embrace sums ranging from $4,000 to $10,000, $20,000, $40,000, $80,000 and as high in one clause as $390,000. So that it is impossible to determine from the reading of the bill what amount is appropriated for subsistence, what amount for civilization, or what amount for education, or for any particular purpose. These things ought to be corrected, so that we might know how much money was to be appropriated for particular purposes.

I have been gratified to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana in regard to the future of the Indians and what should be the effort of the Government in regard to them. While I concur fully with him in that respect, I think so far as the Indians are concerned there are other considerations of paramount importance to which Congress should give its attention. I believe the first great step to be taken toward the advancement of the Indians, where they are on reservations, is that those lands should be set apart to them in severalty, so that when they have improved and cultivated the land they may have a home which they may know is to be theirs and their children's. I believe this policy should be applied to every one of the Indian tribes where they are upon reservations. Their agents should be authorized to set apart a homestead for every single man and every head of a family. I believe this would be the first great step toward the civilization and improvement of the various Indian tribes of the country. Some of them are yet too wild and wandering in their habits, perhaps, to admit of such a policy, but as to two-thirds of them or the great bulk of them, I believe such a system would be advisable.

I know that the Indians themselves have made frequent applications to those friendly to their interests to see that they have homes set apart for them. In carrying out this policy the title of the lands may be reserved in the Government for a period of years—say twenty years; and after that time, if meanwhile the Indians had remained attached to their homes, had improved and cultivated them, then I think the title of the lands should be vested in the Indians themselves.

There is another proposition to which I desire to call the attention of the committee. We have heard much about the leasing of Indian lands for grazing purposes, and there are some investigations now going on in regard to that matter. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, the Indian Department ought to be charged with the duty of seeing that the different Indian tribes on reservations have the right, if they so desire, to lease a portion of their lands for grazing purposes. This would be in many instances the very beginning of making the Indians self-supporting. But any law which might be passed in that direction should be carefully guarded for the protection of the Indians. On the northern border of Texas, where are situated Cheyennes, Apaches, Arapahoes, Comanches, Kiowas, and Wichitas, and some other remnants of tribes, a large reservation has been set apart for their occupancy and use—much more than is needed or can be used or utilized at present by them.

It is excellent grazing and much of it fine agricultural land. Many of these Indians desire to be permitted to lease some of their lands for the purpose of grazing. Now, sir, if that power were given to the Secretary of the Interior and these leases could be made under the supervision of their agents it would be a great benefit to the Indians. For instance, there are multiplied millions of acres of land that they could lease from 8 to 10 and 12 cents an acre. They would be employed by persons leasing the lands as herders. They could thus learn the art of raising stock and taking care of it, as some of them on the northern border of Texas are now doing; that is, leasing their lands and acting as herders for those to whom the lands are leased without any authority of law for that purpose. They have been to the Department and asked the Secretary of the Interior for permission to lease their lands for the purpose indicated. The Secretary has no law under which he can authorize them to do it, and hence he has taken no steps in regard to it. Still, some of these Indians have leased their lands and have been employed by the men leasing them in taking care of their cattle as herders. Those Indians are prospering. From one of the Comanche chiefs I have a letter asking Congress to pass a law to allow him and other Indians to do this thing. I know him personally and I know his tribe. I know that he has accumulated quite a large stock of cattle for an Indian, and he has done so because he has been employed as a herder and sometimes takes his pay in cattle. He is increasing his stock, and I hope will become one of the cattle-kings of that country.

I submit this matter to the committee, and I trust the time will come when it will meet with the serious consideration of this body. By this means the Indians in a few years will become self-supporting and will no longer remain a charge upon the Goverment. If this policy should be adopted and care be taken to protect the rights of the Indians, by the time the treaty annuities have expired the Indians will become self-supporting. I trust the matter will be taken up and acted on favorably by Congress at an early day.

Mr. Chairman, in our legislation touching Indian affairs it should be kept in mind that there are different classes of Indians. Some have made much progress in civilization; others not so much, but have made a fair beginning; and still others who are entirely unwilling to change their savage habits.

The five civilized tribes, consisting of Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles, have advanced greatly in all the arts of peace, in matters of religion, education, agriculture, mechanism, and in commercial pursuits. All of these tribes have their governors, legislatures, their own judges, and enforcement of the laws. Their administrations in all respects are equal in character and dignity to that of any of the Territories of the United States. They have given special attention to the subject of education, and among these people will be found churches, school-houses, and academies that would be a credit to any State or community. These people are so far advanced that it is, in my judgment, money thrown away to keep an agent among them. They know their rights; they know their relations to one another and to the Government. All business transactions between them and the Government should be directly with their respective executive authorities without the cost and intervention of an agent. We should go a step further and declare them citizens of the United States and establish courts in their midst, and, with their consent, give them Territorial representation on this floor. Such a step would gradually and surely prepare the way to finally admit them as a State into the Union. At an early day of this session of Congress I introduced a bill having that object in view.

The lands are theirs, and the Government should not interfere in their disposition. They have demonstrated fully and completely their capacity for self-government, and should be encouraged to march forward in improvement until they attain a population sufficient to enable them to come into the Union as a State. When Texas was annexed she retained her public lands. These five civilized tribes should be allowed to manage their land affairs as to them may seem best, and derive all the benefits growing out of their own control and disposition of them. Such a policy pursued toward these Indians, and the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians on the reservations in the western part of the Indian Territory, would be a great inducement and incentive to them to turn their attention to stock-raising, agriculture, education, and religion.

The United States courts established among the civilized tribes should have jurisdiction over the wilder tribes. This policy would greatly facilitate the administration of the laws among the Indians and be a great economy to the Government. Gentlemen who are acquainted with the delay in trying causes originating in the Indian Territory, and the expenditures in the Department of Justice growing out of the fact of the remoteness of the courts from many portions of the Indian Territory, will readily understand what a great saving could be effected in the enforcement of the laws by establishing courts directly in the Indian Territory.

Mr. Chairman, if we expect to improve the Indians and induce them to become self-supporting, Congress should see that the money appropriated for them is honestly and fairly applied. Too much of the money should not be given for education. You should first teach the wild tribes to value stock, to utilize the luxuriant grasses that now go to waste, to become herders and stock-raisers and owners of herds. When the Indian realizes the value of stock he will very readily fall into agriculture, and by these means soon become self-supporting. You had far better give him this kind of an education; it will be of more use to him. I mean the recently wild Indian. When he has learned these things he will begin to value the school-house that has been erected at his home under treaty stipulations; and when the Indian children have made sufficient progress, then the brighter ones and those desiring better opportunities might be transported to better and more distant schools.

This bill appropriates in the neighborhood of $150,000 for schools at the agencies and on the reservations, and over a million dollars for education outside of their home schools. This, in my judgment, is a wasteful and almost useless extravagance. If this sum was applied to the purchase of goats and sheep and cattle, and honest, capable men employed to take charge of them and teach the Indians how to manage, control, and increase this stock, a far greater good would be accomplished for the Indians. They would thus learn to rely on their own exertions, and as they progressed in improvement would appreciate the advantages of an education.

Above all things, Mr. Chairman, in dealing with the Indians the faith of the treaties made with them should be sacredly maintained on our part, and they should be required to keep fully up to their obligations. The effort to make new treaties, to induce them to exchange their lands and seek new homes should not be encouraged, except in instances where their hostile course has required such action. They should be encouraged to become attached to their homes and to learn that by pursuing a peaceful and industrious life the Government would protect them from the greedy encroachments of the white man. It is by a just, firm, and humane policy on the part of the Government toward the Indians, a faithful compliance with every obligation, and a rigid requirement of compliance with treaties on their part that the peace of the frontiers is to be maintained and the welfare of these children of nature promoted.

A just and humane solution of the Indian problem invokes the highest order of American statesmanship. With the exception of the incursions of a few predatory bands who seek shelter in our sister Republic of Mexico, there is a more perfect state of peace existing on our Indian borders than at any former period of the country's history.

The present time, therefore, is peculiarly propitious for entering upon the serious consideration of this subject, and I indulge the hope that another session of Congress will not pass away without witnessing a marked change and improvement in the management of our Indian affairs.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman from Louisiana to give his attention to that part of the bill beginning with line 1164. I hardly think it is a legitimate objection to this particular year that one-fifth of the entire appropriation is for educational purposes. Of course that amount will vary from year to year. The very purpose of these appropriations for the education of the Indians is to render them independent of the Government, not only in regard to their support, but in regard to that education which is the means of making them self-supporting.

And I coincide with the views of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] that that education which is of the most value to the Indians and the most valuable to the people of the United States is that education which will enable them to become herders and take care of their grazing-lands. But we have not got so far as that yet, and we now appropriate money to educate these Indians in day schools, and reservation schools, and also in schools in other parts of the country.

But the question I wish to ask the gentleman from Louisiana is why it is necessary to appropriate only at the rate of $167 for each pupil in the various industrial schools scattered throughout the country at a distance from the reservations when other schools ask $175 a pupil.

I remember, Mr. Chairman, that I made an amendment to this bill last year by which that amount was raised to $200. It was adopted by the House, but was lost in some conference committee. The idea I had then and have now is that there is a certain advantage in educating the Indian child a good way off from the reservation. I remember when this bill was under discussion last year that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] told us that day schools on the reservations were comparatively valueless as compared with the boarding schools, because the Indians went to the school for a few hours and returned right back to his savage associates and so lost the benefit of that association which he had while in school. And it occurs to me that that argument would apply with greater force to placing Indians in schools a thousand miles away from the reservations, for although the child cannot receive better instructions, he does get a certain advantage which he can not have on the reservation.

Of course I do not desire to move an amendment for the purpose of having it voted down, but I should be glad to have the gentleman from Louisiana explain as to whether the number of children provided for in the section to which I have called his attention is greater than the number provided for in the bill of last year.

Mr. ELLIS. It is the same, exactly the same. This provision, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, simply permits any already established industrial school to take the Indian children, and allows $167 per capita for that purpose. It is not the establishment of an Indian school; but, as I have said, if any already established institution desires to take Indian children and will take them at that rate, it may do so under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I am aware that that is the object of the provision in controversy. I simply desire to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact, that if what I have said be true there is a strong motive on the part of the people of the United States why that particular class of schools should receive inducements to provide for these children; and I will ask him whether there would be any objection to allowing an amendment to this bill raising the amount to the same amount that is given to other industrial schools engaged in this work?

Mr. ELLIS. I suspect that there would be very serious objection from various members of the Committee on Appropriations, as well as a strong protest on behalf of the Treasury of the United States against making such an increase. It was the amount allowed in the current year, the bill of last year for this purpose, and the Department has asked no increase of that amount. Many Indian children are now being educated at that rate.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Do I understand that this is the amount asked for by the Department?

Mr. ELLIS. The exact amount that has been asked for.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, I generally agree with the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] as to the Indian policy, and the necessity of giving to the Indians their lands in severalty. But I entirely disagree with him now in regard to the policy which is adopted in reference to the leasing of the Indian lands. I hold, sir, that it is not in accordance with the policy of this Government, or with any good policy, that the Indians should be allowed to hold a large amount of unnecessary lands and lease them at their will to cattle syndicates or cattle-kings at merely nominal sums as they do now. There is an investigation now going on which shows by what means large tracts of country have been leased in this manner through certain influences and for nominal amounts; leases whereby certain of these cattle syndicates or rings have secured an immense monopoly and for a paltry sum of money.

The Crow reservation, for instance, in Montana, contains over 4,000,000 acres of land. A little while ago a cattle company from Kansas, Colorado, or somewhere else, went there and negotiated a lease for over 3,000,000 of acres of these lands at a rate of $30,000 a year, which lease would have been perfected and carried into execution by the Interior Department but for the fact of the general clamor which was raised against it in this country. Now, if the policy of leasing these Indian lands was to obtain at all, there are men engaged in this business legitimately, cattle-owners, cattle dealers throughout that region of country, who stand ready to give three, yes, five times as much for the use of this property as I have named; and, therefore, if the policy of making these Indian leases is to obtain at all instead of permitting parties to go there and negotiate underhand and privately with the Indians, let the Department take the matter in charge and the lands be leased, after advertisement, to the highest bidder.

But I hold, sir, that is not the line of policy for this Government to pursue at all. The Indians should be given all the lands they want for agricultural and grazing purposes and no more, and the remainder of these vast reservations, which are entirely useless to them and which are the homes of lawlessness, should be cut off, should be segregated, taken from them, and returned to the public lands of the Government, and let the Government put out the money at interest as a trust fund for the benefit of the Indians. That is the policy that should commend itself to all as a wise one for the benefit of the Indians. It will not be contended that it is not better for the Indian, and also more in harmony with the line of policy pursued by this Government; and if we ever adopt any policy on this subject at all, I trust it will be to withdraw these lands from any possibility of being leased—to forbid, in fact, these leases to grazing companies entirely.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I agree, Mr. Chairman, in the main with the remarks of the gentleman from Montana, except in so far as he opposes the policy of leasing these lands. Now, as a matter of course, if the lands are to be leased, it should be under a careful supervision of the law to protect the rights of the Indians. They should not be permitted to lease their lands for a nominal sum, say for 2 or 3 or 4 cents an acre, when they could just as readily lease them for 10 or 15 cents. I do not mean this remark to apply to the five civilized tribes, because the land is theirs, and they should be left free to manage their own affairs. I would throw around wilder tribes all the restrictions and guards to protect them; but it must be remembered that an Indian can not live on as small a spot of land as a white man can.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I do not claim that. It is no part of my argument.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. They have these lands under treaty agreements in exchange for lands in other localities. They have been set aside for their use under the treaty stipulations.

But there are many millions of acres of land more than they actually need; and sufficient would be left to be employed for their own agricultural and grazing purposes, and millions of acres could be leased for their benefit, the proceeds of which should go directly to the tribe.

I hold it would be of the greatest advantage to them to encourage the rearing of stock; and it is the only way I see in which they can be induced to engage in that pursuit. You must make them herders before you make them tillers of the soil. After you have made them herders and tillers of the soil you can then expend your millions for education with some prospect of advantage. But until they increase their stock and become herders and cultivators of the lands, the money given for education by the million of dollars which you appropriate from year to year will be thrown away and squandered.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, there are in connection with this Indian question problems very difficult of solution. The question of educating the Indian and successfully solving the Indian problem by that method, while the tribal relation is maintained, is one that is seriously doubtful. No one can doubt the success of the efforts that have been made to educate the Indians outside of the tribal influences. It has been found that educating the Indian in the midst of civilization advances him much more rapidly than any effort that ever has been made to educate him in his tribe, and hence schools have been established in several of the States, where the Indian is taught the several industries as well as mere book education. But the difficulty has been to some extent that when we educate children at Carlisle, in Pennsylvania; at Hampton, in Virginia; at Chiloco, near the northern boundary of the Indian Territory; at Lawrence, Kans.; at Genoa, Nebr., and the other industrial schools in the several States—when we have taught them there for three or four years, have fitted them for the duties of civilization to a very large extent, prepared them so that they could go out into civilized life and obtain a livelihood, we are constrained to turn them loose and turn them back into the influences of that barbarism from which we took them when we put them in the schools. It is not long before they succumb to those influences and become exactly what their surroundings are, and lapse back into that barbarism from which they were taken.

These are some of the difficulties that we are encountering in our efforts to civilize the Indian by the educational method which we have adopted; but they are not sufficient to discourage the country from pursuing that method. The evil lies very largely in permitting those tribal influences to obtain. The influence of the tribal relation ought not to be permitted, in my judgment, to exist except in cases of absolute necessity. I believe that in conjunction with the system of education which has been adopted and which ought to be extended we ought as far as practicable and as fast as practicable to destroy the tribal relation. I believe that we ought to extend the laws of the white man over the Indian as far and as rapidly as it is practicable to do so. I believe that what he needs of the lands which he holds now in common ought to be set apart to him in severalty and the surplus opened to settlement.

I concur in some of the remarks made by my friend from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS]. I do not believe it is for the best interests of the Indian, and I believe it to be contrary to public policy, to allow him to hold a large portion of the public domain, or, if you please, of his own domain, for no other purpose under heaven than to roam over it. In the Indian Territory, a section of country capable of sustaining a population of four or five millions of people, we have now—what? Eighty-two thousand Indians occupying the whole of that Territory. For what purpose? What good purpose does it subserve to the Indian? It rather detracts from his civilization. It encourages that roaming disposition which is the characteristic of the savage. He does not cultivate the soil. It lies there useless to him and useless to mankind. I would not take one rod of it from him without affording him the fullest compensation for it. I would treat with him fairly for all that he does not need for his own purposes, and the balance I would open up to settlement in a way that would place him side by side with the white man engaged in the cultivation of the soil, that his children at least might find employment in the industries surrounding him, and that he might thereby be in the very midst of the active forces and influences of our white, industrious civilization without power to alienate his land, except possibly to rent a portion of it for brief periods for a share of the soil products.

I do not care to occupy the time of the committee further just now. I desire to press on and pass this bill. But I wish to add one other word. Much has been said about leasing these lands. It is said that they could be leased for a much larger sum. I have no doubt of it. But if you are going to retain these lands in their present condition, then it is high time that Congress adopted some regulation for leasing them temporarily, if you please, subject always to the disposition of Congress, that they may be subserving some useful purpose to mankind and be of some benefit to the Indians.

It is true, as the gentleman from Montana has said, that some of these leases have been procured at a sum below what they perhaps ought to have been procured for. But take the case he alludes to in Montana. The gentleman informs us that somebody somewhere has attempted to lease a portion of these lands and pay these Indians $30,000 per annum for it. That I believe is in pursuance of a law enacted two years ago. He tells us that sum is inadequate. That may be, sir. But the fact is the Indians have held that Territory all these long years, and the grasses have rotted upon the ground upon which they grew without producing one dollar either to the Indians or anybody else.

Had this temporary provision been made to allow these Indians to reap the benefit of this $30,000, while I do not approve of that if they are entitled to more, still they would be reaping that much, they would be gathering that much money from grasses which would otherwise rot on the ground, and for which in the past they have not realized and are not now realizing one dollar.

All this in my judgment, however, ought to be regulated by law, and this large public domain now occupied by the Indians of this country ought to be subserving some good purpose for mankind and some better purpose than it has subserved hitherto for the Indian. Why, sir, we have 244,400 Indians in this country to-day, occupying 135,900,000 acres of land, over five hundred and fifty acres per capita; for the man and his wife 1,100 acres; for the man and his wife and one child 1,600 acres; and if you take a family of seven, over 3,800 acres. And yet that land is subserving no good purpose either to the Indian or to anybody else, for he does not cultivate it, and the game which once supported him, in whole or in part, has almost wholly disappeared from it.

I wish to say just one word more on a point of almost supreme importance. I wish to refer to the Indian Territory again for a moment. It is a most tempting field for settlement by the white people of this country. A portion of it is believed by a vast number of the people of this country to be part of the public domain—that portion of it known as Oklahoma. What is the result? The result is that white settlers have poured in there from every section and possessed themselves of that country. They believe they are there rightfully under the law. The administration believes they are there in violation of law. The Army has been sent there repeatedly to remove them, and the Army is there now for the purpose of removing them by force from that Territory; and if we are correctly advised by the public press the settlers have reached the point where they have concluded to let the Army of the United States shoot rather than remove or be removed from what they seem to regard as their homes. This is a question—and I am glad to address you [Mr. WELLBORN in the chair] as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs—of supreme moment and one to which I now invite the attention of your honorable committee.

I think it time that your honorable committee brought before this House some proposition for the solution of this problem, for civilization is pressing upon that Territory on nearly all sides. On the Kansas side settlements have crowded clear up to the border. So it is on the Arkansas side; so it is on the Texas side pretty largely; and so it is on the Missouri side. Something must be done in order that we may avoid a condition of things which, to say the least, would not be creditable to the people of this country.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I understand that there are settlers, or persons claiming to hold leases, occupying those lands now under the permission of the Government.

Mr. RYAN. I am very glad my friend asked that question. In reply I want to say that there is not a rod of the Oklahoma country claimed by any lease of any sort whatever.

Mr. BLAND. Are there not parties there having lands fenced in for cattle ranges?

Mr. RYAN. I think not in the Oklahoma country.

Mr. PERKINS. There may be some settlers there.

Mr. RYAN. Yes. As I stated awhile ago persons have gone upon those lands to settle under a claim of right, and those settlers may have put up fences around their homes to some extent, but beyond that I am not advised that any portion of that section of the Territory has been fenced. I understood the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to inquire particularly whether those lands had not been fenced in by cattle-men for range purposes.

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. RYAN. In reply to that I have to say that I have never received any information that that portion of the Indian Territory has been under fence at all, and certainly no portion of it is under lease.

Mr. BLAND. Then the portion of those lands which the Government is seeking to dispossess those people of never has been leased?

Mr. RYAN. No, sir.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to say anything more at this time.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] a single question before he takes his seat. I want to know whether the settlers proposing to go into this Cherokee country have any color of right or title to go there at all?

Mr. RYAN. That is purely a question of law. The settlers claim that they have a lawful right to go there. They claim that the lands belong to the United States; that that portion of the Territory is public land. I, for my own part, have no need now either to affirm or deny their right. The fact is, I believe that the region in question, the Oklahoma section, is a portion of the lands that were ceded to the United States in 1866 by the Seminole tribe of Indians and by the Creeks.

Mr. PERKINS. And by the Cherokees.

Mr. RYAN. No; the Seminoles and Creeks ceded the Oklahoma section.

Now, it is claimed by the Government that the Indians ceded that region to the United States for a specific purpose, namely, to locate friendly Indians there; and doubtless that was the policy of the Government, that was the purpose for which it wanted those lands in 1866. But subsequently the Government changed its policy with regard to locating Indians in the Indian Territory, and, if my recollection serves me right, it was in 1875 that Congress passed a law prohibiting the settlement of any more Indians in the Indian Territory. The parties now going in there claim that the purpose for which the Government obtained those lands no longer existing, the lands have become a part of the public domain, subject to settlement. Whether that theory be right or wrong, the importance of the subject can not be overestimated; and again, sir, I would appeal to your honorable committee to take early action upon it. I introduced a bill in the beginning of this session with a view to opening that portion of the Territory to settlement, it being no longer owned, occupied, or used by the Indians for any purpose; and it is upon that bill that I now invite the action of your honorable committee—not that it is perfect, not that it is necessarily right, but that it may form the basis of some action that will solve this difficulty.

Mr. STEELE. As I understand it, all that the settlers ask is a judicial decision of the question. Is not that so?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] has been recognized. Does he yield the floor?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I yield for a question, not for a speech.

Mr. RYAN. My information may be incorrect, but I understand that when the troops were first sent into the Territory, and when they arrested those settlers that had gone upon this Oklahoma section, some of the leaders, among them one Captain Payne, since deceased, were arrested and turned over to the civil authorities; and I am informed that they were turned loose by the courts without ever reaching any judicial determination of the question.

Mr. STEELE. That is what the settlers desire—a judicial decision of the question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, it has been my good fortune to travel through that portion of the Indian Territory through which the railroad runs. No one unfamiliar with the conditions of population incident to that Territory can appreciate without seeing it the remarkable condition of affairs existing there. Population, settlement, houses, improved farms continue up to the very line, and then, as if you approached some land peculiarly afflicted so that human beings could not exist there, all these evidences of civilization cease as if by magic, and you see no more of them, except a few settlements along the line of the road, until you reach the Texas frontier. All this time you have been passing through as grand and beautiful a land as there is in this country, but a land almost bereft of population. Gentlemen who have passed through the Territory in other directions have found the same singular condition of things. I can not on this occasion refrain from referring to this subject, for I feel that this Indian question has reached a point where it must be taken hold of by Congress, not alone for the purpose of taking care of the Indians, but also for the purpose of taking care of our poor white and colored people.

Some few days ago we heard these would-be leaders of political sentiment on the two sides of this House standing up here and attempting to explain to the country the cause of the suffering in our large cities, the cause of so many mills being idle and so many men out of employment. They need not imagine that they deceived the people for one instant. The workingmen of this country realize most clearly that the solution of the marvelous growth of labor-saving machinery and the consequent displacement of labor is to be found only in encouraging your workmen to leave your cities, the hot-beds of vice and corruption, and settle on the public lands, where they can earn a livelihood by their labor, where contentment is the result of honest toil and the gaunt wolf of hunger is seldom seen at the door.

This is the only solution of the question, and while you may undertake to account for the present depression of labor by the assignment of local causes, yet we find that the same condition of things exists throughout the world. Your newspaper of yesterday brought you the intelligence of one of the largest public meetings ever held in the city of London, at which the representative of the land question, Henry George, addressed thousands of people, and there the same cry went up, "The land for the people!" For they realize that in no other direction is there any future for the labor of the world. You may resort to temporary makeshifts, but the only secret of happiness in any country is by increasing the number of the owners of the soil. France today owes her prosperity more to the fact that 6,000,000 of her people are owners of the soil than to any other agency.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I realize that no sense of justice will tolerate an empire or territory like the Indian Territory, rich in soil, most glorious in climate, to remain a waste, beyond any possible hope of ever being fully occupied or cultivated by the Indians, a vast domain left there subject to the rapacity and speculation of every combination of thieves or "rings" that can enter into that Territory to make nefarious bargains with those Indians. Hundreds of thousands of acres are leased for a nominal sum, and for many years, by this syndicate or that; and while hundreds of thousands of our people are clamoring for the opportunity to obtain homes, that opportunity does not exist because the great mass of your lands that should be open to settlement and cultivation are already controlled and owned. You have but little arable public land outside of the Indian country. Treaties within proper limits should be respected, but this idea of the sacredness of Indian treaties should not be carried to the verge of idiotic sentiment.

You should do substantial justice to the Indians; you should set apart as much land for them as they can use; you should compel them to be cultivators of the soil or in some way to earn a livelihood for themselves by legitimate, honest labor, instead of leading a wandering, nomadic life. You should recompense them for whatever land you may take from them. But the Indian lands not required for the use of the Indians, together with every foot of public land, should be reserved for actual settlers only.

This is the only solution of the labor question. I refer to this matter because of my honest conviction that now, when you realize that there is a glut in the labor market, that famine stalks broadcast through your land, that there is no hope of fully providing employment for your working classes, your minds should be turned toward this question to see whether or not greater aid and encouragement can not be extended toward our workingmen to enable them to become cultivators of the soil. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to trespass upon the attention of the committee for more than a few minutes; but in connection with some suggestions which have been made here I wish to present some resolutions which were adopted at a meeting held in my own Congressional district, and which relate in part to the subject we have been discussing.

While it may not be entirely pertinent to this bill, yet it is appropriate for this House to inquire into the condition of the lands in the Indian Territory, and particularly the section known as the Oklahoma country. In consequence of the peculiar condition of that land it has attracted the attention of the entire country. Settlers have gone there by hundreds, and though they have been evicted by the Government, yet they have persisted in their efforts and are going there to-day in larger numbers than ever.

Prosecutions have been instituted by the Government against some of these men as wrongdoers, but in every instance I think the prosecutions have failed and the intruders have been discharged without punishment. This has been in part, as I understand it, because the courts have held there is no legislation under which these men can be prosecuted or punished as trespassers. And hence we find ourselves in this somewhat anomalous position: we find the Government owning this great area of land, the Indians having ceded it to the United States, and yet declaring through its executive department that settlers must not go there to make homes for themselves, and that all so going shall be evicted as trespassers and wrongdoers.

It does not belong to the Indians; it is not a source of revenue or profit to the Government, and the edict is that the progressive pioneer shall not look upon this fair land with a covetous eye and make there a home for wife and little ones because of some peculiarity or provision of the treaty under which the Indian title was extinguished.

As has been suggested by my colleague [Mr. RYAN], quite early in this session a bill was introduced by him providing for the opening of that country to homestead settlement. That bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, a committee of which I had the honor to be a member, and that bill was referred to me as a subcommittee. Realizing the importance of the proposition or measure, and by direction of the committee, that bill has been referred to the Interior Department for the views of that Department, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has expressed his views in writing; but in consequence of the absence of the Secretary of the Interior that communication has not yet reached our committee. It is withheld for the action of the Secretary, the Assistant Secretary deeming it of such importance that the chief of the Department should be consulted rather than that action should be taken in his absence. I make this statement in vindication of our committee as well as for the information of the House and the public.

As has been suggested, Mr. Chairman, there are hundreds of settlers now on that land asking that they may be protected there, asking that they may be given the privilege of making homes there; yet an armed force of the Government is marshaling and is going there to evict them.

In 1866 that land was ceded to the Government of the United States, but ceded, as the Indians claim, for a particular purpose; ceded in order that freedmen and friendly Indians might be settled there. That was the specific purpose, I confess, for which the Indians ceded that land to the Government of the United States. But, as has been stated, it is not available for that purpose, and these white settlers desire it as homes. The Government takes the position, as I understand, that it is powerless without legislation or treaty negotiations to open it to settlement. Under these circumstances, either as a part of this bill or as independent legislation, we should have the action of this House.

If it can be had here properly I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee having this bill in charge to this important question, that we may incorporate into it the necessary provisions looking to the opening of that country to homestead settlement. In consequence of the limited term of this session of Congress, it is not probable we can get it by independent legislation, and if we can get it here by a proper amendment to this bill it seems to me we should have it.

The Indians, I repeat, claim we have not the right without further treaty negotiations to open this land to settlement. They claim, as I have already said, that it was ceded by them for a particular purpose, and not to allow white men to occupy it and to come in contact with the Indians and to take from them, as they fear, many privileges which they now possess. It is not occupied for cultivation or other purposes by the Indians. It is not occupied by men claiming it under Indian leases. The Indians have no jurisdiction over it. They ceded their title to the Government in 1866 for the purpose, as they claim, of settlement by freedmen and friendly Indians; and hence the embarrassment to the Government and the necessity of action. I desire to say one word more in connection with these leases which have been discussed here. The Indians are not receiving from those lands what the occupation of the land is worth, but that is not entirely in consequence of combinations formed or of advantages taken, but is largely because of the peculiar tenantcy of these lessors.

If there were some law, if there were some provision of treaty or statute giving them the right to go there and under which they could be protected in these leases, the Indians would realize much more from them and the lessees would be much better pleased. And the little they do realize is to be charged to the fact there is no certainty of tenure. Because of the uncertainty of these leases the men holding them, not knowing whether they will be permitted to remain there thirty days, or six months, or a year, whether they may be driven out at once, are not willing to pay more than they do for the privileges they enjoy. As a consequence of this uncertain tenure, the Indians do not realize more from their lands; and while, Mr. Chairman, I do not advocate this system of leases, if it is to prevail or is to be permitted it should be open to all, and should be regulated by wise and wholesome statutory provisions.

And, Mr. Chairman, if we can get, in connection with this bill, because we can not get at this short session as independent legislation, if we can get provisions of the character I have suggested incorporated into this pending Indian appropriation bill upon these two important subjects, it will be important and of great benefit, not only to the Indians but to the country. And, as a part of my remarks, I desire to have read the proceedings of a meeting held quite recently in my own Congressional district. Other meetings of a like character have been held in other portions of the State; and, to show the feeling of our people, I ask to have them read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOWARD, KANS., January 10, 1885.

At a meeting of the citizens of Howard and vicinity, held at the court-house, the following proceedings were had and the following resolutions were adopted:

The meeting was called to order by L. Scott, and, on his motion, B. L. Brush was elected chairman. John W. Marshall was elected secretary. Some very able speeches were delivered by B. L. Brush, L. Scott, J. F. Lewis, W. D. Parker, H. S. Douthitt, J. M. White, D. W. Dunnett, S. B. Oberlender, and others on the question of opening Oklahoma and the rights of the people to settle therein.

The following resolutions were adopted as an expression of the sense and desire of the meeting:

Whereas the armed forces of the United States have been directed against peaceable citizens that have entered on public lands in the Indian Territory, known as Oklahoma: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we denounce as an outrage the treatment of loyal American citizens, who are striving to make homes for themselves and their families on lands belonging to the people of the United States; and we further denounce it as the grossest injustice to the people of those States that border on the Indian Territory.

Resolved, That we are opposed to the policy of the Government in using the Army to drive out or interfere with actual settlers upon any of the public domain, as being foreign to the genius of our institutions.

Resolved, That we demand that the armed forces of the United States be immediately withdrawn from Oklahoma, and that all American citizens, that so desire, be allowed peaceably to enter these lands, under no restrictions whatever, other than those that would be found in any other part of the public domain.

Resolved, As this self-same, bold spirit, that is now advancing to the front, has ever existed since the Pilgrim Fathers set their feet on Plymouth Rock, and will ever exist so long as we remain true citizens of this grand Republic, that we, the citizens of Howard and vicinity, pledge ourselves to firmly support this grand element—the van-guard of civilization.

Resolved, That the leasing of any public lands to cattle-men is in direct violation of the laws of the United States and rights of the people, and we demand that all such leases be immediately canceled.

Resolved, That we denounce the inaction of our Representatives and Senators concerning said lands, and that we demand of them to use all means in their power to secure the proper recognition of the rights of the people in this matter from the Government of the United States, and for the faithful performance of this duty we hold them responsible at the ballot-box.

Resolved, That we are opposed to the settlement of any more bands of wild Indians in the Indian Territory.

Resolved, That our Representative, B. W. PERKINS, be requested to present to Congress the sentiments of our people upon this question, and to use all honorable means in his power to secure the necessary legislation at this session of Congress.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of our Representatives in Congress, to the head of the Department of the Interior, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, and to the President of the United States.

It is the sense of this meeting that the Democrat and Courant publish these resolutions, and that the remaining county papers copy the same.

Much enthusiasm existed during the adoption of the above resolutions.

On motion of W. D. Parker to appoint a committee on organization, W. D. Parker, Robert Shelby, S. B. Oberlender, Thomas Greenwood, and B. L. Brush were appointed as such committee, to report at the next meeting of the people.

Adjourned to meet at the court-house on Saturday, January 17, at 7 o'clock p. m.

B. L. BRUSH, Chairman.
JOHN W. MARSHALL, Secretary.

Mr. SHIVELY. Let me ask the gentleman from Kansas to state at whose request or instigation the Army is being used to dispossess those settlers in Oklahoma?

Mr. PERKINS. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that my understanding is that it is at the instigation or suggestion of one of the Departments of the Government. Whether at the suggestion of the Interior Department or the Department of Justice I do not know, but my understanding is, as suggested heretofore in my remarks, the Administration takes the position that without additional treaty negotiation, or without further legislation, it is the duty of the Government to protect that land from occupation by settlers. It is in consequence of this position taken by the Government that this military force was sent out there to evict the settlers, who from time to time have undertaken to establish homes there, the Government thinking it to be a duty to the Indians to protect those lands from occupation until the Indians themselves cede them to the Government for purposes of settlement and for occupation by the pioneers. That is the position of the Administration, and it is in accordance with that position, as I understand it, that these troops have been sent there.

Mr. CUTCHEON. May I ask the gentleman from Kansas a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to ask if it is not true that proclamation has been made from time to time by the executive department of the Government forbidding settlers to go upon these lands at all?

Mr. PERKINS. There have been, I understand, such proclamations from time to time; and not only that, but armed forces have been sent each time when the proclamations were issued to evict these settlers. But when the intruders have been arrested and taken into the court the courts have decided that they can not be prosecuted as trespassers, for the reason that there is no legislative enactment providing that they shall be so tried, or fixing a penalty or declaring it to be an offense. That being the case, we find ourselves in this anomalous position: the men who go there can not be prosecuted as intruders, and yet they are evicted as trespassers, while the land is public and belongs to the General Government.

Mr. LONG. Acquired for a specific purpose.

Mr. PERKINS. The land is public land of the United States, acquired for a specific purpose. It is there, an inviting field for settlement to the pioneers. They go there and ask to be permitted to make homes, but are not allowed to do so. Now, if we can give them legislation which will enable them to do this it is important that such steps should be taken and these restrictions removed. Each month almost, I may say each day, these complaints will recur until provision is made and until some opportunity is given for the occupation of that land in a legal way. It is because of this anomalous condition that I have brought it now to the attention of the committee. I have been personally to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and have conferred also with the Secretary of the Interior on this subject in connection with this contemplated legislation, urging action upon the part of the Department so that we may be informed and the machinery of legislation put in motion here to the gratification of the country.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a word upon this subject of the Oklahoma lands, because it is a part of this great Indian question, although perhaps not strictly germane to the bill under consideration; and yet I submit the discussion comes in here most pertinently, pertaining as it does to our Indian policy.

It is manifest, from what has been said by the gentleman from Kansas who has just taken his seat, that this land formerly was indisputably the property of the Indian tribes, the Creeks and Seminoles, I believe; that they have never parted with their title in that land, except for a specific purpose; that it has never been restored to the public domain in any proper or ordinary sense of the word, and that whatever title the United States took from the Indian tribes it took not in fee-simple, but simply as trustee—a trustee for a specific purpose; and that land can not be diverted from that trust except by the consent and stipulation of the parties creating the trust—that is to say, the Indian tribes themselves.

Now, that is the situation of affairs. This land, I declare, in my judgment and in the judgment of the Department of the Interior, as I understand it, and of all the Executive Departments of this Government, is not a part of the public domain. It is a parcel of land that the Government of the United States holds simply as trustee for certain Indian tribes for a specific use. Now, if the United States desired to put this land to that specific use, it has the right to do so. If they wish to settle upon it friendly Indians and freedmen, it is their privilege to do so. But when it goes beyond that it departs from the trust which has been committed to it, and violates its treaty obligations. This illustrates in a great measure our habitual methods of dealing with the Indians. We make treaties, and we make agreements with them, and then the people, not the Government so much as we individual citizens, turn around and violate these obligations. These settlers have gone in there and taken possession of the lands upon the plea that they desired to make homes upon them. But they have gone with the full knowledge and understanding that they are trespassers, and also that they had no legal rights there. They have gone there against the repeated warnings and proclamations of the Executive Departments of this Government. They are liable to be evicted by armed force; because in the absence of law—in the absence of any municipal or Territorial law or regulation by which they are to be evicted—there is no other force to be used except the military force of the Government. There is no sheriff with his posse comitatus to arrest and remove them; and there is no means of removing them except the Government shall use the military force.

It seems to me, sir, to be a very simple proposition. That Territory ought to remain in statu quo until there has been a recession to the United States free of all trust, or else the United States should preserve it free from invasion by lawless citizens.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, the time having now arrived which was fixed by the previous order of the House for the consideration of resolutions respecting the memory of the late Hon. JOHN H. EVINS, a member of this House from the State of South Carolina, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Indian appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

EULOGIES ON HON. JOHN H. EVINS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House this hour, 2 o'clock, has been set apart for the consideration of resolutions in relation to the death of a late member of this House from the State of South Carolina. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, the 20th of January, at 2 o'clock p. m., be fixed as the time for delivering tributes to the memory of the late Hon. J. H. EVINS, late a Representative from South Carolina.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOHN H. EVINS, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that fitting tribute may be paid to his memory.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect, the House shall, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. Speaker, these resolutions are offered for the consideration of the House that we may perform a sad duty to departed worth; that we may do honor to one who has occupied a seat on this floor for several successive terms. His career in this House is best known to the honorable gentlemen who were associated with him here, and is confidently intrusted to their care. In the exercise of the melancholy privilege claimed by myself on this occasion, I speak necessarily rather from the standpoint of the constituents of my distinguished and lamented predecessor, of those who knew him as boy and man at home, and who attested their appreciation by repeatedly returning him to this truly important field of service.

JOHN HAMILTON EVINS was born in Spartanburg District, South Carolina, on the 18th day of July, 1830. His father, Samuel Evins, being a man of ample means, gave his son the benefit of a good academic and collegiate course. Mr. EVINS graduated at the South Carolina College in the class of 1853, and at once began the study of the law, his chosen profession. In December, 1856, he was admitted to the bar and entered upon the practice of his profession in the town of Spartanburg. He continued to be so engaged until he was called by his State to leave this quiet pursuit and serve her in another field. He joined the first company that was organized in his county for military duty in the war between the States; was elected lieutenant; afterward became captain, and served the cause he had espoused with faithfulness and gallantry until disabled for field service by a wound received at the battle of Seven Pines. Though retired from the field he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel and assigned to light duty in the rear. While thus employed he was called upon by the people of Spartanburg to represent them in the State Legislature, which he did to their entire satisfaction.

At the close of the war Mr. EVINS reopened his law office in the town of Spartanburg, and devoted himself closely and successfully to his profession until 1876, when he was called to a higher sphere of honor and usefulness. He entered the Forty-fifth Congress as the Representative of the fourth Congressional district of South Carolina, and served in that capacity, with faithfulness to his immediate constituents and fidelity to the whole country, until stricken down by disease. His death, though sudden, was not unanticipated by himself and his friends. His health had been declining for a year prior to his demise; and, after consultation with eminent physicians, he became satisfied that his disease was incurable. This conviction did not turn him aside from the path of duty; he entertained it with calm, Christian resignation, and moved forward in the discharge of his public duties as undisturbed as if no shadow of death was impending over him.

On the 20th of October last, at his home in Spartanburg, in the bosom of his family, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, while seated in a chair, the messenger came to call him across the river.

He was not found unprepared for the summons. In early life he had made a profession of religion and attached himself to the Presbyterian Church, the church of his father. In 1867 he was chosen one of the deacons of the Spartanburg Presbyterian church, and in 1870 was called to be a ruling elder in the same church. From 1868 to his entrance upon his career as a member of Congress he was superintendent of the Sunday-school of his church, and devoted himself to this work with characteristic earnestness and singleness of purpose.

Such, Mr. Speaker, are, as it were, the stations which mark the course of the life which has passed away; the prominent events which, in the lives of men as of nations, are the hill-tops and mountain summits seen from afar and affording a general idea of their progress or decay, but no definite knowledge of the causes producing them, nor any intimate acquaintance with their real history. They are but points of observation from which the thread of the real life may be traced, from which the real character may be read, and the full history studied and learned. Subjection to such scrutiny is necessary to bring out the true force and merit of Mr. EVINS.

From this, the highest plane of public service to which he attained, the track of his life down through its fields of usefulness to his State, his county, his town, his church, and into the privacy of his family circle, glowed with the same light, and was characterized by a constant and consistent uprightness born of high principle. His cultured and highly developed moral sense kept him ever alive to the duty of the hour, whether it led him to the mountain-top or through the lowly vale, whether it called him to positions of distinction and honor or along the humble walks of true charity among the weak, the poor, and the needy.

In that great conflict between the principles of good and evil which seems to be the heritage of humanity, and of which this world seems to be the battle-ground, the life of this pure-minded gentleman, guided by sound principles of morality and true Christian sentiment, has made for itself no uncertain record. As a man, as a citizen, as a neighbor, in the conduct of his private and professional business, in the service of his State in both peace and war, in every relation of life, his influence was elevating and for good.

And when at a critical period in the history of the State to which I belong, while the weight of aspersion and misrepresentation and of misapprehension was bearing upon us with ruinous pressure, we succeeded in sending Mr. EVINS here as our representative and exponent, it was with the expectation that the purity and sincerity of his character and the honesty of his political sentiments would vindicate us from the one and relieve us from the other. From the earnest expressions of regret for his loss with which I have been greeted since my entrance upon this floor by gentlemen of both political parties and from all sections of this country, I now venture to indulge the hope that our expectations have been realized; that his influence here, as elsewhere, has been for good, has been a potent contribution toward the restoration of those relations of respect and confidence between the members of this "indissoluble Union" which is so necessary to the full enjoyment by any of the blessings which our incomparable system of government was designed to secure to all.

In the death of Mr. EVINS we have lost one with a character for honesty so high that slander could not reach it, a merit so modest that envy never assailed it, a public spirit so uniform that suspicion of self-interest never impugned it, a Christian consistency so unassuming that it escaped the sneers of the scoffer, and one whose moderation and wisdom in his public life, unmoved by partisan or sectional purposes, were doing much to close the gap of estrangement between the two great sections of this Union which happily for the good of this whole country is every day becoming narrower and narrower, and will soon, I hope, be a thing of the past.

Mr. DIBBLE. I imagine, Mr. Speaker, that the contribution of the most gifted individual to the sum total of the world's progress and prosperity is of itself comparatively insignificant; yet such contributions, when aggregated, and transmitted with accumulations from time to time, make up what we call the advance of civilization—the improvement of the human race. And it is likewise true that the enlightened policy of a nation as illustrated in the conduct of its public men is the safeguard of its future. The traditions of a people give direction to their aspirations, and tend to shape their national character. The hero or the statesman who has been through life a pattern of patriotic worth becomes after death the exemplar for the guidance of those whom he leaves behind him. It is in this aspect that the eulogy upon the dead becomes a lesson of practical patriotism; the purposes of laudable ambition are transmitted from generation to generation; public and private virtue are kept untarnished, and love of country is blended with love of the good and the true. And in the land where the achievements of her sons live after them in story and in song, "monuments more lasting than brass," where history bestows, as an heirloom, upon the children the honorable record of their sires—it is in such a land that freedom makes her lasting habitation, safe in the stronghold of a public opinion, consecrated by inheritance to the perpetuation of civil and religious liberty.

Three thousand years ago, in the Egypt of the Ptolemies, it was their custom to appoint magistrates to judge the memory of the deceased citizen, and to award to prince and to subject alike condemnation to the vicious, and to the virtuous the honor of a public eulogy granted to him by his country's laws. And although this custom has long since passed away, and judges sit no more in solemn quest over the ashes of the dead, yet fame has become such a tribunal; and as she dictates posterity listens to her decrees and history records them.

It has been well said that "it is right that the tomb should be a barrier between flattery and the prince, and that truth should begin where power ceases." And it is a matter of satisfaction to me, Mr. Speaker, that in recounting the incidents of the life of my deceased colleague and friend there is nothing that his friends would desire to pass over with the charity of silence, or that needs the embellishment of fulsome praise. It shall be my endeavor, therefore, to present in plain, unvarnished narrative the outline of his career, secure in the assertion that purer man never entered this House, nor one who was possessed of a loftier sense of honor, a more conscientious devotion to duty, than JOHN HAMILTON EVINS.

Such traits of character were his by inheritance. The families of Evins and Moore (from the latter of which he was descended on his mother's side) brought with them from the mother country energy, thrift, integrity, and piety. They came first into Pennsylvania and thence to Virginia and the Carolinas. Both families settled in South Carolina, on Tyger River, in what is now Spartanburg County, prior to the Revolutionary war, and were ardent patriots in the struggle for independence. Alexander Evins, the grandfather of our late fellow-member, served as a soldier under "Mad Anthony Wayne," and was wounded so severely in the left shoulder at the storming of Stony Point, that most brilliant of all the battles of the war, as to have been disabled in his left arm for life. He changed the spelling of his surname from "Evans" to "Evins," substituting an "i" for the "a," because a brother of his had espoused the side of the King; and although the Tory left the country, the family has retained this mode of spelling the name ever since. This gallant patriot lies buried in the graveyard of Nazareth Church, the oldest Presbyterian church in Spartanburg County—a house of worship of which he was one of the founders and a ruling elder. He left six sons, all of whom became leading citizens of their section of South Carolina, and four of whom were at different times members of the State Legislature. One of them was Col. Samuel N. Evins, the father of JOHN H. EVINS.

Among his ancestry on his mother's side was General Thomas Moore, who fought in the battle of Cowpens against the British when a boy 16 years old. In mature years, he was prominent in the politics of the State, and was a member of Congress from South Carolina from 1801 to 1813, and again from 1815 to 1817; and in the interval between the two periods of service in this House he was in the field in the war of 1812, as a brigadier-general, commanding troops on the coast of South Carolina. He was a man of great public spirit, and was one of the founders of the first high-school in Spartanburg District, an institution which is still in existence. He was the great-grandfather of our deceased colleague.

JOHN HAMILTON EVINS was born at the ancestral homestead, on Tyger River, on the 18th day of July, 1830. In early life he enjoyed such advantages of education as the country afforded, besides the precept and example of parents who were distinguished for high-toned principle, broad views, liberal hospitality, and earnest Christian character. He received his higher education at the South Carolina College in its palmiest days, and graduated from that institution in the class of 1853.

I first knew him in 1855, when both of us were young men, living under the same roof. He was then a student of the law, to the practice of which he was shortly afterward admitted, and I, somewhat his junior, was a college student pursuing my last year's course. He was then, as all his associates have ever found him to be in later days, a warm-hearted friend, a courteous and cheerful companion, a just and honorable man. At this period of his life, in easy circumstances as to fortune, living in a section where his ancestry for several generations had attained merited distinction in social, religious, and political circles; fitted by a liberal education for the practice of his chosen profession, and enjoying daily intercourse with the people of a refined and cultivated community, there opened before him the prospect of a happy and successful career. My deceased friend was fortunate in the possession of those traits which enabled him to utilize the advantages which surrounded him, and to achieve as high a degree of substantial success as his friends could have desired.

After his admission to the bar he was associated in practice with that distinguished jurist Hon. Thomas N. Dawkins, afterward one of the judges of our State courts, and with Jefferson Choice, Esq., an able and experienced lawyer at Spartanburg, S. C. Throughout his whole life he has been engaged in the active duties of the profession, except when in military service as an officer of South Carolina troops in the confederate army, or when serving his State in the Legislature and in Congress. At the outbreak of hostilities between the States in 1861 he was an officer in the first company raised in Spartanburg, and fought gallantly in the first battle of Manassas and other conflicts of the war. At the battle of Seven Pines in 1862 he was so severely wounded in the left arm that amputation was proposed, but he refused his consent, and assumed the risk of the attempt to save the arm. This was accomplished through the skill and attention of his brother, who was a surgeon in the army, and the limb was preserved, but he was so seriously disabled as to be incapable of further active service in the field, and I am satisfied that the effects of this wound were felt by him during the rest of his life. He continued, however, in the performance of light military duty until his election to the State Legislature of South Carolina, where he served two terms.

At the close of the war Colonel EVINS had suffered in fortune, in common with his neighbors, but did not repine; on the contrary, he went to work with all his energy to repair the disasters entailed upon the South by that fearful struggle. About this time he married Miss Hattie D. Choice, the daughter of his former partner at law. The union was a congenial one, and his was a happy home, the seat of comfort, refinement, and generous hospitality. Successful at the bar, and enjoying the esteem and confidence of all who knew him, he was content to devote himself to his profession and to take a leading part in enterprises for the development of the resources of his native county and did not aspire to political honors. But in the agony of final reconstruction his State summoned him to her service. In 1876 he was tendered the nomination for Congress from his district without solicitation on his part, and for a time hesitated to accept it, but finally consented to do so as an act of duty, and was elected to the Forty-fifth Congress by a considerable majority. Since then he served continuously as the Representative of the fourth Congressional district of South Carolina, up to the time of his death.

Without endeavoring to enter into the details of his useful services as a member of this House, I will simply sum up his character as a public man by calling attention to that independence of thought and action, that freedom from all the arts and devices of the demagogue which distinguished his career. He was one of those who considered that the representative should not be like a weathercock, turning hither and thither according to every popular breeze, but that he should be rather a leader than a follower of public opinion in regard to matters pertaining to the work of legislation. He was of the class celebrated in the language of the classic poet:

Justum et tenacem propositi virum
Non civium ardor prava jubentium,
* * * * *
Mente quatit solida.

In the early days of the present Congress, his health, which had been gradually failing for some months, became more seriously affected, and he then informed his friends and constituency of his intention to decline a renomination, and to retire to private life. It was his hope at that time, and also that of his friends, that the eminent medical skill which he called to his assistance would avail to arrest the malady which threatened him. But alas! all fond anticipations of returning health were gradually dispelled by the inroads which disease slowly but surely made upon his constitution, until finally it was evident to himself and all his friends that in a short time he would be in the immediate presence of death.

For this emergency he had the preparation of a consistent Christian life. Calm and undismayed, and trusting in God, he was ready to die. I have alluded to the lines of Horace in illustration of his independence of thought and action as a Representative. I can with equal fitness apply to him, when awaiting the last mortal struggle, the omitted line of the stanza, and say—

Non vultus instantis tyranni
Mente quatit solida.

The session of Spartanburg Presbyterian church after his death thus placed among their minutes his religious record:

Colonel EVINS made a public profession of religion early in life, joining Nazareth, the church of his fathers. On the 4th of July, 1867, his membership was transferred to this church, and on the 28th of the same month he was ordained to the deaconship. He continued to serve in this office until promoted by the unanimous voice of the congregation to the eldership, to which he was ordained November 13, 1870. He was also superintendent of the Sabbath-school from 1868 until he entered Congress in 1877. He was also deeply interested in the welfare of the church, liberal in supporting every good work, true and wise as a counselor to his pastor, and in every respect a most valuable member and officer.

* * * His unswerving fidelity to religion, his genuine and practical loyalty to his own church, and his eminent purity of life, ever shone out brightly in all the circumstances in which he was placed, whether in the walks of private life, in the quiet pursuit of his profession, or amid the temptations of the military camp or of the national capital.

It was at his home in Spartanburg on Monday, October 20, 1884, that he quietly and peacefully breathed his last, passing literally from sleep to death.

And now—

'Tis little; but it looks, in truth,
As if the quiet bones were blest
Among familiar names to rest
And in the places of his youth.

Were I to yield, Mr. Speaker, to the emotions which arise as I recall to mind many incidents of my association with my departed friend, and feel how closely our lives were blended in the recent past, I would be unfitted for the discharge of the duty of this hour. And I realize that when the country, in her legislative halls, laments the death of one of her public servants, there is little room in the liturgy of memorial ceremonies for the expression of a feeling of personal bereavement. Only around the desolate hearthstone, whence the loved one has departed, or in the select circle of his kinsmen and dearest friends, is there appropriate place for that sacred sorrow which shuns the public gaze; while here are uttered only "the lesser griefs that may be said."

And yet, while we, his fellow-members, are engaged in the last offices of respect to his memory, and are celebrating in solemn eulogy his public career, in his relations to his State as a citizen, to his constituency as a Representative, and as a legislator to his country, it is proper also to think of him as a true and tender husband and father, a trusty and warm-hearted friend, and an earnest and humble Christian.

And occasions like the present, interspersed here and there in the routine of our official occupations, furnish to us the opportunity for solemn reflection, teaching the frail tenure by which we maintain our foothold on earth ere we sink into our resting-places beneath its surface. Is there not something for our inspiration, Mr. Speaker, in the example of one who has, as a sentinel upon his post, walked uprightly upon his appointed round holding fast to the watchwords of honor and of truth?

No life
Can be pure in its purpose, and strong in its strife,
And all life not be purer and stronger thereby.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. These memorial occasions, Mr. Speaker, come to this House with frightful frequency. Those who meet here are one by one dropping by the wayside as they journey on. Not a session passes but we pause to embalm in the records of this body a tribute to the faithful public services of some honored Representative who has gone to "that undiscovered country." At each Congress there are those who come to these halls ambitious of distinction, inspired by high resolves, buoyant with hope and having promise of long and useful lives, who play their parts but for a day and are then called forever from their labors. This sorrowful experience repeats itself with unvarying regularity, and so it will be until the end. And yet how little we know of death save its certainty! We know it is appointed that all shall die and that from this stern decree there is no appeal. To-day we speak words of tribute to the memory of one who sleeps under the sunny skies of the South; to-morrow we may be called to perform a like sad office for one whose new-made grave rests under the white raiment of the Northern snows. Who knows? Fortunately to none has been given the power to cast upon the horoscope the figure of our coming griefs, and we know

But the page prescribed, the present state.

May we not here indulge the hope that of every tear of sorrow shed on the graves of our dead some good will be born, and that in the "destroyer's pathway there will spring up bright creations that will defy his power" and convert the valley of darkness into a pathway of light. May not this day repeat the solemn lesson that death reigns in all portions of time; that—

The golden sun,
The planets, all the infinite host of heaven,
Are shining on the sad abodes of death.

The autumn with its fruits provides disorders for us, and the winter's cold turns them into sharp diseases, and the spring brings flowers to strew our hearse, and the summer gives green turf and brambles to bind upon our graves. Calentures and surfeit, cold and agues are the four quarters of the year, and all minister to death; and you can go no whither but you tread on dead men's bones.

I was not wholly unprepared, Mr. Speaker, for the announcement of the death of JOHN H. EVINS. While he was still with us, taking part in our counsels and in the business of this House, I was told by an eminent physician who had been consulted by him that he was incurably stricken by a malady that has long defied the skill of the medical profession, and that his life could be prolonged but for a few months at most. It was difficult to believe that one I saw here almost daily in the performance of his public duties, who moved so calmly among us, was so soon to die; but, as was predicted, to that inexorable disease he soon fell a victim. Burdened, doubtless, with the consciousness that his pilgrimage was near its end, he stood at the post of duty until near the close of the session, when he left us, and, after a brief and fruitless search for health, returned to his home that his grave might be made in the land of his nativity and among those of his ancestors.

Mr. EVINS died just as he touched life's meridian. With his culture and intellectual equipment, his unexhausted resources, had health and life been spared him, what position might he not have attained! Who can tell? Who can measure what of effort and of achievement were prevented by that dread disease that held him in its grasp and drained the very fountains of his life? Who knows what it is to feel the life-current ebbing gently but surely away? How the icy touch of the death malady must obscure every light and paralyze every energy! It was not my good fortune to know the deceased as he was known by those neighbors and associates who enjoyed his personal companionship and hospitality. Those who met him in the family circle, who sat at his table and by his hearth-stone, have fitly spoken of the excellence of his social and the refined purity and happiness of his domestic life. A happy home was his. How home hallows and elevates the human character! How cheerless would life be without its endearments, and how aimless our ambitions but for the impulse it gives to our efforts!

All bear witness to the uprightness of his daily life and his sterling integrity of character. He exemplified the sincerity of his Christian faith by his works—works in the fields of the Master. By no truer test than this can man be judged, for

'Tis not the wide phylactery,
The stubborn fast, nor stated prayers,
That makes us saints; we judge the tree
By what it bears.

That his personal and public life commanded the respect of his people is shown by the unanimity with which he was twice chosen to represent them in the Legislature of his State, and by four successive elections to a seat in this House. A manly character only could have inspired such confidence; a faithful service only could have secured its continuance. That he went to the field, that he put his life to the hazard of battle for the cause that had his sympathy, proved that he had the courage to follow, regardless of personal peril, his duty as God had given him to see it. It has been said:

No one knows what is absolutely right, but every one knows what he thinks to be right, and the highest law is obeyed by him who follows honestly the best light that shines within him and gains the approval of his conscience.

Who does better than he who puts his best thought, his highest and maturest convictions of right, into his life-work? Perfection is for God alone. Among men he deserves well who follows with unfaltering courage where his best and most enlightened judgment leads.

I but give voice to the spontaneous expression of an intelligent constituency, under whose eye passed in review every act of his private and public career, when I put on the enduring records of the national Congress their united testimony that JOHN H. EVINS was an honest man; that everywhere, at all times and in the largest and truest sense, he was an honest man and an incorruptible public servant; that his personal integrity was manifest in his professional and political life and in his every-day dealings. It is said of him that as an advocate he refused to prosecute those he thought innocent, or defend the cause that was tainted with dishonesty or wanting in the element of justice. What a commendable example was this to that high profession whose mission it is, regardless of the blandishments of power or the temptations of reward, to defend the right and secure redress for the wronged.

My first meeting with Mr. EVINS was in the Forty-fifth Congress. A trivial circumstance led me seek his acquaintance. Emigrants from Virginia and the Carolinas, among whom were the sons of the men who fought with Morgan on the memorable field of the Cowpens, settled more than a half a century ago in the Congressional district I have the honor to represent, and gave the name Spartanburg to the village in which for many pleasant years I made my home, and whose people for more than a third of a century have reposed in me an unmerited confidence. I desired to know the representative of the historic district of Spartanburg, S. C., a section so familiar to many of my people, and that I enjoyed that honor will be one of the cherished memories of my life. My acquaintance with him began and ended here. It was a brief friendship, but was long enough to leave with me enduring impressions of the man. He was of nature's nobility and a typical representative of that section of our Union that in the colonial day gave to our Revolution and the cause of popular government such heroic men as Wood and White, Moore and Roderic.

From the first he impressed me by his dignified but gentle courtesy and his unostentatious personal bearing. He at once won my sincerest esteem. One who knew him intimately, one of his distinguished colleagues here, tells me that one of his most notable characteristics was his unobtrusive modesty; that this kept him from pressing forward here and asserting his title to the high position which by reason of his learning and his talents rightfully belonged to him. This statement is corroborated by my observation. Life, however, has no brighter ornament than a true and unadorned modesty, and the character in which this resides is always enriched by the noblest of virtues.

Mr. EVINS was in his very nature tolerant. I always found him most charitable to those who challenged his cherished beliefs. He let mere differences of opinion glide—

Into the silent hollows of the past.

Espousing opposite sides of the bloody controversy through which our people passed but a score of years ago, and widely separated as we were in opinion on many questions, we were in full accord in the hope that from the reunited Republic would be banished every hate; that every wound would be healed; that the waste places would be repaired, and there be ushered in a new and enduring era of prosperity and fraternity. He was a disciple of that great Teacher who taught the inspired philosophy that the most heroic revenge was the return of good for evil. With me he believed this truth should be taught in ever pulpit, inscribed on the doors of every temple and on the folds of every banner.

It is a pleasing faith that God has planted in the human heart the germ of an unresting progress, and that in His own good time it will unfold a charity strong enough to paralyze the ambitions of men and convert armies and navies into ministers of peace and love. It will be a glorious era when love takes the government of men out of the hands of force. How beautiful would be that reign, how bloodless and painless its triumphs! If, as the astronomers tell us, the moon with its white arms reaches down and lifts the mighty billows of the sea toward the stars, may not pity reach down and lift the impulses of the human heart to love and God, and banish violence and warfare from the world forever?

Mr. EVINS was a member of the church, a consistent follower of the Nazarene, and lived and died in the Christian's faith that there is in the universe an overruling Providence and an immortal life beyond the grave. With that cold materialism of the age which teaches the annihilation of the human soul he had no sympathy. Who can believe that beyond the grave there is only nothingness?

If that marvelous microcosm, man, with all the costly cargo of his faculties and powers, were indeed a rich argosy, fitted out and freighted only for shipwreck and destruction, who among us that tolerate the present only from the hope of the future, who that have any aspirings of a high and intellectual nature about them, could be brought to submit to the disgusting mortifications of the voyage?

True, no thought comes to us from the mute lips of the dead. They do not speak to us across the darkness. They display no beacon from the shoreless beyond to light us through the gloomy abyss; but—

A voice within us speaks the startling word,
"Man, thou shalt not die!" Celestial voices
Hymn it 'round our souls; according harps,
By angel fingers touched, when the mild stars
Of morning sang together, sound forth still
The song of our great immortality!
Thick-clustering orbs, and this our fair domain,
The tall, dark mountains, and the deep-toned seas,
Join in this solemn, universal song.
* * * * *
The dying hear it; and, as sounds of earth
Grow dull and distant, wake their passing souls
To mingle in this heavenly harmony.

Is it probable that creative wisdom would have made gross matter eternal, indestructible, and provided that sensation, life, only should be forever destroyed?

Although JOHN H. EVINS is dead, He who every springtime with sunshine and shower touches the bosom of the earth that the rose and the jasmine may come forth and shed their fragrance and beauty on the world will not allow a human soul, the very culmination of His creation, to remain forever in the night of the grave. Sorrowing friends and a mourning household find consolation in this sad hour in the thought that there is a light radiating from the cross haloing the world with its brightness, glowing with divine beauty—the light of an example and a Christian philosophy—that points the soul to a better life and implants within the human heart both a hope and a faith in the resurrection.

Mr. HARDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, the destiny of man is dissolution, and the history of material organization is decay. To know our end is the lesson of life, for life in its entire analysis is but a lesson; its preface the cradle, its finale the grave. The great voice that John heard out of Heaven saying "There shall be no more death" was not the language of earth, but the unmistakable vernacular of that celestial land above. "Dust to dust, earth to earth, ashes to ashes," is the idiom of earth, voiced by the shroud, the coffin, and the grave. To that voice this House is listening to-day, as it comes from the grave of JOHN H. EVINS of South Carolina, who but a few months ago responded to our roll-call and was zealously engaged in the discharge of official duties and public trusts. His death has made another blank page in our Congressional history. How many are there in our book of records, each one suggesting to the living that their names will soon be written in the journal of death. Looking upon those pages I commune with the past—with its hopes and disappointments, its victories and its defeats, its life and its death. The living present recalls the dead past. The "now" reviews the "before" and foreshadows the "hereafter." The Representatives living walk in the cemetery where their comrades sleep and read upon the tombstones the epitaphs and eulogies of those who have passed away. Among the sleepers there, none were more entitled to respect than was he whose funeral ceremonies we are observing to-day. Born on Southern soil and under sunny skies, he imbibed in his nature their genial attributes as evidenced in the gentleness of his manner, the warmth of his nature, and the purity of his life. Devoted to that South, his whole being was fired with an ardent love for the welfare of his people, the honor of his section, and the glory of his State. Patriotism with him was an innate principle.

It mattered not, whether upon the tented field battling for what he deemed "the right" or in this Hall counseling reconciliation and peace, but one star went before him to light his way. That was the star of patriotic duty, and the light of that star was only obscured by the night of death. Upright in his deportment, warm in his friendship, truthful in his nature, and exemplary in character, he commanded the esteem of all who knew him. Honored by his fellow-citizens for a series of years with State and Federal offices, he performed their duties with strict fidelity, retaining to the close of his life the unwavering confidence of those he was serving. Sensitive in his nature, quiet and retiring in his manners, studious, as far as a weak constitution would permit, he was most appreciated by those with whom he was best acquainted. Fidelity to principle was the chart of his life. Duty discharged the rule of his action. He had a presentiment for months that his end was approaching, so the summons was not unexpected and the grim monster found him panoplied in the armor of a Christian faith and ready for his summons. It soon came.

On the 20th October last, when nature was clothing herself in saffron and autumn was searing flower and forest, he went down to the grave "like a shock of corn that cometh in his season." In scanning the actions of his life, nothing that was unmanly or unbecoming met the eye; for his life was irreproachable; for, Enoch-like, "he walked with God." Stricken down in the meridian of life and the zenith of his usefulness, his loss will be felt around the family altar, where his qualities of head and heart shone most brightly, in the circle of friends that he enlivened with a refined geniality and in this legislative hall, where he was serving with ability his fourth term. A man of education and intelligence, his convictions were the outgrowth of an enlightened judgment, and though unpretentiously asserted, they were maintained with inflexible firmness—not the firmness born of self-conceit and inordinate vanity, but that which is prompted by a consciousness of right and modest merit.

Serving with him upon a committee of this House of which he was chairman, I soon learned to estimate his character and appreciate his solid worth. To the members composing that committee it became apparent early in the session that he was laboring under a malady that had numbered his days. We were not surprised when the end was announced. The book of his life has been closed, and if we are not permitted to break the seals thereof we can profitably recall the memory of him whose name is written therein, associated as it is with a life of usefulness, of strict integrity, of noble impulses and Christian graces. In recalling his memory, in reviewing his life, we are forcibly reminded that—

> Our lives are albums, written through
> With good or ill, with false or true;
> And as the blessed angels turn
> The pages of our years,
> God grant they read the good with smiles,
> And bless the ills with tears.

The history we now make will live after we go hence, for, as was written by Paul, "None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself." Truly may this be said of him whose memory we now commemorate; for though he has passed away he yet lives in precept and Christian example. As the winds that sweep over a bed of violets bear on their wings their fragrant perfume, so does a pure life carry with it the fragrance of noble deeds, exemplary virtues, and Christian graces. But such a life is no barrier against the approach of the fell destroyer; and, yielding to his power, our companion fell.

> Then gave his name to the world again—
> His blessed past to Heaven; then slept in peace.

Peaceful be the repose, for he only sleeps. The beautiful flower, scorched by summer's suns or blighted by autumn's frost, withers and apparently dies; but it does not die; it only falls to sleep in the lap of winter and will bloom again when "the springtime cometh." So our friend has fallen to sleep on the bosom of his Saviour, there to remain until the Father wakes him to the joys of eternal life. With great satisfaction we can review his character, so strong in its structure, so complete in its appointments, so polished in its finish. And callous is the heart to all instincts of the good and the true who can contemplate the life of such a man, so pure, so gentle, so lovely while in health, so patient in sickness, so calm and triumphant in death, and not exclaim with Balaam, "Let me die the death of the righteous and let my last end be like his."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words of tribute to the memory of our departed friend.

Although I had but a limited acquaintance with Mr. EVINS, I learned to respect him for his many good qualities of mind and heart.

His integrity of character was of the highest order, and he was positive in his convictions of right and duty.

As a law-maker he was not bound by local limits, but entered fully into the spirit of legislation for all sections.

Though representing States far distant, we were often drawn together on common ground in matters of legislative interest. I always found him kind and considerate, sociable and earnest.

I state my own impressions very briefly concerning his life and character, and leave to others who knew him longer and more intimately the duty of a more elaborate recital of his life and services. It is a day of sadness for all who knew him.

Our late associate, so universally esteemed, now lies beneath the sod, and under the pine and the palmetto of his native State. May his many good deeds long be remembered! May his memory ever brighten!

Mr. DOWD. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with the deceased may be said to have commenced upon the occasion of the funeral of the late President Garfield. Before that I had met Colonel EVINS on one or two occasions only, and our acquaintance was merely casual, although our homes were but sixty miles apart. During the long and melancholy trip to Cleveland, Ohio, and back, we were much in each other's company. There was no one in the entire party whom I had ever met before except Colonel EVINS, and I naturally gravitated to him as a neighbor and friend.

From the beginning of the Forty-seventh Congress our relations grew closer and our friendship stronger. During that Congress I was more intimate with Colonel EVINS than with any other member of the House. We boarded at the same hotel, occupied seats at the same table, and sat near each other in this Hall. We often lunched together, occasionally attended church and theaters together, and frequently took long walks and drives through the city. I think I knew him well. I believe I thoroughly understood his character.

I am not of those who believe that all good is in the past, or that only good men die. I have said upon another occasion that the true office of eulogy is not the bestowal of indiscriminate praise. The highest test of character is to place the good and the bad in sharp contrast. I am no enthusiast, but think I can discern the imperfections as well as the merits even of very warm friends. Nor do I believe any man can be absolutely free from guile, or that much good can be found in the world unmixed with evil. On the contrary, I believe that everywhere within the domain of human existence evil and good, if not actually intermixed are in close proximity. Nothing is perfect; no man can be perfect. And yet, I say with deliberation that I have never known better man than JOHN HAMILTON EVINS. I have known men of greater intellects and greater learning, men of more obtrusive and conspicuous qualities, but I have never known a more conscientious and thoroughly good man. Long ago he must have fought life's supremest battle and gained the victory over self. Early in life he must have put in complete subjection those evil impulses and passions which are the common heritage of us all, and which surely conquer all who do not conquer them, and by which so many thousands and tens of thousands of weaker men, after struggling against them for years, have at last been enslaved and ruined.

While I knew Mr. EVINS I am sure he never did anything which he believed was wrong. He held an easy mastery over all manner of temptation. Without regard to pain or pleasure, he never for an instant hesitated between what was right and what was even dubious or questionable in its character. He was a sincere and genuine Christian. He believed in the Bible, the God of the Bible, and all its teachings, as naturally and as implicitly as the babe warms and glows in the mellow radiance of a mother's love. The precepts of that Great Book were his guide through life, and its promises and assurances were, no doubt, his solace and comfort as he approached the valley and shadow of death. I had not the pleasure to know much of the domestic life of Colonel EVINS, but it was evidently beautiful and lovely in the highest degree. He left a widow who must have been from the day of their marriage indeed "an helpmeet for him." He left also a large and interesting family of children. A recent letter from Mrs. Evins contains the following pathetic and touching language:

Of my loss it is impossible for me as yet to speak; bereft of such a husband, with the terrible responsibility of bringing up our children without the help and comfort of his living presence, I feel my burden to be almost greater than I can bear. My trust, however, is in the God of the widow and orphan, and I know he will not forsake us.

I append and beg to present in connection with my remarks the minutes of Spartanburg Presbyterian church, adopted at a session held November 10, 1884, which very fully and very accurately portrays the sterling qualities and exalted merits of the lamented deceased.

Minutes adopted by the session of Spartanburg church, November 10, 1884.

JOHN HAMILTON EVINS was born of pious parentage, at the family homestead, on Tyger River, Spartanburg District, South Carolina, July 18, 1830. His father, Col. Samuel N. Evins, was a man of broad intellect, sterling integrity, high-toned principle, and Christian zeal; and his mother, a woman of decided character and earnest piety. He thus grew up under the most wholesome influences, receiving from his childhood that stamp of character which he developed in manhood. Possessed of ample means, his father gave him such advantages of education, both in the common school and the college, as the country afforded, and he was graduated at South Carolina College in 1853. Soon after this he began the study of law at Spartanburg, and was admitted to the bar in 1856. To this profession he devoted himself with energy and success, and won a high place in the legal fraternity of this section.

Upon the breaking out of the civil war in 1861 he promptly tendered his services to his native State, and served faithfully in the confederate army, first as lieutenant and afterward as captain of the Spartan Rifles. He was severely wounded in the left shoulder at the battle of Seven Pines, and was disabled from further active service in the field, but was nevertheless promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel and assigned to lighter military duty nearer home. While thus detained at home he was elected to the State Legislature, and served there in the sessions of 1863 and 1864.

After the war he resumed the practice of law, in which he was actively and constantly engaged until 1876, when, in the great political struggle for the recovery of the State from the hands of aliens and plunderers, he was nominated for Congress from the fourth Congressional district, and was elected by a large majority. At three successive elections he was again chosen to the same high office, and continued to serve faithfully and well in the national Legislature until arrested by death.

Colonel EVINS made a public profession of religion early in life, joining Nazareth, the church of his fathers. On the 4th July, 1867, his membership was transferred to this church, and on the 28th of the same month he was ordained to the deaconship. He continued to serve in this office until promoted by the unanimous voice of the congregation to the eldership, to which he was ordained November 13, 1870. He was also superintendent of the Sabbath school from 1868 until he entered Congress in 1877. He was deeply interested in the welfare of the church, liberal in supporting every good work, true and wise as a counselor to his pastor, and in every respect a most valuable member and officer. About one year ago his health began to fail, and upon consultation with eminent physicians in Washington he became convinced that he was the subject of incurable disease. He bore this fearful conviction calmly and with Christian courage and resignation, at the same time diligently using all human means that gave promise of relief. But he gradually sank under the steady encroachments of disease. His heart had become seriously affected and his lungs so obstructed thereby that breathing at times became difficult and painful. Yet his mind remained clear and his spirits cheerful. He was well aware that his days were few, but he was not disturbed at the thought, his confidence resting in God. And on Monday, October 20, about 11 o'clock a. m., calmly and without a struggle fell asleep while sitting in his chair at his home in Spartanburg.

The tidings quickly spread throughout the city, and the whole community mourned his loss. The next day the funeral services were held in the church where he had so often and so long delighted to worship God. An immense concourse of people, more than the house could contain, gathered to pay the last tribute of respect to one whom all honored and cherished. The pastor conducted the services, assisted by the Rev. R. H. Reid, the former pastor and warm personal friend of the deceased, and the Rev. Ellison Capers, who had attended with a delegation from the city of Greenville; and the body was solemnly and sadly laid away in the family plat of the town cemetery to await the resurrection of the just.

Colonel EVINS was married in 1865 to Miss Hattie D. Choice, the daughter of his former law partner, and she, with eight children, the youngest an infant of five months, survives him. He was a tender husband and a wise and conscientious parent, and the loss to his family in his untimely removal is sad and inestimable.

Our lamented brother was a man of noble impulses, of exalted principles, and of most exemplary life. His character possessed a completeness and beauty rarely found on earth, and the virtues which distinguished him were many, excellent, and striking. His unswerving fidelity to religion, his genuine and practical loyalty to his own church, and his eminent purity of life ever shone out brightly in all the circumstances in which he was placed, whether in the walks of private life, in the quiet pursuit of his profession, amid the temptations of the military camp, or the corrupt atmosphere of the national capital. And withal he was a public-spirited citizen, who lived and labored not for selfish gain and aggrandizement, but always felt a lively interest and performed an active part in anything looking to the welfare of the community, the State, or the country. The loss of such a man may well be mourned and his example sacredly treasured.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, there are two occasions in the proceedings of this House when no sound of tumult cometh to mar its grave decorum or disturb its solemn stillness. The one is when we bow the head at the voice of prayer; the other is in the obituary service we are accustomed to perform when one of its members has yielded to the ultimate appointment of our race and gone the way of all the earth. Reverence for the Deity and respect for our holy religion prompt us in the one case; regard for the dead and a forced recognition of our own mortality move us in the other. Our attention is arrested, clamor ceases, the proprieties of dignified silence are observed, and we can not escape a serious and profound reflection. The latter occasion is once more upon us, and I obey the impulse of my heart when, participating in these ceremonies, I offer my humble contribution to the work of this hour and attempt to bear testimony to the worthy life and excellent character of my departed friend and brother Carolinian. It seems not inappropriate that I should do so, for I have known the deceased from my boyhood. We were born and reared in the same county. He was the honored and trusted representative of my people and kindred. Little would it have been imagined years ago, when I bade him and other friends of my youth farewell and quitted my early home to seek a settling-place "in the land of the setting sun," that he and I should long afterward be reunited in these Halls to mingle awhile together and enjoy the fellowship of other days, then to part again in death, and that I should be called upon in this presence to perform the sad duty which now devolves upon me.

Who knows the ways of the world,
How God will bring them about?

Life is strange; personal history is mysterious. The vicissitudes of humanity, the multiplied and diversified incidents which make up our pilgrimages through the world, the transitions, the separations and reunions, the changes of the times and our changes in them, the innumerable strange things that come to pass along the journey of life; and then the fallings by the wayside, the scenes and circumstances which attend "the inevitable hour," the periods and methods at and by which we are taken off, the inscrutable purposes involved, all carry with them their often sad and always instructive lessons, and serve to impress upon the minds of thoughtful men a confirmation of that philosophy which teaches that—

There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough-hew them how we will.

I shall never forget how kindly and cordially he received me here, the welcome he gave me, the generous pleasure he evinced at meeting his former county-man in this body, the unselfish interest he took in my behalf, how readily and cheerfully he instructed me in my new duties, giving me the results of his own experience and offering friendly and needful suggestions for my guidance. My gratitude, my esteem, my affection toward him daily grew and strengthened by the renewal of our intercourse and his numerous offices of friendship and kindness. Whether I can now speak of him as I would desire or as becomes the occasion, my tribute is at least sincere and heartfelt.

He once said, "In this dark world of ours there is no richer gem than sorrow's diadem—a tear." I can, indeed, give to his memory that "test of affection," and say of a truth that I deplore his loss and grieve that he is no more. His death, which occurred at his home in Spartanburg, S. C., October 20, 1884, was not unexpected to me, for I had observed with constant solicitude and increasing apprehension the fearful inroads which a dreadful and fatal malady were rapidly making upon his strength and constitution; and when a few weeks before the adjournment of the last session he was compelled to seek the supposed benefits of a different climate and healing waters, and told me good-bye, I felt and feared it was the last time I should see him in the flesh.

JOHN HAMILTON EVINS was born in Spartanburg District, South Carolina, July 18, 1830. He was graduated from the South Carolina College in 1853, when to bear a diploma from that institution was to bespeak a thorough and classic education, and to carry a passport to the best circles of refinement and culture. He chose the law for his profession, and successfully practiced the same until the beginning of the war. He joined the confederate army, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. His army life meant actual service, exposure to danger, and loss of blood. He always had "a place in the picture near the flashing of the guns," and was severely wounded at the battle of Seven Pines. No man made better record as a soldier.

For two years he represented his district with great efficiency and acceptability in the Legislature of his native State, and in 1876 he was nominated for Congress, and went vigorously to work in what then appeared a most difficult undertaking, to assist in the redemption of the State he loved so well from the conditions of misrule and political degradation to which her people had been reduced. Immediately succeeding the war the lot of no Southern State was easy; that of South Carolina was harder than all. She was the inviting prey of roving and greedy adventurers who gathered about her prostrate form and fattened upon her misery. Not the valiant soldiery who had defeated her in war—not these, heroic and chivalrous, who always

Raise the foe when in battle laid low,
And bathe every wound with a tear—not patriotic and established citizens of any State who could claim a permanent local habitation, or were inspired by a pure purpose of genuine and salutary reconstruction for the common good of the common country; but migratory spoilsmen and local recreants, itinerant stirrers of strife and home agitators of discord who never saw the smoke of battle, found their special field of operation in the Palmetto State, and sought by every means to aggravate, mortify, humiliate, and crush her suffering people. Disquietude and antagonisms were excited and kept alive as the appointed means of selfish gain. It was amid such conditions as these, and infinitely worse than here described, the recollection of which is not revived from any partisan motive but to illustrate his important service—when success seemed almost hopeless—that Colonel EVINS was summoned to the front by his confiding and admiring people, and right gallantly he bore their standard and led them on to victory. He was re-elected for three successive terms, and, owing to his declining health, voluntarily retired, when it is well known that he could have received a fifth nomination.

My actual knowledge of his Congressional service is limited to the present term and what I saw of him in the committee of which he was chairman and on the floor of the House in the last session; but I have learned from others that his course has been uniformly commendable, manly, and patriotic. He seems to have possessed in an unusual degree the esteem and confidence of those with whom he has been associated here, without regard to political creed or party affiliation. Exemplary conduct, daily walk and conversation exceptionally pure, habits discreet and temperate, methods direct and honorable, a correct and stainless private and public life are universally affirmed of him. He was a quiet, observant, thoughtful man, accustomed to a careful and considerate analysis of the right or wrong of a measure. He was not afflicted with any undue or indecent eagerness for mere pro forma public utterance, but spoke only when actuated by a sense of duty and the necessity of the case, and then earnestly and honestly.

He was singularly free from any disposition for mere empty display or artificial appearance. He disdained disguise and despised dissimulation. He was a thoroughly earnest man. His influence, although quietly exerted and employing only such forces as appeal to reflecting minds, was always cogent and pervasive. All men had respect for his judgment and the rectitude and soundness of his convictions. He might not perhaps be classed as a great and distinguished statesman in the usual acceptation of the term, and yet I think he was an extraordinary man, and that he towered among his fellows in all the solid and sterling elements of character. He was safe, accurate, sound, and practical. He was positive, reliable, and useful; always trusted, never doubted. In him wherever a true man was wanted a true man was found. Such are the men who enact wise and wholesome legislation. This can not be said of erratic, uncertain, and visionary men, how brilliant soever they may be. It can be well remarked of him as he said of his deceased colleague, Mr. O'Connor:

> No constituency ever had a more faithful and devoted Representative, South Carolina no truer son, the cause of liberty no firmer friend, tyranny and wrong no more relentless foe.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to say a word of his higher manhood and "holier chivalry." It was once observed by an eminent religious philosopher that—

> In Christianity, and in Christianity alone, can be discovered character in harmonious wholeness, at once the "righteous man," high in the practice of all social virtues, stern in his inflexible adhesion to the utter right, and the "good man" who has won for himself a revenue of affection, at whose name men's eyes sparkle and their spirits glow as if a sunbeam glinted in.

He had this "harmonious wholeness." He was an efficient elder in the Presbyterian church and a consistent Christian. He was always ready with hand and purse in the encouragement of religious enterprises. From the appeals of charity he turned not away. He preserved in his metropolitan associations and public life the same devotion to his religious obligations which he practiced at home and among his friends and neighbors.

It requires a true heroism to withstand the solicitations to vice and dissipation which abound in high places. It must be confessed that temptations lie thick in the pathway of a public man at the Federal capital. The allurements of the world, the pomp and pageantry of sin are difficult to resist. To keep a conscience void of offense and maintain an unsullied moral or religious life bring into constant requisition the highest capabilities and strongest forces of resolution. He who can safely pass the ordeal is indeed a hero and entitled to wear a victor's wreath. No human perception can fully discern the spiritual relations which subsist between a man and his Maker, but from what was seen and known of the deceased can be found comforting evidence upon which to predicate the conviction that he kept himself "unspotted from the world." He believed that the bane of public life was immorality and irreligion, and carefully avoided the appearance of either. He exemplified the personal excellence of true Christian character. He died in the triumph of his faith. I believe if a man die he shall live again, and that the deathless spirit of my friend has passed the gate and entered into the city of everlasting peace.

> His day has come, not gone;
> His sun has risen, not set;
> His life is now beyond
> The reach of death or change,
> Not ended, but begun.

All that was mortal of him rests in the old graveyard at home among the ashes of the generations of his people who have preceded him to the silent land. The memory of his virtues will live on and remain bright and beautiful in the hearts of those who knew and loved him. He has left to his family and friends a heritage better than riches—a good name. Ere long and the time will come when each of us shall also "sleep with our fathers." May we profit by his example; live a life of equal rectitude; be as ready for the final departure as he was, and at last rejoin him in the bright beyond.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, although it is as natural to die as to be born, yet the beginning of life is nearly always associated with joy and hope while its ending is attended with sorrow and sometimes despair.

This is especially the case when a Christian gentleman, wise, good, practical, patriotic, like our late associate, JOHN HAMILTON EVINS, is stricken down in the meridian of his powers and usefulness.

The death of the aged does not shock the sensibilities, because it is expected in the course of nature as the fulfillment of destiny, but the abrupt departure forever of one in the prime of life, who had the happiness of many in his keeping, lacerates feelings that time alone can heal and creates a void which nothing can ever fill.

Our friend, Colonel EVINS, died at the early age of 54, sixteen years short of the span allotted to man by the psalmist; and, in addition to a large family of his own to care for, he was the trusted friend and adviser of hundreds, yea thousands, who had long learned to rely upon him as guide, neighbor, benefactor, attorney, and lawgiver. A mere statement of these facts would be sufficient answer to the questions, Will JOHN H. EVINS be missed; and is the dedication of this day to the commemoration of his virtues and services a sincere tribute to his worth, or is it a ceremonious mockery?

From time immemorial, among all peoples, when a faithful and capable public servant has been cut off in the midst of his career, a suitable record of his life and character has been made, partly from a sense of gratitude, but mostly in justice to the dead and to encourage the living to imitate his example. This is meet and proper. The world's successful men, who preserve their good name untarnished while they succeed, are too few to be permitted to pass into oblivion. As less than one in ten is said to so succeed, the best method perhaps to stimulate the living to fight the battle of life nobly is to make a permanent record of the conduct and character of every deceased citizen who honorably acted a conspicuous part.

Probably nothing contributed so much to the development of the manhood, the intellect, and the greatness of Rome as the honors she paid to her illustrious dead by pronouncing elaborate funeral orations over them and burying them with imposing ceremonies, usually near a public highway, and erecting splendid monuments to perpetuate their fame. Propinquity is a great moral power; and hence it is that the choice young spirits of every separate community generally select their best native models by which to mold their own character with as much fidelity as the writing of a school-boy conforms to his copy-plate. The emulation which prevented Themistocles from sleeping when he reflected on the glories of Miltiades was an ennobling sentiment, and it should be nurtured in the rising generation everywhere and at all times by bestowing appropriate honors upon the distinguished dead and by the recital of their merits.

Colonel EVINS was not a great man, but he certainly had many great qualities of head and heart that deserve to be remembered, and he so conducted himself in all the relations of life, both public and private, that the youth of the country would do well to tread in his footsteps. Posterity may be able to properly appreciate the intellect and achievements of a dead man, but it is only his surviving contemporaries, his friends and intimate acquaintances who can fairly estimate his character. I claim the privilege of attempting to do this for our late associate, not only because he was my colleague here and in the Legislature of our native State, but because we were lifelong friends. I had ample opportunity to know him well, and if I could only describe him as he really was, without a particle of exaggeration, his memory would never perish.

As I said, he was a remarkable man, both intellectually and morally, and, like nearly all noted men, he was largely indebted to his mother's early training for his after success. She was a woman of unusual strength of mind and character, and so indoctrinated her children by precept and example in the principles of probity, industry, and piety that Colonel EVINS never forgot those principles. His father was likewise a man of sterling worth, and left his children a good property, as well as a good example to imitate.

Both his paternal and maternal ancestors emigrated from Pennsylvania to Spartanburg County, South Carolina, many years before the Revolutionary war. His name is of Welsh origin, but he also had Scotch blood in his veins, and he united, both in mind and character, in a high degree, the leading faculties and traits of both nationalities of his forefathers. He combined all the patience, prudence, conservatism, benignity, and plodding industry of the Welshman, with the quickness of perception, mental acumen, clear analysis, sound judgment, strong religious faith, practicality, persistence, and thrift of the Scotchman. In a few words, he had common sense, an honest heart, and tireless energy—the three indispensable prerequisites to honorable success.

He toiled while others slept and worked when others idled, and therefore it was that he outstripped more brilliant competitors. He never believed in luck or duplicity as a means to attain an end, but always relied upon labor, truth, and manly methods in whatever he undertook.

One secret of his success was his thorough preparation on all occasions. His motto was festina lente. In his early days, although blessed with robust health, studious habits, and abundant means to pursue his education, he never completed his collegiate course and gained admission to the bar until he was 26 years of age. But when he did come to the legal forum he was so fully equipped for "the occasion sudden and practice dangerous" that he at once took front rank among some of the ablest country lawyers in America, which position he held until his failing health and exacting duties as a member of this House compelled him in a measure to relinquish his profession.

Another cause of his nearly uniform success at the bar, in the political arena, and in private business was his almost unerring judgment. While he preferred time to examine carefully every phase or relation of a subject, still, in an emergency, he had all the lightning-like accuracy of intuition belonging to the Scottish race, which generally is so clear-headed that it can follow a principle through a maze of rubbish or split a hair without cutting into either side. Whether with or without sufficient time to consider a given proposition, or state of facts, he hardly ever reached a wrong conclusion, and his most confidential associates, myself among the number, habitually distrusted their own judgment when it differed from his. This God-given faculty of common sense not only contributed largely to his success, but it likewise explained, when taken in connection with his honesty and industry, why he had so much influence both in private and public affairs. Every succeeding Congress in which he served only increased his strength here and his popularity among his constituents.

Colonel EVINS was not an orator, but he was emphatically a logician who could trace cause and effect, link by link; not a man of words, but of action; a dealer in facts, not fancies, yet he cherished the loftiest sentiments. He was well read, particularly in history; but he spent the prime of his life in the laborious study of the law as a science, as a whole, not by mere desultory or case reading. He mastered not only its general principles but the qualifying exceptions, and he was familiar with most of the leading cases, fixing each in both American and English jurisprudence.

As an attorney he brought no suit except he believed it to be right. Having brought it, he as completely identified himself with his client's cause as if it had been his own. His mind was pre-eminently judicial, equally expert at analysis or synthesis, and he would have adorned any bench.

His acquirements and his tastes better fitted him for his profession than for politics, and he made a great sacrifice both of feeling and interest when he left the bar to serve in Congress. But duty called him to the political field, and he promptly obeyed, because to do his whole duty was ever the dominating principle of his character. In fact, his unselfish devotion to duty may truly be said to have hastened his end.

When his State in 1860 summoned her sons to arms, he was one of the first to respond, and went to the front with his command, where he proved himself a true soldier at the first battle of Manassas. He continued in active service, participating in all the skirmishes and combats of the army of Northern Virginia, until, while engaged in a terrific struggle at Seven Pines, he received a very dangerous wound in the arm by a ball which splintered the bone just below the shoulder-joint. For a long while he patiently endured intense agony, the irritation of the wound causing much suffering, threatening to compel amputation; but the skillful and tender nursing of his brother, Dr. Thomas Evins, a confederate surgeon, saved his arm. Although never able to rejoin his regiment again, feeble as he was and with his arm still in a sling, as lieutenant-colonel he took command of the home-guard in Spartanburg County and effectually protected that and adjoining counties against the incursions of deserters and native marauders from the mountain fastnesses until the close of the war.

He then resumed the practice of his profession, in which he soon acquired a large, paying clientage, much of which adhered to him even after he became a member of Congress. But the double labor of attorney and Representative in the National Legislature was too much for his enfeebled constitution, which had never entirely recovered from the violent shock to his nervous system caused by his severe wound in the war. He frequently complained in his latter days that he had been overworked. All of you can bear witness how laborious the life of a faithful Congressman is. Most of you remember how punctual and thorough Colonel EVINS was in the discharge of all his duties here until his health broke down. It had been against his wishes that he was translated from the quiet walks of private life and the lucrative practice of his profession to the exciting, irregular, exacting forum of politics. He neither had fondness for the hustings nor relish for the rough-and-tumble debates and scrambles of this House; but as he was selected, without any premeditation on his part, in 1876 to lead a "forlorn hope" for Congress, he could not refuse, and his constituency would have kept him here indefinitely if his failing health had not compelled him to decline a fifth election.

Moreover, neither the impure and heated air of this Hall, nor the climate of this city, with its fickle and sudden extremes, nor the habits and customs of public life here could prove anything but injurious to a man in Colonel EVINS'S state of health. Bright's disease was said to have been the immediate cause of his death, but his disabling wound, his uncongenial Congressional life, and the trying climate of Washington, one or all, must have contributed largely to aggravate his disease if not to produce it. He often expressed regret that he had ever permitted himself to be drawn into politics, but said his people would have it so, and it was his duty to serve them. Any one who knew him before he was so badly wounded could not but remark, ever afterward, how sadly that wound had marred his striking physique and commanding presence. Before that calamity he was tall, erect, lithe, and strong—the picture of vigorous health—with the grace, gallantry, and courtly bearing of a troubadour; but after the wound, notwithstanding much of all these remained, he never was himself again. Therefore it may justly be said he died prematurely—a martyr to duty.

Colonel EVINS was a singularly diffident man, particularly in public speaking. While always modest yet self-possessed in conversation, he still could not rise to address a jury, the House, or the hustings without seeming actually bashful. One of his friends used to say he was the coolest man in a chair and the most frustrated man on his feet in the world. This absence of self-possession, or perhaps I ought to say his lack of sufficient "brass," was a great drawback to him, as it often kept him from talking when he was much fuller of the topic under discussion than most of the blatant, self-sufficient orators who monopolized the debate. You all recollect he never could rise to speak on this floor, even after seven years' service here, without blushing like a timid, embarrassed girl; yet you also remember he was equal to every occasion. He failed in nothing, not even in public speaking, simply because duty, his pole star, forbade. His lack of self-confidence as a speaker has been so aptly described by a friendly hand that I must read it:

> When he first began to speak his natural diffidence would so overpower him as to make it painful to his friends to witness his discomfiture; but with an indomitable will he would subjugate his own self-consciousness, and rising to the demands of the occasion would soon transform an apparent failure into a brilliant success. He never succeeded in overcoming his natural diffidence only in so far as to be able always to fully meet the requirements of the cause which called him before the public. It was only a sense of duty that brought him before the public gaze, and that he always met at any sacrifice to his personal comfort or convenience. The success of his public career was due to this: his conscience was stronger than his consciousness.

And just as he always overcame his strong reluctance to public speaking, when it was his duty to do so, he likewise followed the dictates of his conscience first in espousing the cause of secession at the command of his State and then in regarding the war as having forever settled that question. No man at the South more cheerfully acquiesced in the supremacy of the Union and the abolition of slavery than Colonel EVINS, and up to the end of his busy life he did all he could to rebuild the ruins of the South and to restore fraternal relations between the sections. As he was human, of course he could not at all times wholly divorce himself from the feeling of sectionalism or partisanship, but he was as free from carrying either to excess by vote or speech as any member of this body.

Among his many virtues he had high public spirit, and felt a deep solicitude, as well as aided with his means to the best of his ability, to establish every enterprise intended to develop the resources or promote the general welfare of the community in which he was born, lived, and died. Although reduced from affluence to poverty by the war, he was so successful at the bar and other business that he accumulated a moderate competency for his large family. And notwithstanding he was a splendid economist, there was nothing of the miser about him, and his hand was always open to the unfortunate. No real object of charity ever appealed to him in vain. Nor did he publish it on the house-tops when he aided the distressed. It comes within my knowledge that so generous was he in this regard that he was often imposed upon.

I have briefly spoken of him as a business man, as a citizen, a soldier, attorney, and legislator. What shall be said of him as a husband and father? Nothing can be said in too much praise. In 1861 he married Miss Harriet Choice, of Spartanburg, a young lady of beauty, common sense, and rare accomplishments, who survives to care for their many promising children. Every one who ever saw Colonel EVINS in the bosom of his family always felt happier himself at beholding the unalloyed happiness of that household. His bright children were treated as companions, as all children should be treated by parents, so as to possess their confidence and affection, instead of being held at a distance in rebellious awe. His adored wife was habitually consulted about great as well as small things. Her opinion frequently overruled his own.

When husband and wife have lived together long and happily it is a beautiful provision of nature that they love each other better and better as old age comes on. Especially does the good husband seem to think, as his wife's beauty fades, that she actually grows handsomer and wiser, until finally he learns to look up to her and lean upon her, or rather to honor and obey her almost as a mother. This was charmingly illustrated in the married life of Colonel EVINS.

And here, Mr. Speaker, let us pause for a moment to contemplate the sudden, the extreme, the startling changes from prosperity to adversity, from happiness to misery, that beset humanity. Less than two years ago JOHN H. EVINS was a trusted member of this House, in full possession of the confidence and esteem of his admiring constituents, with a fair prospect of higher honors in store for him. He seemed to be in good health, and was blessed with a happy family, a devoted wife, promising children, troops of friends, prosperous business, and a bright, enduring future appeared assured to him and his. But what a contrast between then and now. He in the grave, his wife a widow, his children orphans. Man, indeed, vibrates like a "pendulum between a smile and a tear," and the uncertainty toward which side his fate will swing creates such an undefinable dread of the future even in the happiest and most prosperous moments that every one admits—

Life is all a mist,
And in the dark our fortunes meet us.

To crown Colonel EVINS's well-balanced and well-rounded character, he was a sincere Christian, an unfaltering believer in the Presbyterianism of his fathers. But while he adhered tenaciously to the stern doctrine of predestination, he never confounded the acts of will with acts of fate, and regarded free agency as the only means of self-redemption. Nor was there any touch of bigotry in his nature. He believed, as our free Constitution provides, that religion is an affair between man and his God, and that—

If a man's belief is bad,
It will not be improved by burning.

To speak naught but truth of the living and only good of the dead are golden precepts that have come down to us from antiquity. When Colonel EVINS was living nothing dishonest or dishonorable was ever charged against him, although he was a fast friend and an open foe. One of the noblest traits in his admirable character was that he never would under any circumstances permit an absent friend to be slandered in his presence. As nothing ill could be said of him in the flesh, of course nothing but good can be spoken of him in the grave. So if he were brought to trial instead of eulogy, as the Egyptians used to try their dead, no prosecutor could appear against him. What a proud epitaph, yet literally true.

And how did he die? Calmly and resignedly, as every brave, honest man should die, without cowardly repining or vain ostentation. The land of shadows had no terrors for him, because he knew he had to journey through it, and as he had done all the good his means would allow, and as little harm as the frailty of the flesh would permit, he felt that he had no cause to dread the hereafter.

I move the adoption of the resolutions offered by my colleague.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and in accordance therewith the House (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 21, 1885.

Prayer by Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D., of Washington, D. C.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

Mr. ALLISON called the Senate to order, and the Chief Clerk (CHARLES W. JOHNSON) read the following letter:

To the Senate:

Pursuant to the rules, I hereby name and designate Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, a Senator from the State of Iowa, to perform the duties of the Chair in my absence this day.

GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
President pro tempore.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 21, 1885.

Thereupon Mr. ALLISON took the chair as presiding officer for to-day.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLISON in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 9th instant, a report of the Chief of Engineers and a report and plat of Newport Harbor, from Lieut. Col. George H. Elliott, Corps of Engineers, in reference to turning over Fort Greene to the city of Newport for use as a public park; which, with the accompanying papers, was, on motion of Mr. SHEFFIELD, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 19th instant, a documentary history of the railway mail service from its origin in 1834 to the present time; which, on motion of Mr. WILSON, was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER presented the petition of Harriet P. Dane and 8 others, nurses in the military service of the United States during the late war, praying for immediate action by Congress on the bill (S. 2248) to provide for the payment of female nurses during the war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PENDLETON presented a memorial of citizens of Miamisburg, Ohio, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed Spanish reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONGER presented the petition of the Franklin Mining Company and citizens of Hancock, Mich., the petition of A. H. Hafenreffer, C. D. Sheldon, Josiah Paul, and other citizens of Houghton County, Michigan, four petitions of citizens of Houghton County, Michigan, and a petition of 128 vessel-owners and citizens of Detroit, Mich., praying for the passage of Senate bill 2522, providing for the purchase by the Government of the two canals across Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior, in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 568) for the relief of John B. Davis, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 523) for the relief of Juliet Leef, widow, and the heirs of Henry Leef, deceased, owner of the bark Mary Teresa, illegally seized by Alexander H. Tyler, consul of the United States at Bahia, Brazil, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2154) for the benefit of the legal representatives of A. J. Guthrie, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5849) limiting the time for the presentation and payment of claims against the United States, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5322) for the benefit of William H. Wheeler, to report it adversely. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 754) for the relief of Nathan H. Dunphe, of Bridgewater, in the State of Massachusetts, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

YOST HARBAUGH.

Mr. PIKE. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4681) for the relief Yost Harbaugh, to report it without amendment. I ask the consent of the Senate that the bill may be put upon its passage at this time.

Mr. PLATT. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Yost Harbaugh $70, for his services as messenger in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury from October 10 to November 10, 1876.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (S. 2567) for the relief of Rachael J. Floyd; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2568) granting a pension to Mrs. Adeline E. Chadbourne; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2569) granting a pension to Mrs. Lydia S. Huggins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2570) granting an increase of pension to Col. Samuel M. Thompson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to communicate to the Senate copies of all official letters and other correspondence in his department of date subsequent to the 30th of November, 1884, relating to the collection or postponement in any manner of the tax upon distilled spirits, and not accompanying his communication to the Senate in response to its resolution of the 13th instant.

LANDS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the United States in 1866 acquired from the Creek and Seminole Indians, by treaty, certain lands situate in the Indian Territory, a portion of which have remained unoccupied until the present time; and

Whereas a widely extended belief exists that such unoccupied lands are public lands of the United States, and as such subject to homestead and pre-emption settlement, and pursuant to such belief a large number of citizens of the United States have gone upon them claiming the right to settle and acquire title thereto under the general land laws of the United States; and

Whereas it is understood that the President of the United States does not regard said lands as open to settlement, and believes it to be his duty to remove all persons who go upon the same claiming the right to settle thereon, and for that purpose has directed the expulsion of the persons now on said lands by the use of military force, and there seems to be a probability of a conflict growing out of the attempt to expel said persons so claiming right and attempting to settle: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to advise the Senate as to the status of the lands in question as viewed by the Executive, the action taken, if any, to expel persons seeking to settle thereon, and the reason for the same, together with any other information in his possession bearing upon the existing controversy.

Mr. CONGER. Let that lie over.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is in order this morning, having been submitted yesterday.

Mr. INGALLS. I was about to observe that my colleague [Mr. PLUMB] is unavoidably absent from the Senate to-day, and I presume he would prefer to be present when action is taken upon the resolution. I will therefore ask that it may lie over until to-morrow, retaining its place on the Calendar of Resolutions, if that will be agreeable to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VEST. I have not the slightest objection to the resolution going over on account of the absence of the Senator's colleague, but I wish to offer a substitute for the resolution. I desire simply to have the substitute printed and go over with the original resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to have the substitute reported.

Mr. VEST. Certainly; let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed as a substitute by the Senator from Missouri will be read at the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed and empowered to ascertain by communication with the authorities of the Creek and Seminole Nations of Indians in the Indian Territory upon what terms the said nations will relinquish and convey to the United States all their right, title, and interest in and to all that country described in Article III of the treaty made between the United States and the Creek Nation on June 14, 1866, as "the west half of their entire domain, to be divided by a line running north and south," the lands so described in the treaty being now known as Oklahoma, and being fully described in Senate Executive Document No. 109, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, page 4; and the lands described in Article III of the Seminole treaty of March 21, 1866 (14 Statutes, 756).

That the Secretary of the Interior shall communicate with the authorities of the Creek and Seminole Nations immediately by special agent or otherwise, as he may deem necessary, and transmit the result to Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks that the resolution may lie over for the day, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. I shall not make the motion this morning, but I shall ask to-morrow, or whenever the resolutions are called up, that they be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. If the Senator who presented the substitute thinks it will facilitate the consideration of them not to have it done this morning, I shall not make the motion, but I suggest that the reference had better be made now.

Mr. DAWES. I was not in when the last resolution was read. Is it proposed as an amendment to the resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Kansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Kansas. The amendment will be printed, and the whole question will lie over until to-morrow morning without prejudice, there being no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. To be called up under the order of resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To be laid before the Senate when "concurrent or other resolutions" shall be in order.

Mr. VEST. I was about to say that my resolution is insisted upon in order to save time, because time is of very great importance now. I do not want to be at all discourteous to the absent Senator from Kansas, but if the question of reference is to be determined by the Senate I should be very glad to have it done now. I have no objection to the matter going to the Committee on Indian Affairs to be reported back to the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I think the subject-matter of the resolutions should have the consideration of the Committee on Indian Affairs and should also be considered by the Committee on Territories. They are important resolutions and affect very materially the status of the Indian Territory, or some portions of it, a part of which the Committee on Territories have had under their consideration.

Mr. DAWES. All the matters contained, as well in the resolution offered yesterday as the resolution offered to-day, have been before the Committee on Indian Affairs at this Congress and have been considered by them. The conclusions of that committee have been reported to the Senate, and the Senate have adopted those conclusions, and their report is upon our tables. Therefore it would be entirely useless to have the subject recommitted to that committee.

I am inclined to think if any good can come from the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas, it will be as a basis of communication to the deluded people who are down in that Territory of the exact position which they occupy in relation to the law of the land. Some good may come from an opportunity being given to the President of the United States to reproclaim the position which he has time and again announced in proclamations to those people, so that they may see again and anew and afresh that they are in the place they are in violation of law, and that it is his bounden duty, in accordance with the oath he has taken, to maintain the supremacy of the law there. So I think some good may come from the adoption of the resolutions. When they come up for consideration I shall feel it to be the duty of some member of the Committee on Indian Affairs to state to the Senate what has been done heretofore to make it apparent to those people that they had no right to go there, and that they were invading other people's rights rather than that (as I see it announced in another part of this Capitol) the President of the United States is invading the rights of citizens of this country in maintaining the law of the land.

Mr. VEST. Before the matter goes over I should like to state to the Senator from Michigan that he is mistaken in regard to the question involved in either of the resolutions ever having been before the Committee on Territories, at least during the last two sessions. There is now a bill before the Committee on Territories in reference to the public lands and a portion of the Cherokee lands outside of the limits of the Indian Territory, but there is no bill pending before the Committee on Territories in regard to this Oklahoma territory, which is a different territory entirely, and all of which is inside of the Indian country proper, as the statutes call it. I will say now, without undertaking to discuss the question, for it is a very large one and a very serious one, that the last advices from the Indian Territory are that the United States troops are prevented only by high water from a conflict with the people who have gone in there, I think under a very great mistake, and led by a lot of very bad men; but I do not undertake to discuss the matter.

I ask Senators who feel any interest in the question to look at Executive Document 109, and they will find a full discussion of this entire subject, a description of all the lands in the Indian Territory, and all the information that can possibly be obtained from any Department of the Government upon the subject.

Mr. DAWES. Would not the Senator like to have that document looked at in connection with Senate Report No. 64?

Mr. VEST. Yes; the two documents give all the information that it is possible to obtain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent, the resolution and the substitute having gone over in the absence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

JULIA HARTLEY.

Mr. CULLOM. Yesterday I made an adverse report from the Committee on Pensions on the bill (S. 2535) granting a pension to Mrs. Julia Hartley. I am informed by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN] that there is other evidence which he desires to have considered by the committee. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PIKE. I desire unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1025) for the relief of William Ervin. It is a very just claim, and I do not think there will be any opposition to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I prefer that the Chair would lay before the Senate the bill called the Des Moines bill, in order that it may be disposed of before any other business is taken up. That was made the special order for the morning hour to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama objects.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not object to the bill indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire being called up, but I merely desire that the Des Moines bill may be disposed of before the Senator's bill comes up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will delay a few moments until the regular order is laid before the Senate, being the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. PIKE. Very well.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

The bill (S. 1420) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill will lie over, on the request of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], until the return of his colleague [Mr. LOGAN].

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

The bill (S. 1886) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. In the absence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate to-day, I ask that the bill may be passed over without prejudice until to-morrow, retaining its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks that the pending bill be passed over until to-morrow without prejudice. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

WILLIAM ERVIN.

Mr. PIKE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1025) for the relief of William Ervin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know why there is any reason that that bill should be proceeded with, being a Senate bill, in preference to a large number of other cases which seem to be equally meritorious and which have precedence in order of time upon the Calendar. It seems to me that we ought to proceed with the Calendar, and we can probably reach all the cases of which any final disposition can be made at this Congress. If there is no possibility of the bill being disposed of at this Congress, there will be very little use in consuming the time of the Senate in passing it. I make that suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is not a debatable motion. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to take up the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William Ervin, his heirs or assigns, $7,650, being the value of one hundred and eighty head of beef-cattle seized unlawfully and taken out of his possession in Kansas, in the year 1862, by order of Col. Charles R. Jennison, commanding the Seventh Regiment Kansas Cavalry, United States Volunteers, the beef-cattle having been used as subsistence for the officers and soldiers of that regiment.

Mr. HOAR. Is that a Senate bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to my friend from New Hampshire to strike out the words "his heirs or assigns" and to insert the words "or his legal representatives." The word "heir" is technically appropriate, but there is a law in regard to assigns.

Mr. PIKE. I have no objection to those words being stricken out. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, in lines 4 and 5, to strike out the words "his heirs or assigns" and to insert "or his legal representatives;" so as to read:

William Ervin or his legal representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any report in that case? If there is, let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. PIKE June 16, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1025) for the relief of William Ervin, having considered the same, beg leave to make the following report:

In the year 1862 the claimant was a resident of Kansas and the owner of one hundred and eighty head of cattle which were pasturing near Emporia. About April 15, 1862, the said cattle were taken from the claimant by the order of Col. Charles R. Jennison, commanding the Seventh Regiment Kansas Cavalry, and used by such regiment for food.

This appears from the sworn statement of the claimant himself, and the affidavits of Col. Charles R. Jennison and First Lieut. John A. Tanner. Colonel Jennison says the regiment was in want of beef, and he ordered the seizure of the claimant's cattle, and the same were used for the subsistence of his officers and men, and he did not pay for them. Lieutenant Tanner swears the cattle were taken by the command of Colonel Jennison, and were used for the subsistence of the regiment.

Charles F. Garrett and James S. Emery, residents of the city of Lawrence, Kans., swear they were well acquainted with the claimant from 1857 to 1866, and during that time they knew he was thoroughly loyal to the United States Government.

James Angus swears he was employed by the claimant in the month of April, 1862, herding one hundred and eighty head of cattle, and that about the 15th day of April the said cattle were taken from the possession of the claimant by the Seventh Regiment Kansas Cavalry. Furthermore that he has a distinct recollection that a few days prior Saint Louis cattle-dealers offered the claimant $42.50 a head for these cattle, but the claimant declined to sell them at that price.

The claimant himself swears to receiving the same offer, but that he declined because he considered them worth $55 a head.

In explanation of the long delay in presenting his claim to Congress the claimant swears that in the year 1867 he placed his claim in the hands of a Mr. L. M. O'Brien for prosecution, who, being unable to attend to it, turned it over to Chipman & Hosmer, claim agents in Washington, D. C., together with a number of affidavits of persons who knew of the taking of the cattle. Chipman & Hosmer told the claimant he must furnish the statements of some officers in command of the Seventh Regiment Kansas Cavalry relative to taking his cattle. The claimant was unable to find officers who had knowledge of the transaction until last year, when he procured the affidavits above mentioned of Colonel Jennison and Lieutenant Tanner. For the lack of such evidence Chipman & Hosmer did not present and prosecute the claim.

A letter from Chipman & Hosmer, dated April 30, 1867, acknowledges the receipt of the claim and accompanying papers.

The claimant holds no receipts from Colonel Jennison or any of his command for the cattle, but from records in the War Department it appears that the Seventh Regiment Kansas Cavalry were careless and reckless, accustomed to appropriate property of both friend and foe to their own use, rarely, if ever, giving vouchers therefor. Many complaints were entered against them by different generals who commanded the division in which they were, and finally Colonel Jennison was obliged to leave the service on account of his unsoldierly conduct.

For the above reasons your committee attach less importance to the want of vouchers.

Your committee think the claim is fully substantiated by the evidence, and that the amount offered for the cattle by the Saint Louis cattle dealers—$42.50 per head—just prior to their seizure, is a fair price; they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPORTIONMENT OF IDAHO TERRITORY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar in regular order will be announced.

The bill (S. 1021) to authorize the reapportionment of the Territory of Idaho into council and representative districts was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT. That bill came up yesterday and was passed over informally upon my request. It was reported some time ago. On examination of the bill I find that it will be necessary to change the date when a commission authorized in the bill shall report. To do so intelligently, I felt that it was necessary to find the Delegate from the Territory, but I have been unable to find the Delegate from the Territory. I therefore ask that the bill may be passed over without prejudice for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut asks that this bill go over without prejudice. The Chair hears no objection.

TENEDORE TEN EYCK.

The bill (S. 1300) to authorize the President to restore Tenedore Ten Eyck to his former rank in the Army, and to place him upon the retired-list of Army officers, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unless this matter can lie over until to-morrow morning, retaining its place on the Calendar, I shall be compelled to object to the bill. I am just examining the papers in the case, and it is a very unsatisfactory case to me. I was opposed to it in the Committee on Military Affairs and have been and am now. I think it exceedingly vicious and dangerous, and I think I can show it if I have a little more time to examine the papers. I shall either object to its consideration or let it lie over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. CULLOM. As I understand, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] reported the bill, and I see he is not in his seat. I shall be glad to have him present when the bill is considered. I see he is coming now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks that this bill may lie over until to-morrow without prejudice.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply suggest that to the friends of the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from South Carolina has come in.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that this bill lie over, that I may have further time to examine it.

Mr. HAMPTON. I will acquiesce in the request of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over until to-morrow without prejudice.

S. N. WOOD.

The bill (S. 1554) for the relief of S. N. Wood was announced as next in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is objected to.

VALUATION OF AUSTRIAN FLORIN.

The bill (S. 459) to refund excessive duties caused by extraordinary overvaluation of the Austrian florin in the year 1878 was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is reported adversely.

Mr. BECK. Let it go over.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it take its place on the other Calendar under Rule IX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is objected to and goes over.

POSTAL-TELEGRAPH SYSTEM.

The bill (S. 2022) to establish a postal-telegraph system was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that that be allowed to pass over to retain its place until the return of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL], the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should have no objection in the world to its retaining its place on the Calendar; but we have now got enough cases on the Calendar laid over in this way to consume five or ten minutes every morning in calling them. It is manifest that this bill can not be considered under the five-minute rule in the morning hour, and it loses nothing by taking its place on the other Calendar, because it can be called up by a majority vote at any time.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that it may be well to let it pass over until the return of the Senator from Colorado, who may then indicate the course he desires to have taken in reference to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT SAINT LOUIS.

The bill (S. 200) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Mo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That it shall be lawful for the Illinois and Missouri Railway Company, a corporation created by the laws of the States of Missouri and Illinois, or its assigns or successors, or any other legally incorporated railroad company or companies which may be associated with it therein, to build a bridge as hereinafter described, and maintain the same, across the Mississippi River, at any point north of Grand avenue, in the city of Saint Louis and State of Missouri.

SEC. 2. That the bridge to be constructed under this act and in accordance with its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized as a post-route; and for the transmission of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States passing over said bridge no higher charge shall be made than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads and public highways leading to said bridge; and the United States shall have the right of way for postal-telegraph purposes over said bridge.

SEC. 3. That if said bridge be located below a point four and one-half miles above Grand avenue, it shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans; it shall have at least two channel-spans of not less than four hundred and fifty feet clear width of channel-way each, or one span of five hundred feet clear width of channel-way, the said channel-ways to be measured at right angles to the current at any and all stages of water, and a clear head-room under each channel-span of not less than fifty feet, measured to the lowest part of the superstructure at extreme high water. The said high span or spans shall be placed over the best channel or channels of the river at all stages of water; and in case the channel is variable, the length or number of channel-spans shall be increased so as to furnish a good and navigable passage for all classes of boats under some parts of the bridge at all navigable stages of water; and all other spans covering the water way between the shore-lines of the river at average boating stage shall be at least three hundred feet in length, and the clear head-room under such spans shall not be less than ten feet at extreme high water.

SEC. 4. That if said bridge be located above a point four and one-half miles above said Grand avenue, it may be constructed either as a high bridge or as a low bridge. It shall, if a high bridge, have at least two channel-spans of not less than four hundred feet clear width of channel-way each, or one span of five hundred feet clear width of channel-way, the said channel-ways to be measured at right angles to the current at any and all stages of water, and a clear head-room under each channel-span of not less than fifty feet, measured to the lowest point of the superstructure at extreme high water. The said high span or spans shall be placed over the best channel or channels of the river at all stages of water; and in case the channel is variable, the length and number of channel-spans shall be increased so as to furnish a good and navigable passage for all classes of boats under some parts of the bridge at all navigable stages of water; and all other spans covering the water way between the shore-lines of the river at average boating stage shall be at least three hundred feet in length, and the clear head-room under such spans shall not be less than ten feet at extreme high water. Said bridge shall, if a low bridge, have at least one draw or pivot-span opening of not less than four hundred feet clear channel-way, measured at right angles to the currents at all navigable stages of the river, which shall be located over that channel of the river which is most convenient and accessible to boats with tows at all navigable stages of water; and in case that such location be not easily accessible by all classes of boats at all such stages, then another draw or pivot-span opening shall be provided elsewhere for the passage of single boats, which said draw or pivot-span shall have at least one opening of not less than two hundred feet clear channel-way, measured at right angles to the currents at all navigable stages of the river; and that all fixed spans between the shore-lines at the average navigable stage of water shall be three hundred feet or more in length, and that the clear head-room under such spans shall not be less than ten feet at extreme high water.

SEC. 5. That in case said bridge be constructed as a low bridge, as provided in section 4, there shall be at least one protection-pier of masonry, crib-work, or piling, extending from the upper end of a pivot-pier or one of the rest-piers of a draw-span, up stream, for a distance of not less than five hundred feet from the center line of the bridge, or such other distance as may be determined by the Secretary of War, which protection-pier shall be properly arranged with ring-bolts and fender-planking so as to enable boats to tie up alongside of it and drop down through the draw-openings at such times as it may be dangerous to attempt the passage of the draw-opening under headway.

SEC. 6. That all draw or pivot-spans authorized by this act shall be operated by steam or other reliable mechanical power, and shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats, except when trains are passing over said span or spans; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening said draw after the passage of trains; and in case the opening of a draw be delayed by reason of the passing of a train after the signal has been given from a boat ready to pass through, the draw shall be opened for the passage of such boat before another train is allowed to pass over the bridge.

SEC. 7. That the piers of all high-channel spans and all pivot-spans shall be built parallel with the current of the river at that stage of water which is most important for navigation; and riprapping or other protection for imperfect foundations which will materially lessen the water way shall not be employed in the channel-ways of the high spans or of the draw-openings; and piers which will produce cross-currents or bars dangerous to navigation shall not be constructed; and if, after construction, any piers or protection-walls are found to produce the above-mentioned effects, the nuisance shall be abated or corrected by or at the expense of the persons owning said bridge.

SEC. 8. That in case the approaches to draw-span openings, channel-spans, or raft-passages in said bridge be found to be dangerous or difficult of access by any important class of river traffic, the Secretary of War shall order the construction of such sheer-booms, guide-piers, or other similar device as will obviate the difficulty, which sheer-boom, guide-pier, or other device shall be paid for by the persons owning said bridge.

SEC. 9. That the persons owning, controlling, or operating the bridge authorized by this act shall maintain at their own expense, from sunset to sunrise, throughout the year, and during heavy fogs, such lights or other signals as the Light-House Board shall prescribe, and shall, in case a high bridge be constructed, during the season of navigation, have posted in a conspicuous place on or near the bridge, the clear headroom under the channel-span on that day, the figures expressing this height to be not less than two feet high, and to be readily visible from any point in the channel of the river for a stretch of 3,000 feet above and 1,000 feet below the bridge.

SEC. 10. That no bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river; and if any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, obstruct such navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of such bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of the persons owning or controlling said bridge; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the circuit courts of the United States of Missouri or Illinois in which any portion of said bridge may be located.

SEC. 11. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon a payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon the rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

SEC. 12. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of five miles above and one mile below the proposed location of the bridge, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the current at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 13. That in case the construction of the bridge authorized in this act be not commenced within three years from the date of its approval, then this act shall be null and void.

SEC. 14. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether the provisions in this bill conform entirely to the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers with reference to the width of span in both the cases of a high bridge and a low bridge, which ever may be erected.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; this is a bill prepared by the Engineer Bureau. It was drawn by me and sent to the Committee on Commerce and carefully altered by the engineers in regard to the time when the work should be commenced, requiring it to be within three years, and also that jurisdiction shall be given to the circuit court either of Illinois or Missouri. The bill, as sent by the Engineer Corps, provided for jurisdiction in Illinois alone. This provides for a high or a low bridge, just as the Engineer Corps proposed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I inquire of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who I see reported the bill from the Committee on Commerce, whether, in his opinion, it contains all the usual provisions necessary in bills for the erection of bridges over the Mississippi River for the protection of navigation and commerce?

Mr. VEST. It does. It is a bill very carefully drawn and guarded in every way possible, and not subject to any of the objections made to the original bill. I drew the original bill which was sent to the Engineer Bureau, and this is the substitute proposed by the bureau, one of the best bills ever submitted on this subject.

Mr. CONGER. I think there are more provisions embodied in this amendment—some that we recommended for a general bill—than have generally been imposed in regard to sheer-booms and lights and openings and such things.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMISSION TO CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA.

The next bill in order on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1700) to authorize the appointment of three commissioners to visit the principal countries of Central and South America for the purpose of collecting information looking to the extension of American trade and commerce, and the strengthening of friendly and mutually advantageous relations between the United States and all the other American nationalities.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The substance of the bill which the Secretary is about to read was included in an appropriation bill at the last session, and the commission are now performing their duty, so that this may as well be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin moves the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

RICHARD PHŒNIX.

The bill (S. 1860) for the relief of Richard Phœnix was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. That is adversely reported. Let it go over.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Let it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The bill (S. 2035) to establish a court of appeals was announced as next in order.

Mr. HOAR. Before the bill is read so as to have it open to objection, I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement with regard to this bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this bill has passed the Senate once. It is the bill popularly known as the David Davis bill for the relief of the Supreme Court of the United States. It has passed the Senate once with something approaching unanimity, I believe. I am not quite certain in my recollection about the vote, but it has, I am satisfied, the concurrence of both sides of the Chamber. It is a Senate bill, and, if it goes down to the House, I suppose I am violating no rule in saying that it can not pass that body much before the close of the session of Congress, so that the appointments to be made under this bill, beyond all reasonable question, will be made by the incoming, and not by the present, administration.

I say that very frankly so that no gentleman may be determined in regard to giving it consideration now by any apprehension that a large number of new appointments will be made by an administration just expiring. There can be no expectation that that will happen. I hope therefore that the bill may be considered at the present time and sent down to the House for their action.

Mr. JONAS. I object to the consideration of the bill. I think there is very decided opposition to the bill. The Senator is mistaken in that respect.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up the bill for present consideration, nothwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to take up for consideration this bill notwithstanding the objection. The question is on that motion.

Mr. JONAS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. FRYE. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] who is detained from the Senate by sickness.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—26.

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Section 2, which fixes when the jurisdiction of the old circuit court is to terminate, should be changed from "eighty-four" to "eighty-five," in line 5. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is to strike out

"eighty-four" and insert "eighty-five" in line 5 of section 2; so as to read "December, 1885."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I would suggest that the same amendment in section 7 is required.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The same amendment is proposed in line 4 of section 7 after the word "and," to strike out "eighty-four" and insert "eighty-five."

Mr. HOAR. Then in section 9, line 12, the word "five" should be "six;" so as to read:

The first term of said court shall be held at each of said places on the second Tuesday in May, 1886.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be considered as agreed to unless objection be made.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to explain what provision is made for writs of error in criminal cases.

Mr. HOAR. Section 8 provides for it. Let that section be read again if the Senator from Alabama desires. That will answer his question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 8 will be read.

The Secretary read section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. That a writ of error, if allowed by a judge of the proper court of appeals, may be sued out of that court from the final judgment of a circuit or district court in any criminal case to such court of appeals within ninety days after the entry of such judgment; but such writs shall not operate as a stay of proceedings, except in capital cases, unless it is so ordered by the judge who shall allow the writ, nor after a refusal to allow the writ by one such judge shall it be allowed by another judge. The judgment upon such writ shall be final unless certified as hereinafter provided in the tenth section of this act, and shall be remitted to the circuit or the district court appealed from, to be enforced according to law.

Mr. MORGAN. The precise point I was trying to get at was whether the right to a writ of error was absolute, or whether it was dependent upon its allowance by the court that tried the cause.

Mr. HOAR. It is neither. It depends upon the allowance by a judge of the appellate court, not by the judge who tried the cause on the one side, nor is it an absolute right on the other. It is like a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States now, which I do not understand to be strictly absolute, but the judge must be satisfied that the case raises a jurisdictional question.

Mr. MORGAN. The appellate court, then, or a judge of the appellate court in vacation, for instance, can take the record of conviction, examine it, and see whether he is satisfied that the cause ought to go up.

Mr. HOAR. No; it does not change the existing practice of the courts in that respect. No change of law is made. It is the same law under which we have lived from the foundation of the Government which is continued. I understand that law to be, not exactly that the judge should be satisfied that the case ought to go up, because the question may be the most frivolous question; still if the parties choose to carry it up, the judge is only to be satisfied, as I understand, that the facts on which the writ of error is based exist—that is, that there has been such a trial in the court below and that the case presents the jurisdictional question. That is my general understanding of the matter.

Mr. MORGAN. I think there is some difficulty in applying the existing rule of practice in the Supreme Court as fixed by law and by the rules of that court to criminal causes, and we ought to be a little careful about how we make the application. The judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, or the Supreme Court of the United States, or the judge of the supreme court of a State from which a Federal question is to be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States by a writ of error in a civil cause, takes the record and examines it, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, for the purpose really of ascertaining whether there is in that record a Federal question, a question of which the Federal Supreme Court would have jurisdiction; and if he ascertains that there is such a question involved, then he orders that the writ of error shall issue, or he issues it himself, directed to the inferior court, and thereupon such proceedings are had as that the record is transferred into the Supreme Court of the United States.

Now, we undertake in this bill, as I understand it, to adapt that practice to criminal cases. We have had no right of appeal or writ of error in criminal cases from any inferior court of original jurisdiction of the United States to the Supreme Court; we have had from the district courts of the United States to the circuit courts, and in those cases the right to a writ of error or the right to have the revisory power of the circuit court exercised over the court of original and inferior jurisdiction has been an absolute right, not one dependent upon the opinion of the judge as to whether the case when presented in the appellate court would be within the jurisdiction of that court or not.

I think that in a bill of this character, organizing an intermediate court of appeals, or an intermediate supreme court, having a power of final adjudication upon the life of a man, for instance, that the right of appeal ought to be given in terms that are direct and absolute, and it ought not to depend upon the caprice or whim or opinion or judgment of any judge or any court. In other words, the second trial of a man for a crime or misdemeanor upon the question of his guilt under the law ought to be had as a matter of right after the court to which the appeal is taken has heard arguments of counsel and has had opportunity of investigating the case under such enlightenment as counsel on both sides can give. To deny him that right is to deny him a very essential right, it seems to me, for the protection of his liberty and for the protection of his person.

The bill, as I read it and as I understand it as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, enables a circuit court of the United States, after the conviction of a man, and one of its judges shall be upon the bench in the appellate court, to deny to that party the right of appeal unless that appellate court shall consider in advance, without the assistance of argument, that the appeal would likely be successful. There is no reason stated here why they may grant or none stated upon which they may deny an appeal. It is a question of discretion in the appellate court, as I understand it, and not a matter of right on the part of the appellant.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps before the Senator proceeds further, it will be as convenient for him to allow me to make a statement of my understanding.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall be very glad to have it.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps I ought to have made the statement when the bill was first read before any discussion, but I thought it would not be necessary.

As I understand it, it is not the purpose of this bill to change the existing law or the existing practice. It is not an attempt to make a new code of laws or to make amendments in the law in any way except so far as is necessary to create the new tribunal which shall relieve the Supreme Court of the United States of its present duties.

The policy which exists in regard to the allowance of writs of error in criminal cases, whether wrong or right, it did not seem to the committee proper to review in this bill, because if we entered upon such a task we should be compelled by the same process of reasoning to examine thousands of questions growing up in the existing jurisprudence of the United States. But this bill does, from its necessary operation, enlarge very much the right of a person who is charged with a crime and put upon his trial, because, as the law now exists, he may be tried in the circuit court and he can have no resort to a higher court; he may be tried by a single judge or by a court held by a circuit and district judge sitting together, and he can have no revision, even if it is a capital case, of the rulings of that court upon his trial unless the judges certify that there is a disagreement between them, when it goes up to the Supreme Court of the United States. But, under this bill, after his trial in the ordinary circuit or district court held by one judge or by two, as the case may be—never more than two—he has the right as of course to proceed to this new court for a revision of the proceedings in the court below on his writ of error, when that is, as of course, in the same mode in which writs of error are prosecuted in civil cases—that is, the judge examining it and seeing that it is a fit case, he has a resort to a court consisting of sometimes seven or eight judges, and I do not know but nine, but a court where at least there must be four to make up a quorum, being three judges of the circuit court and at least one district judge in addition. Ordinarily there will be five sitting to hold these courts—I suppose three circuit judges and two district judges.

The person charged as a criminal in a United States court, therefore, has a right in the ordinary course of the administration of justice to resort to a tribunal which there is every reason to anticipate will be a tribunal of equal weight for character, learning, experience, amount of salary, with the supreme court of any State in the Union unquestionably. You take the Senator's own State, or take my own State. The court of appeals established by this bill will command very easily the services of any man who would consent to go on the supreme court of Massachusetts, or the supreme court of Alabama; so that in the particular to which the honorable Senator alludes the right of the prisoner is very much more tenderly dealt with than it is by the present law, because now a man may be hanged on a judgment of a single judge; he is ordinarily hanged if he is tried as a pirate or for a capital offense under the laws of the United States on the judgment of one circuit and one district judge, that judgment not being revised unless they certify that they differ in regard to their opinion, and then it goes to the Supreme Court of the United States. Under this bill it would go, as a matter of course, to this new court of appeals, where there are three circuit judges, and ordinarily two district judges, and where there must be at least four judges to make a quorum.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, this bill does undertake to change the law as it exists now by giving an appeal in criminal causes to a court intermediate to the Supreme Court composed of judges of the circuit and district courts. That is entirely a new right and a new privilege given to a man who is convicted. At the present time if a man is indicted and tried in the circuit court of the United States for any offense or crime whatever, and he is convicted, he is beyond all reach of a revision of his case unless there happen to be a circuit judge and a district judge presiding upon the bench at the time and there is a division of opinion upon a question of law, which they will certify to the Supreme Court of the United States. If there is but one judge presiding in the circuit court, whether he is a circuit judge, a justice of the Supreme Court, or a district judge, and that man is convicted, the fates have fixed his destiny beyond all appeal and all revision, and he must throw himself either upon the pardoning power of the President or upon the pardoning power of the King of the universe; that is an end of him.

There is a manifest absurdity and a manifest cruelty in the existing system upon that subject. That one man presiding in court, who happens to be there alone, should have a power which would prevent a man from taking an appeal or having his case revised on a question of life and death, when if there had been two judges on that bench he would have had the advantage at least of a division of opinion if the question was one of embarrassment or doubt or difficulty, is a very great defect in our system. The very first impression that I ever had in respect of the criminal jurisdiction of the courts of the United States was one of abhorrence. To think that a Government like the United States should refuse, merely because it did not have time and opportunity, to furnish to men indicted for crime the ability and the good conscience of its highest tribunal for the investigation of the laws upon which they were indicted, always struck me as being a sort of violation by the political power of the Government of the United States of that maxim that lies at the foundation of our republican system, that justice shall be administered without sale, delay, or denial. This bill undertakes to remedy to some extent that system, and to a very considerable extent, but I hope the honorable Senator from Massachusetts will agree with me that it does not go quite far enough.

This bill does give to a party who is convicted of a crime, whether in the circuit or in the district court of the United States, the right to a writ of error to this intermediate high court of appeals, but it makes that right dependent upon the discretion of the judge to whom he may make an application for that writ. He may deny it without incurring any legal penalty, or he may grant it from mere favoritism if he chooses, but it is made a matter entirely in the discretion of the judge to whom the application is made for the writ of error, whether that man shall hang or whether he shall have an opportunity for a new trial or an opportunity of having his case heard in the appellate tribunal.

Section 8 of this bill provides—

That a writ of error, if allowed by a judge of the proper court of appeals, may be sued out of that court from the final judgment of a circuit or district court in any criminal case to such court of appeals within ninety days after the entry of such judgment.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will draw some amendment to carry out the views he has suggested I would like to hear it. I think there is something in his point, and I should think it worth while to consider the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I have prepared an amendment. I have prepared an amendment to come in at the end of line 15, on page 9, reading as follows:

And in case of conviction for crime the writ of error shall issue as a matter of right.

That, I believe, is entirely in harmony with the general principles of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. It would come in better in the eighth section.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought it would come in better where I proposed it.

Mr. HOAR. Otherwise the eighth section would have to be modified.

Mr. MORGAN. Where does the Senator suggest that it come in in the eighth section? I do not find any place where it would read exactly right.

But such writ shall not operate as a stay of proceedings, except in capital cases, unless it is so ordered by the judge who shall allow the writ, nor after a refusal to allow the writ by one such judge shall it be allowed by another judge.

Mr. HOAR. It strikes me that the way to do it would be to make the eighth section read as follows:

That a writ of error may be sued out of the court of appeals from the final judgment of a circuit or district court in any criminal case to such court of appeals within ninety days after the entry of such judgment; but such writ shall not operate as a stay of proceedings, except in capital cases, unless, &c.

Striking out the words "if allowed by a judge of the proper court of appeals."

Mr. MORGAN. I should be entirely satisfied with that.

Mr. HOAR. I think it will accomplish the whole thing to strike out of the eighth section, beginning in line 1, the words "if allowed by a judge of the proper court of appeals;" and then strike out, beginning in line 7 of the section, the words "nor after a refusal to allow the writ by one such judge shall it be allowed by another judge."

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; strike that out also. That would make it entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will move that amendment, I shall not oppose it.

Mr. MORGAN. I will move that amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I think it is unobjectionable.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to strike out in line 1 of section 8 after the word "error" the words "if allowed by a judge of the proper court of appeals."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Then strike out all after the word "writ," in line 7, to the end of the sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 8, line 7, after the word "writ," it is proposed to strike out:

Nor after a refusal to allow the writ by one such judge shall it be allowed by another judge.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I will now further inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether any provision is made here for taking from the district courts of the United States to the circuit court of the United States appeals in that class of cases where the district court acquires jurisdiction over controversies in which the sum of $50 or more is involved. My impression of this bill as it was before the Senate heretofore, and I presume it is the same bill, was that in its language it took away an existing right of appeal from the district to the circuit court of the United States in those cases where the sum in controversy was not in excess of $100 according to my remembrance; perhaps it was $50.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand it to be so. You mean in existing cases?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that it affects them at all. Section 2 as it has been amended, substituting 1885 for 1884, prohibits the taking of appeals or writs of error from the district court of the United States to the circuit court except in bankruptcy reviews, after the 1st of December, 1885. Then it substitutes after that the provision in this section where the value of the property in controversy exceeds $500, and in all other cases where an appeal or writ of error lies from such judgment or decree.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. President, the effect of that is to limit the jurisdiction of the appellate court to $500.

Mr. HOAR. In mere matters of property, not in other cases.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good; in matters of property where the sum involved in litigation is $500. It then cuts off the existing right of appeal from the district to the circuit court of the United States in all cases under $500 involving questions of the right of property by the following language:

That the several circuit courts of the United States shall have and exercise no jurisdiction in cases of appeals or writs of error from the district courts allowed, taken, or sued out after the 1st day of December, 1885, except that reviews in bankruptcy cases, in the exercise of their supervisory jurisdiction, may be had as heretofore provided.

That does cut off the present existing right of appeal in all causes from the district to the circuit court of the United States where the sum in controversy in the district court is less than $500.

Mr. HOAR. It leaves all bankruptcy cases, all patent cases, all cases where the jurisdiction of the United States court arises merely on account of the question where there is a Federal question, and it leaves also all cases where the district judge certifies that the adjudication involves a question of general importance. But if it is a question of the mere title to property, if no question has arisen of general importance, it does extend final jurisdiction to the district court up to $500, and I think it should. Five hundred dollars is a less amount in value now than $100 was formerly, and we can not relieve the dockets of the courts in any other way. I think that is the best thing we can do on this subject.

Mr. MORGAN. Cutting off the right of appeal?

Mr. HOAR. To that extent.

Mr. MORGAN. Very important questions arise in cases under $500, frequently; just as important as any other questions.

Mr. HOAR. This bill provides for them.

Mr. MORGAN. As an instance, there is the case of Marbury vs. Madison, which arose in regard to the right of a justice of the peace to hold the office; and it led to one of the most important decisions we have ever had in the United States. Very important questions may arise to affect a man the amount of whose litigation may be less than $500, and that man ought to have the right to have the opinion of the appellate court, notwithstanding the small amount involved. It would be right now to provide in this bill that the jurisdiction of the circuit court to hear appeals from the district courts in sums exceeding $500 shall no longer exist, and then leave the jurisdiction otherwise as it stands now intact. That would be securing all the rights that exist and giving additional rights to litigants to take appeals from the district court to the circuit court where the sum in controversy exceeds $500.

Mr. HOAR. If the Chair will delay one moment the striking of the hammer, by unanimous consent I wish simply to say in reply that the right of appeal where there is no question involved of any general importance, but only a small amount of property involved, is ordinarily only a means of oppression which can be practiced by rich litigants against poor litigants. They can appeal and employ counsel and carry the cases to the distress of the person claiming justice; and it seemed to the committee, and it did to Judge Davis when he drew this bill and carefully considered the point, that on the whole more justice would be obtained by leaving the bill as we have left it, that is, in all cases under $500 to give the right of appeal where there is an important general question involved, and also in these special cases, but not to give it merely on account of the amount under that sum.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senate will indulge me just one moment, I wish to say in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts that this right of appeal has existed since the first organization of our judicial system. It has not worked badly. Doubtless, in many cases, it has been the means of securing justice to men who had small sums in litigation. There is no complaint against it. There is no reason why it should be destroyed, and we can easily preserve it without infringing in the slightest degree upon the jurisdiction of this intermediate appellate court. I therefore think that in the arrangement of this bill we ought to make it a bill to confer additional rights rather than to destroy any that exist where the practice has been useful.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 5461) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the first amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], on which the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I have not participated in the debate upon the subject of interstate commerce now before the Senate up to this time for the reason that the House bill, it was known, would after awhile become the subject of discussion, and my opinion of the Senate bill is and has been that it is a measure of no practical value, and that any amendment in accord with its theory would fail to give it anything of usefulness or merit.

The House bill is one which I hope will be examined thoroughly by the Senate. It is a conservative measure. It is thoroughly well considered. It is the product of a debate and discussion in the press, in the two Houses of Congress, and among the people of ten years' standing, and it represents in its principles and policy the popular will on this great question.

This bill provides that freight and passenger in interstate railroad transportation rates shall be reasonable. It prohibits all discrimination in freight rates between individuals. As an adjunct to that proposition it prohibits rebates and drawbacks. It prohibits pooling and thereby promotes competition. It prohibits discrimination in freight rates between localities by forbidding a greater charge for a short haul than for a longer haul. Lastly, it requires the posting up of schedules of the rates of freight charges, and announces a penalty for charging more or less than the posted rates.

These are the great, leading, salient points of the House bill. I appeal to Senators to give the bill a candid examination and a fair hearing. I deem it proper to say this because the votes of the Senate taken within the last two weeks seem to indicate an opposition to the provisions of the House bill. An examination of that bill will show that it is a just and reasonable measure. It will show further that it embodies in its essential points that which is already the common law of the land in all the States. The States have the common law. The United States have no common law. That is to say, in every State in this Union the common law, as it is understood and adjudicated, prevails, while under the Government of the United States, a government of granted powers and of statutory enactments, the common law is not the general law. I believe I have stated the proposition correctly as it has been adjudicated in the courts, hence the necessity for Congressional legislation.

The Reagan or House bill contains the common law as adjudicated and enforced in the States on the subject of common carriers. I assert that to be a proposition which can not be denied. It prohibits all discriminations in freight rates between individuals. Is it necessary for me to cite authorities upon this proposition? I apprehend it is not with members of the legal profession at least. If it were, I could cite any number of decisions of the highest courts in this country.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator refer to the common law or the statute law of the States?

Mr. COKE. I am speaking of the common law. I will refer to two or three cases which I find conveniently grouped in an able argument of Mr. Chittenden, of New York, before the House Committee on Commerce, which fully illustrates the common law on the subject of pooling. Ten or twelve canal-boatmen in the State of New York scraped together a thousand or twelve hundred dollars each and bought each one of them a canal-boat. Upon these canal-boats they lived winter and summer and the year round with their families, and made their living by running them. Ten or twelve of these horny-handed men concluded that they would form a pool; that they would make a combination; that they would put their boats into a joint-stock company and run them under one head and divide the profits. Those men were sued in the courts of New York, and the supreme court of New York decided that the pool, the agreement, the joint-stock company of these canal-men was an illegal enterprise, and the combination was broken up. I have here what the judge delivering the opinion of the court said with reference to the combination. He said:

> It is nothing less than the attainment of an exemption of the standard of freights, and the facilities and the accommodations to be rendered to the public, from the wholesome influence of rivalry and competition. To produce that end more completely, each member binds himself not only to run all his present boats according to the agreement and turn their earnings into the common stock, at the rate agreed upon, and at which rate he is to be charged in the final distribution, though he may have received or charged less, but he is also prohibited, under severe penalties, from employing on any other terms boats subsequently acquired. The association being thus secure against internal defection and external encroachments, and the members having thrown their concerns into stock, to derive an income in proportion to the number of shares they hold, and not according to their merited activity in business, and safe against the reduction of compensation that would otherwise follow mean accommodations and want of skill and attention, the public must necessarily suffer grievous loss. Indeed the consequences of such a state of things would be that freighters and passengers would be ill served just in proportion that carriers were well paid.

That was a pool between canal-boatmen whose misfortune it was to be poor and to only have a thousand or twelve hundred dollars apiece with which to purchase ten or twelve canal-boats. Here in the sixty-eighth volume of Pennsylvania State Reports, page 173, is the case of The M. Railroad Company vs. Barclay Coal Company, in which the court said:

> The effects produced upon the public interests lead to the consideration of another feature of great weight in determining the legality of the contract, to wit, the combination resorted to by these five companies. Singly, each might have suspended deliveries and sales of coal to suit its own interests, and might have raised the price, even though this might have been detrimental to the public interest. There is a certain freedom which must be allowed to every one in the management of his own affairs. When competition is left free, individual error or folly will generally find a correction in the conduct of others. But here is a combination of all the companies operating in the Blossburg and Burday mining regions, and controlling their entire productions.
> They have combined together to govern the supply and the price of coal in all the markets from the Hudson to the Mississippi Rivers, and from Pennsylvania to the lakes. This combination has a power in its confederated form which no individual action can supply. The public interest must succumb to it, for it has left no competition free to correct its baleful influence. When the supply of coal is suspended the demand for it becomes important and prices must rise; or, if the price goes forward, the price fixed by the confederates must accompany it. The domestic hearth, the furnaces of the iron-master, and fires of the manufacturer all feel the restraint, while many dependent hands are paralyzed and hungry mouths are stinted. The influence of a lack of supply or the rise in the price of an article of such supreme necessity can not be measured. It permeates the entire mass of the community and leaves few of its members untouched by its withering blight. Such a combination is more than a contract; it is an offense.

That is the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. It is leveled against combinations of the character denounced by the Reagan bill, which but voices in its main provisions the best established maxims of the common law. Judge Hallett, in delivering the opinion of the court in another case, which was concurred in by Judge McCrary, commences with the following declaration:

> The duty of common carriers to give equal service upon equal terms and upon reasonable compensation to all who may apply to them to carry persons and property is as well established as any rule of the common law.

Mr. MORGAN. Was that a Federal court?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir; Judge McCrary and Judge Hallett, in the circuit court of the United States. Judge Hallett proceeded as follows:

> And whatever is inconsistent with it or with the purpose for which it is adopted is against public policy, and can not be upheld. The defendant refuses to carry to and from Denver except in connection with the Rio Grande road; not absolutely, indeed, but for the price charged in connection with that road. To say to the public that the rate should be less by the Rio Grande road than by any other line is in effect to say that the public shall use that road only. A very little difference in tolls will prohibit traffic over other lines, and clearly enough such was the effect in this case. It is admitted that the defendant refuses to carry, in connection with the complainant, at the same rate of charges as with the Rio Grande Company, and then it charges for such carriage a much higher rate. For all practical purposes this course of proceeding amounts to a refusal to carry except in connection with the Rio Grande road.

Says Mr. Chittenden:

> After considering the excuses urged for the necessity of this action, Judge Hallett declines to speak at length of the contract, lest he "might convey an impression that for some purposes these corporations have the powers which, in this instrument, they have assumed to exercise." He declares that it is enough to say that it is a conspiracy to grasp commerce and to suppress the building of railroads in two great States, and he cites decisions of the courts of New York, Pennsylvania, and other States in which similar provisions have fallen under condemnation.

That is a very instructive case, and a very able note to that case by Mr. Adelbert Hamilton, one of the editors of the Law Reporter, says:

> There can be no question that according to American authority a railroad pooling contract is monopolous in its tendency and objectionable as such, for these three reasons, so tersely reported by Lord Coke in Darcy v. Allen (2 Coke's Reports, 84), where, speaking of such monopolies, it is said: "A monopoly hath three incidents mischievous to the public: First, the raising of the price; second, the commodity will not be so good; third, the impoverishing of poor artificers."

I assert as an undeniable proposition: First, that at common law the charges of a common carrier must be reasonable. Second, that a common carrier can not discriminate in freight rates between individuals. Third, that common carriers can not pool and thereby prevent competition. At common law these propositions are indisputable. I will go further and say that the prohibition upon pooling, that the equality as to all persons for whom they carry enjoined upon common carriers at common law, prohibits discrimination between places. I assert further that the highest public policy requires that common carriers who, like railroad corporations, exercise a part of the sovereignty of the state in condemning land under the right of eminent domain, exercise to a certain extent public offices, public trusts, shall be amenable to public supervision, and that these public offices, these public trusts, the people are entitled to know all about in their administration, and that, therefore, the railroad companies should be required to post up their schedules of rates of freight charges as required by the House bill. All the propositions which I have enumerated are contained in the House bill. There is nothing more nor anything less in the House bill than those propositions except the modes and methods of enforcing them.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Would it interfere with the Senator's speech if I should in this connection ask him a question?

Mr. COKE. Not at all, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask the question for information entirely. As I understand the Senator's remarks, they reach the point that a railway company having the power to condemn or take private property for a use, it must be a public use and to the public benefit. So far I agree with the Senator fully, and perhaps I might even go further, because I believe that if a railway company, having the power to condemn private property for public use, fails to conserve the public interest, it has then no more right to that land than a custom-house officer has to the custom-house at the end of his term of office.

But the point I wanted to raise was this: Does the Senator go so far as to say that Congress should intervene when the rates are reasonable? I do not suppose anybody would go beyond saying that the rate must be reasonable. Suppose it is reasonable, and still the railway companies decide to pool. In short, how can you reach a railway company for pooling the freight while maintaining reasonable rates? How do you propose to punish them? Let me put the question still broader. What is the justice in attempting to punish a transportation line for pooling its business with other lines when at the same time all the lines in the pool maintain reasonable rates?

Mr. COKE. I understand the Senator's question. I will say to him that in the State of New York, where the pooling contract of ten or twelve canal-boatmen was incontinently squelched and sat down upon by the courts, there is a pool of forty-odd railroads, which control the commerce of that great city and all its dependencies, which openly defies all the power and authority of the State. The conclusive presumption of law is that damage results from a violation of law. To hold that a party may violate the law on his idea that no damage will result from it would destroy all law. The mere fact of violating the law is an offense or crime without reference to its results.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If I may again interrupt the Senator, I think there is a very wide distinction between the parallel he draws and a railroad company. It is well known to the Senator that the people of the State of New York, owning the Erie Canal, which the people of that great State and the property of that State were taxed to construct, decided to abate all the tolls upon the canal because they deemed it to be a public benefit. They furnished the so-called canal-boatmen, of which the Senator speaks, with water ways free of cost from the lakes to the seaboard, upon which they had the privilege of traveling without any cost whatever except simply that of pulling their boats. If I understand the case correctly they undertook to establish an unreasonable rate, and by means of a pool to continue an increased rate to the public detriment. I must submit to the Senator that there is a very wide distinction——

Mr. COKE. I yielded for a question and not for a speech.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Very well; I shall sit down.

Mr. COKE. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that the pool among these canal boatmen, of which I speak, according to my remembrance, was made and decided before the State of New York ever threw open her canals, and the action of the court in deciding that the pool was unlawful, because in contravention of the common law, was dependent upon no such action of the State of New York as that to which the Senator adverts.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That alters the case in a measure.

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. President, I say that the Reagan or House bill is simply a codification of the principles of the common law in all the great leading points of the bill—principles that are enforced every day in the administration of law in the States. They can not be enforced in interstate commerce by the States, because there is no authority in the States having jurisdiction over the subject, and Congress alone has the power.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Texas will allow me to ask him a question just there, I will ask if he has not cited a case here in which Federal judges have in a circuit court of the United States applied these principles of common law to transactions between railroads out in the West, and if the Federal courts have not as much power as the State courts in the administration of those principles of the common law which he says are codified in the Reagan bill?

Mr. COKE. Yes, the decision to which I adverted awhile ago, participated in by Judge McCrary, was the decision of a Federal circuit court. The principles of the Reagan bill are legal principles that are standing in every State in this Union and enforced every day by the State courts.

Mr. HARRISON. I wished to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps the Senator from Alabama asked the question which is in my mind; I could not hear quite what he said. If it be true that the Reagan bill simply puts into the form of statutory law the common law of the country, is not that common law now applicable to interstate commerce, and have not the courts of the United States jurisdiction to enforce it without reference to any statute?

Mr. MORGAN. That was the point of my question precisely.

Mr. COKE. The Senator from Indiana is simply repeating the question of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HARRISON. I could not hear what the Senator from Alabama said.

Mr. COKE. I say that the principles of the Reagan bill are the principles of the common law in all substantial respects; but the railroad companies deny the power of Congress over this subject. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] yesterday read from the argument of Governor Brown, of Tennessee, representing 6,000 miles of railroad in the Southwest, to show that he denies that Congress has the power to legislate upon this subject. I believe that the courts of this country have a right to enforce the leading propositions of the Reagan bill, but the country generally is in doubt on the subject. The railroad companies deny the power, and it has been thought by the House of Representatives of sufficient importance to the country that Congress should legislate upon the subject, and if necessary re-enact what may be, and as I think is already, the law of the land on the subject of common carriers.

Mr. Fink, a leading and representative and very able railroad man, the man who, at the head of the New York pool of upward of forty of the leading lines of road in the United States, denies the power of Congress to legislate on this subject, and in his argument before the House Committee on Commerce made this denial in the most emphatic terms. Let Senators who desire information on this subject consult the records of the House Committee on Commerce, and they will find that the leading, governing men in our railroad system and the attorneys of the roads all deny the power of Congress to legislate as proposed in the Reagan bill, and are defiant in the assertion of their right to violate every principle asserted in it and to be themselves the judges of what is reasonable and right in running the roads.

And besides, the Reagan bill provides remedies not given by common law, remedies shown to be necessary to enable the citizens to overcome the great advantages the railroad corporations have over them in matters of litigation and contest.

The Reagan bill says that freight charges shall be reasonable. No Senator will controvert the correctness of that proposition. The Reagan bill provides that railroad corporations shall not discriminate in their charges between individuals. Is not this just and right? Let the Senator who claims it is not rise in his place in the United States Senate and declare that these public corporations, public agents and trustees, have the right to discriminate, as they are now doing every day between persons, and that all American citizens are not equally entitled to the service rendered by these public servants. Let him put himself on record as affirming that some people in this country ought to have freights at half that charged to others and that the railroad managers are of right the sole judges as to who these persons should be.

In order to prevent discriminations between persons the Reagan bill prohibits rebates and drawbacks. Rebates and drawbacks occur where a person is ostensibly charged as other people are for similar service, and the railroad companies pay him back amounts by way of rebate, and thereby give him an advantage. It is said by Judge REAGAN, who had charge of this bill in the other House and is its author, that in eighteen months $10,000,000 were paid to the Standard Oil Company, in the State of Pennsylvania, in rebates, and through that discrimination in favor of that company the company has been able to strangle every particle of competition in the United States.

These are two of the propositions in the Reagan bill. The third prohibits pooling. I have read to you from decisions of both State and Federal courts and could read hundreds of others, for the books are full of them, declaring that combinations of that character are contrary to public policy and unlawful. In the language of the Pennsylvania judge, "It is more than a contract, it is an offense."

The fourth is that it prohibits discrimination in the freight rates between localities by forbidding a greater charge for a short than for a longer haul. If the individual ought not to be discriminated against, if there should be no discrimination between single individuals, ought there, by parity of reasoning, to be any discrimination between collections of individuals in cities and towns? Ought there to be any discrimination between a collection of individuals in a city or town if the law requires that there shall be none between individuals? I think the one proposition is corroborative of the other.

If the first proposition is correct the latter can not be wrong. All the complications sought to be thrown around the difference between "the long and the short haul" can not obscure the fact which stands out in bold relief that all the individuals, all the people, between the initial and the terminal points of the long haul are discriminated against and taxed with high freight rates in order to make up alleged losses on the long haul. The Reagan bill, conservative in this as in all its provisions, does allow as much charged for the short haul as for the longer haul, but not more; and because of the prohibition upon more for a short haul than a longer one on the same road is assailed violently as an effort to disturb the laws of commerce. In my judgment the bill is too liberal to the railroads in this respect, but of this they have no right to complain.

The fifth proposition requires the posting up of schedules of rates of freight charges and prescribes a penalty for charging more or less than the posted rates. Have not the public a right to know the rates? Mark you, the railroad corporations exercise functions derived from the States in the condemnation of their right of way through this country. They have possession of the highways. They carry the mails. They drive off all other sorts of competition. There is no way of exchanging our products overland except by their cars. Does any gentleman mean to say that the action of these corporations, which in the language of a New York judge execute public offices, should be secret, and that they should not post their rates in public places so that the public whose powers they are exercising can know about them and govern itself accordingly? Is this not a fair and reasonable requirement?

These five propositions, prohibiting discriminations between individuals, prohibiting rebates, prohibiting pooling, prohibiting discrimination between places, and requiring rates to be posted up in public places, are all the requirements of the Reagan bill, and everything else in the bill simply prescribes the methods of enforcing them. This is the bill which has been denounced by railroad officials and attorneys, by members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives and a considerable portion of the press of the country as a most intolerable outrage upon the rights of railroad corporations. For the most part, a simple re-enactment or codification of well-established common-law principles necessary to protect the citizen against the rapacity of corporate power which the corporations declare are not binding on them and violate every day, is declared from these sources to be a most dangerous, revolutionary, and abominable thing for Congress to do.

A motion was made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to take up the House bill, and after it was taken up he moved to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the Senate bill. What does that mean? It means that the prohibition upon discriminations in freight between individuals shall be stricken out of the House bill.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the Senate bill does not mean that. It expressly prohibits unjust discriminations.

Mr. COKE. I will discuss the Senate bill after a little. I will show what sort of a bill it is. It will strike out the prohibition of discrimination between individuals. It will strike out the prohibition of rebates and drawbacks by which the railroad companies secretly discriminate in favor of individuals. It will strike out the prohibition upon pooling. Is there anything in the Senate bill which prohibits pooling, declared by the highest State and Federal courts to be unlawful? It will strike that out. It will strike out the prohibition against discrimination in freight rates between localities. It will strike out the requirement that the railroad companies shall let the public know what their rates are, so that men may make their business contracts accordingly. The motion is to strike out these provisions and insert the Senate bill.

The Reagan bill comes here from the House of Representatives, not upon popular clamor, but upon a settled popular judgment. I know that the people sometimes go wrong, but give them a little time and they will always rectify their own errors. Their sober second thought is the perfection of human wisdom. The popular clamor, which it is said wafted this bill from the House here, has been a steady demand from the people for ten years through every method by which public opinion is ever voiced. The constitutions of twelve States of this Union contain the provisions of the Reagan bill in their substance. Legislatures of States, political conventions, boards of trade and exchange, county, district, national, and State conventions have all in turn spoken in behalf of the provisions of the Reagan bill. It comes here indorsed by the other House after ten years of discussion, after ten years of debate, and it would never have come over the obstructions and hindrances and opposition of the railroad corporations and their retainers and friends but for the masterly ability and the courage and persistency of a distinguished citizen of my State, whose name the bill bears, and who has linked that name imperishably with a manly and brave defense of popular rights against the encroachments of corporate power. This bill thus indorsed, thus containing in the main only the principles of the common law as they are decided in the States day after day and year after year and as it is settled and established—these plain, clear provisions are to be stricken out, and the Senate bill substituted, if the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] prevails.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to discuss very briefly the Senate bill. That bill was denounced upon the floor of the Senate a few days ago by the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] in an argument that no man has attempted to answer as unconstitutional. No Senator has risen in his place and controverted the positions of the Senator from Arkansas as to the unconstitutionality of that bill.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator from Texas will allow me, I will state that the amendment which I offered to the second section was to meet the objection of the Senator from Arkansas to the second section, and I showed him that amendment and he admitted that it avoided his objection. The objection was that the second section would be a delegation of all the power Congress has over interstate commerce. The amendment limits the powers of the commission to those specified in the act itself. It is a limitation of the power and not a delegation of the power Congress possesses over that subject.

Mr. COKE. I understand the amendment to be just as the Senator from Alabama states it so far as it goes; but the Senator from Alabama must remember that the objection of the Senator from Arkansas went not alone to the second section. To use his own language, under this bill these commissioners start out as a legislative body, but as they go on into the sections they become a court; they have the power to administer oaths, to call for books and papers, to summon witnesses, to enter judgments. Yet they are to be appointed by the President and removable at his will and pleasure. Are they to be judges? If they are to be judges, if they are to exercise judicial functions, that bill violates the plain letter of the Constitution and all the traditions of this Government and of the Anglo-Saxon race in making a judge dependent for his salary and his bread upon the pleasure of the President or any executive officer. In so far as the President is authorized to remove, it trenches upon the constitutional requirement that judges shall be appointed for life. It destroys the independence of the judge. If there is one thing established in American constitutional jurisprudence it is that the judges are and shall ever be independent of the Executive.

This bill as originally reported to the Senate gave legislative powers to this commission, except that it did not authorize a penalty in its enactments without which they could not have been enforced. It gives as it now stands to this commission judicial powers, except that it can not issue an execution or injunction nor enforce its judgments. What then does the bill amount to? When the House of Representatives, obeying the mandate of the American people, send here a bill putting a curb upon the power of great railroad pools and corporations for the protection of the people you move to strike that out, to ignore it, and to insert under the enacting clause a provision which establishes a commission which has no legislative power under the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, and whose judicial power is unconstitutional and void, and if it were not, whose judicial power is a mere bauble and plaything, because without power to enforce itself, or even to protect itself by fining for contempt.

Then what do you propose to give to the House of Representatives in place of an efficient bill declaring that which is right and just and reasonable? What do you propose to give them in place of that bill which the motion of the Senator from Illinois would trample under foot and ignore, but this hybrid concern, a legislature which is impotent and a court which is powerless? That is the Senate bill.

But I call attention to another feature of this bill. Under sections 5 and 6 there are clauses which provide for a complaint to the commission by parties having grievances against railroad corporations. The commission is to hear the complaints and the evidence in support of them, and to make out its judgment and advise the railroad companies to comply, to obey. If the railroad companies choose not to obey, then the commission are to turn the papers over to the United States district attorney of the district where the grievance occurred for suit against the railroad company. The evidence taken, however, is only for the information of the district attorney, not of the court or jury. The point I make is this: It is a well-settled legal principle that Congress has power to regulate interstate commerce. The States may act upon the subject as long as Congress chooses not to intervene; but, as was decided in McCulloch vs. Maryland and in Gibbons vs. Ogden, whenever Congress does intervene, whenever Congress does regulate, the power of Congress is exclusive and supreme.

Now Congress, if this bill passes, does act and its action is exclusive. Would not the citizen upon the passage of this bill, if it should pass, find himself compelled to apply to this commission, and is he not ousted of the remedies that he now has in the courts of the country, and must he not come before this commission first? Must he not make his complaint first before this commission and wait until the commission has heard him and has sent his papers to the United States district attorney before he can go into the courts of the country as he can go now?

I object to it on that ground, and I call attention to the fact that there are nine commissioners provided for. Including the district of Columbia and other Territories there are forty-seven States and Territories in this Union. Divide 47 by 9. Each commissioner will have an average of five States and Territories under his jurisdiction. Can any one man hear and determine the complaints against the railroad companies in five States and Territories embracing long distances? I think not.

Mr. MAXEY. Will my colleague allow me to suggest a point in that connection? If the citizen is required under the Senate bill to go before the commission, and if the railroad companies refuse to abide by its decision and force him into the courts, the costs are double, making the burden that much more.

Mr. COKE. I was coming to that proposition. Here you take away the remedies the people now have and send them before a commission that is unconstitutional in its judicial functions; you interpose this powerless commission between the people and a remedy. You must recollect that these complaints against railroad companies are by the statutes of the different States mostly barred in one year, that there are hardly any of them which are not barred in two years; yet you force a man in Oregon, in California, in Texas, in the remotest confines of the Republic, to Washington before this commission with his witnesses and attorneys at great expense, and for what? To get the commission to express an opinion which the railroad corporations deride and ignore with impunity; and while this is being done the statutes under which the complaint is barred by local law run and the citizen's remedy is gone. That is the proposition before us; that is in substance and effect this commission bill. Instead of giving a remedy to the citizen you are taking away from him the only remedy he has and giving him a worthless thing that is not worth the paper it is written on. The people ask for bread and you cast them a stone.

Now, Mr. President, it is proposed that the Senate of the United States shall ignore the reasonable, sensible, simple propositions contained in the Reagan bill, embodying substantially the common law of the land, which should be left to the courts of the country at the homes of the people of the United States to enforce, as is done in the Reagan bill. It is proposed to ignore these, although the people have demanded them in every form in which they can speak, and give them the remedy of a commission, which takes away from the people the only remedy they now have and leaves their complaints against the railroad companies barred by limitation before they find out whether the commission will allow them to bring suit or not.

I call attention to another feature of this bill. It provides that when the commission send these complaints to the district attorney the Federal courts, regardless of citizenship, shall have jurisdiction. It discriminates against the State courts; it ousts the citizen of his right to sue in his courts at home and drags him to the Federal courts perhaps hundreds of miles away. In the first place it drags him perhaps three thousand miles to Washington with his witnesses and lawyers in order to present his case to a commission which is utterly powerless to give him redress.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I had supposed that the purpose of the House bill was to confer jurisdiction on the Federal courts.

Mr. COKE. No, sir. The House bill leaves all litigation that arises under it at home where the transaction occurred and witnesses and parties reside.

The Senate bill will bring litigants in the first place to Washington before the commission; and who believes that this commission can hear 10 per cent. in a year of the complaints that ought to be filed against railroad companies? Does any man believe that this commission can hear them and intelligently decide them? It can not be done. The offer of such a remedy is a denial of any remedy at all.

Mr. President, these are the bills: The Reagan bill, a plain, direct bill, to be enforced by the courts of the country; the commission bill, establishing a new tribunal, which will be declared unconstitutional, and which, if it is constitutional, has no more power to enforce what the commissioners believe to be right than I have or any Senator sitting around me has. These are the bills between which we must choose.

Mr. President, there is more in this debate than appears on the surface to the casual observer. We hear on all sides earnest professions of a desire to remedy evils which all admit permeate our present system of railroad management. These professions are doubtless sincere. It is the more difficult in view of this fact to understand and account for the evident leaning of the Senate, as shown by the numerous ay-and-no votes taken on amendments proposed to the Senate bill, against the simple, direct, and straightforward provisions of the Reagan bill, so reasonable in themselves and so easy of enforcement by the courts of the country already established, and the equally evident disposition of the Senate to adopt a commission bill establishing at a heavy expense a tribunal without power to accomplish anything, and from the date of its creation as proposed in the Senate bill perfectly helpless and powerless.

The honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] has aided materially in solving the difficulty referred to in a bold and explicit avowal of his own views on this subject, and in the light of his able and learned speech made a few days ago we are able to understand much of what before was enigmatical. The high character as well as the acknowledged ability of this distinguished Senator, while vouching for the sincerity of his utterances, when coupled with the fact that he is a successful railroad president and practical administrator of railroad affairs—in a word, a leading and representative railroad man—gives to the views expressed by him peculiar significance. The honorable Senator, disdaining any subterfuge while directing his adroit and powerful argument against the Reagan bill, which he regards with the utmost aversion, and declaring that he will support the Senate bill in preference, does not hesitate to say that he is opposed to both bills and to any legislation on the subject. He says further that he favors the pooling of railroad lines as the only practical solution of the railroad problem in this country, and in the short extract I now read from his speech places himself distinctly on the ground now advocated by Mr. Charles Francis Adams, jr., of Massachusetts:

> This system works injustice both to the merchant and the purchaser. What the merchant wants is a uniform system, where every man will be charged reasonable prices and no more and where everybody is charged alike, and that is right. But, as matters now stand in the transportation world, you can get that only under the pooling system. There is no other possible way to reach it in practice. As there has been some sharp criticism of the Southern Railway and Steamship Association, as there must be about the management of all great interests of that character, I want to read here what a very wise and very able man, who is in no way connected with the South or with the association, says on the subject—a gentleman who has spent many years of his life in studying the railroad problem, a gentleman who is one of the oldest railroad commissioners in America, a man of high character and distinguished ability as well as of a distinguished family. I refer to Hon. Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts.

The honorable Senator then quotes copiously from Mr. Adams in advocacy of the pooling or consolidation of railroad lines, and says:

> We may first appoint a commission composed of a small number of persons. In practice it will soon be found that they need numerous assistants and subagents scattered all over this country. The job we are undertaking will be entirely too large for any five, or seven, or ten men, without an enormous retinue of subalterns. What commission at Washington can grasp this whole subject and look into all the details of railroad transportation?

Again, he says:

> It is simply out of the question, and in practice it will soon be found so, and the position will then be taken that it is absolutely necessary to increase the force, and it will grow from one point to another until the agents of the Government in a few years will be found located in all parts of the Union, supervising this immense interest.

The honorable Senator opposes the Senate bill commission, but would infinitely prefer that to the Reagan bill. He desires, like Mr. Adams, that the Government shall "hands off" and leave the railroad lines to consolidate in a "federation" under one head and a government of their own. This imperium in imperio, I will remark, it is not contemplated shall have in it any representation from the people, but is to be constituted of railroad men and to be a law unto itself, free from Government interference, with full power to tax all the products of this country—the vast commerce carried by rail—as it may deem expedient and right.

An examination of the discussions before the House Committee on Commerce, which were able and exhaustive, will show that the views expressed by the Senator from Georgia on this subject and by Mr. Charles Francis Adams are shared by all the leading railroad men of this country, and that the project of perfecting a grand consolidation of all the railroad lines in the United States in a federation under one government and one head is not only contemplated but in process of consummation, and will be consummated if Congress shall fail to act energetically on the subject. I read from what Mr. Adams has written about it:

> Beyond and behind this, however, the railroad corporations of the United States have from the beginning enjoyed a sort of lawless independence. Corporations, like communities, accustomed to this, necessarily remain for a long time restive under any sense of control. They need constantly to feel that a policeman's eye is upon them, and that there is a station-house in the next street. No one or two great corporations have yet been developed with power sufficient to assume a coercive protectorate over the others and to compel obedience. The combination of the trunk lines and their recent action toward their connections in the West is the first approach yet made toward this result. But without the cohesive influence of some such protectorate there is in all voluntary combinations a natural tendency to anarchy. In the absence, therefore, of any compelling force to secure order and subordination, the mill of competition has got to keep on grinding for some time yet. Its work is not done. Indeed, it will not be done until, through the process of its grinding, the great principle of the survival of the fittest is finally ground out.
> This process is unlikely to prove a rapid one, for order is not easily established in any community which has been long in a state of anarchy. In such cases the demoralization becomes general; the tone of the individual deteriorates. This is what is now the matter with the railroad system of America.

I ask the attention of Senators to this:

> Lawlessness and violence among themselves, the continual effort of each member to protect itself and to secure the advantage over others, have, as they usually do, bred a general spirit of distrust, bad faith, and cunning, until railroad officials have become hardly better than a race of horse-jockeys on a large scale. There are notable individual exceptions to this statement, but taken as a whole the tone among them is indisputably low. There are none of that steady confidence in each other, that easy good faith, that esprit de corps, upon which alone system and order can rest. On the contrary, the leading idea in the mind of the active railroad agent is that some one is always cheating him, or that he is never getting his share of something. If he enters into an agreement his life is passed in watching the other parties to it, lest by some cunning device they keep it in form and break it in spirit. Peace is with him always a condition of semi-warfare, while honor for its own sake and good faith apart from self-interest are, in a business point of view, symptoms of youth and defective education. Under such circumstances, what is there but force upon which to build? It was the absence of the element of force which caused the failure of the Saratoga association and probably will cause the failure of those which have succeeded it. Taken as a whole, the American railroad system is in much the same condition as Mexico and Spain are politically. In each case a Cæsar or a Napoleon is necessary.

He proceeds:

> When, however, the time is ripe and the man comes, the course of affairs can even now be foreshadowed; for it is always pretty much the same. Instead of the wretched condition of chronic semi-warfare which now exists, there will be one decisive struggle, in which from the beginning to the end the fighting will be forced. There will be no patched-up truces made only to be broken, for the object of that struggle will be the complete ruin of some one in the shortest possible time. Then will come the combination of a few who will be sufficiently powerful to restrain the many. The result, expressed in a few words, would be a railroad federation under a protectorate.

Again he says:

The united action of the great through lines is necessary to bring this about; and how to secure that action is now the problem. If the elder Vanderbilt were alive and in the full possession of his powers, he would probably solve the difficulty in the way most natural to him. Meanwhile, although Commodore Vanderbilt is dead, there are very significant indications that his work is going on. His vast property, in the peculiar shape in which he left it and as it is now handled, seems to be little else than an accumulated fund devoted to bringing about a consolidation of railroad interests on the largest possible scale. The New York Central is the basis upon which this superstructure rests.

These are the views of Mr. Adams, so highly eulogized by the Senator from Georgia. He favors a railroad federation, a railroad government, under the imperial head of some great railroad magnate. I will read to you a little more from him. I have a speech entitled "Views of Charles Francis Adams, jr., on the subject of a national railroad commission," delivered before the Merchants' Association at Boston, and after discussing the character of men who ought to be on a commission, and fearing that such men would not be put upon a commission, he said:

Given a commission such as I have suggested, and the so-called railroad problem would present few difficulties. It would either be understood and regulated, or, what I consider much more probable, it would be understood and largely let alone.

I read from Mr. Adams, because he is a leading representative railroad man, and expresses the views of the governing men of that class in this country. He desires and expects to see the railroads of the United States united in one grand federation, one grand and magnificent monopoly, made up of all the smaller monopolies. If he were in the Senate to-day he would vote for the Senate bill and denounce the Reagan bill, and would defeat both, if in his power, as the Senator from Georgia would, for the simple reason that he believes the railroad corporations should be "let alone" to go on and perfect their "federation."

I read again from the same speech:

Composed of such men the commission would be of the greatest public service, and a credit to the country. Men like these, I assure you—and I am now talking of what I know—wielding the great force of publicity, and letting light into dark places, with Congress behind them, would call for few of those stringent laws which the average legislator loves so to pass. If, however, your commission is to be made up not of men like these, but of men with "claims on the party," or any of that kind of cattle, then it would be a nuisance and a disgrace, and the end would be worse than the beginning.

It would be a disgrace to have in the commission any representative man of the popular sentiment of this country on this subject, and that is precisely what Mr. Adams means when he speaks of "such cattle."

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that, learned and scholarly and intellectual man as Mr. Adams is represented to be and illustrious as his family name is, he sometimes changes his opinions as well as do others. I will read some extracts from his book on the railroad problem, written some years ago, when surrounded by circumstances different from those which now attend him, and ask the Senate to mark the dangers he then so ably depicted to the Government and the people of the railroad combinations he now so earnestly advocates:

Gould and Fisk will at last be obliged to yield to the force of moral and economical laws. * * * Though the regular process of development may be depended upon in its ordinary and established course to purge American society of the worst agents of an exceptionally corrupt time, there is in the history of this Erie corporation one matter in regard to which modern society everywhere is directly interested. For the first time since the creation of these enormous corporate bodies one of them has shown its power for mischief and has proved itself able to override and trample on law, custom, decency, and every restraint known to society, without scruple and as yet without check. The belief is common in America that the day is at hand when corporations far greater than Erie—swaying power such as has never in the world's history been trusted in the hands of mere private citizens, controlled by single men like Vanderbilt, or by combinations of men like Fisk, Gould and Lane—after having created a system of quiet but irrepressible corruption, will ultimately succeed in directing government itself. Under the American form of society there is now no authority capable of effective resistance. The National Government, in order to deal with the corporations, must assume powers refused to it by its fundamental law; and even then is always exposed to the chance of forming an absolute central government, which sooner or later is likely to fall into the very hands it is struggling to escape, and thus destroy the limits of its power only in order to make corruption omnipotent. Nor is the danger confined to America alone. The corporation is in its nature a threat against the popular institutions which are spreading so rapidly over the whole world. Wherever there is a popular and limited government this difficulty will be found in its path, and unless some satisfactory solution of the problem can be reached popular institutions may yet find their very existence endangered.

Again he says:

Here, amid the ruin they had contrived, it is best to leave the Erie Railway, its directors, their tools, and their victims, the exchange, the business community, and the Gold Board—

Referring to the celebrated Black Friday.

When all is said and done, the confusion and dismay prevailing was only no more than what the presence of such a disturbing power as the Erie Railway, in the control of such hands, must always render possible, even if it be not periodical. In themselves the men are nothing; as rulers of the corporation they become terrible. The spring and autumn of 1868, and the spring, summer, and autumn of 1869 had seen the last appliances of civilization perverted into the machinery of organized theft; and through them acts of fraud, treachery, and violence had been unblushingly perpetrated before all men. Since the days of the feudal barons no private hands had wielded such a power in a way so unscrupulous. Risk will not deter them, for ruin can not touch them; to them belongs the gain, but not to them the loss.

Other depredators, by sea and by land, fly from the officers of justice; but these men [Fisk and Gould] ever find securest shelter under the protection of courts of law, whose magistrates they make. Safe in that protection, cowed but not subdued, it is fit and proper here to leave them, masters of Erie, and, as a consequence, masters of the situation, but a blot upon the civilization of the nineteenth century and a lasting disgrace to that financial and commercial organism which renders possible, and that public opinion which tolerates, their existence.

As was said by another:

Such was the picture drawn of Mr. Gould in the earlier stages of his great career by Mr. Charles Francis Adams, jr., now sitting beside him in loving companionship in the same board over which, by Mr. Gould's will and pleasure, he now presides.

Mr. Adams, since the above was written, has been made by Mr. Gould the president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

There is his description of Mr. Gould. Here is the description of the power of railroad corporations. He says the Government will have to assume powers not granted by the Constitution in order to protect itself against the dangers they threaten to it, speaking of one single corporation, the Erie; and now this same gentleman advocates a consolidation of all the railroad corporations in the United States, under one grand head, free from Government control. Against his views of former years he advocates a grand railroad federation; and in the speech that I have just read to you, delivered before the Board of Trade of Boston, he does not even desire a commission to interfere; he desires no legislation; but wishes the combination to run on under the will and control and government of men of whom he says, in an extract from his book which I have just read to you, they are simply the worst character of horse-jockeys on a large scale.

I read again. Says Mr. Adams:

One leading feature of these developments, however, is, from its political aspect, especially worthy of the attention of the American people. Modern society has created a class of artificial beings who bid fair soon to be the masters of their creator.

It is but a very few years since the existence of a corporation controlling a few millions of dollars was regarded as a subject of grave apprehension, and now this country already contains single organizations which wield a power represented by hundreds of millions. These bodies are the creatures of single States; but in New York, in Pennsylvania, in Maryland, in New Jersey, and not in those States alone, they are already establishing despotisms which no spasmodic popular effort will be able to shake off.

Yes, Mr. Adams would have a grand railroad federation of all the corporations in this country when he says a few of them in these States have established despotisms "which no spasmodic popular effort will be able to shake off."

Everywhere, and at all times, however, they illustrate the truth of the old maxim of the common law that corporations have no souls. Only in New York has any intimation yet been given of what the future may have in store for us should these great powers become mere tools in the hands of ambitious, reckless men. The system of corporate life and corporate power, as applied to industrial development, is yet in its infancy. It tends always to development—always to consolidation—it is ever grasping new powers or insidiously exercising covert influence. Even now the system threatens the central Government.

He does not now feel that a consolidation of all the railroads will do it.

The Erie Railway represents a weak combination compared to those which day by day are consolidating under the unsuspecting eyes of the community. A very few years more and we shall see corporations as much exceeding the Erie and the New York Central in both ability and will for corruption as they will exceed those roads in wealth and in length of iron track. We shall see these great corporations spanning the continent from ocean to ocean. * * * Now their power is in its infancy; in a very few years they will re-enact, on a larger theater and on a grander scale, with every feature magnified, the scenes which were lately witnessed on the narrow stage of a single State. The public corruption is the foundation on which corporations always depend for their political power.

That was six years ago; and instead of Mr. Adams warning the people now as he did when this was written against the power of these corporations, we find him cheek by jowl with the men he was then condemning and favoring a grand federation of all the railroads of the country.

There is a natural tendency to coalition between them and the lowest strata of political intelligence and morality, for their agents must obey, not question. They exact success and do not cultivate political morality. The lobby is their home, and the lobby thrives as political virtue decays. The ring is their symbol of power, and the ring is the natural enemy of political purity and independence. All this was abundantly illustrated in the events which have just been narrated [in the chapter of Erie]. The existing coalition between the Erie Railway and the Tammany ring is a natural one, for the former needs votes, the latter money. This combination now controls the Legislature and courts of New York. That it controls also the executive of the State, as well as that of the city, was proved when Governor Hoffman recorded his reasons for signing the infamous Erie directors' bill. It is a new power for which our language contains no name. We know what aristocracy, autocracy, democracy, are; but we have no word to express "government by moneyed corporations." Yet the people already instinctively seek protection against it, and look for such protection, significantly enough, not to their own Legislatures, but to the single autocratic feature retained in our system of government—the veto by the executive. * * * The next step will be interesting. As the Erie ring represents the combination of the corporation and the hired proletariat of a great city; as Vanderbilt embodies the autocratic power of Cæsarism introduced into corporate life, and as neither alone can obtain complete control of the government of the State, it perhaps only remains for the coming man to carry the combination of elements one step in advance, and put Cæsarism at once in control of the corporation and of the proletariat, to bring our vaunted institutions within the rule of all historic precedent.

Can the English language condemn more strongly what Mr. Adams has since with equal vigor approved and advocated?

I deal, I repeat, with Mr. Adams as a public man and a great railroad expert, whose views have been invoked in this debate by the Senator from Georgia as having great authority and with the purpose of ascertaining as nearly as possible the weight to which his recent utterances in advocacy of a new policy are entitled.

Now I will read, in order that you may have some little idea of what a grand universal pool would mean, from the argument before the Commerce Committee of the House, made by Mr. Chittenden, of New York, a description of the pool at New York:

This pool commenced in 1877; it was then a pool contract between the four trunk lines centering in New York. It has grown and stretched out its arms and increased, just as an English judge said such contracts would grow and increase, until now it embraces certainly more than forty—that was the last enumeration I had—of the principal railroads of this country. There is in New York city an equipped and organized pool government. It has its executive committee of the trunk lines; its executive committee of the pool, and another executive committee composed of one member from each pooling railroad; it has its board of arbitration, which is intended to take the place of the judiciary; it has its corps of, I do not know how many hundred, clerks, an enormous concern, and over it all is the emperor, the commissioner, Mr. Fink, who to-day exercises a power for good or evil over the commerce and products of this country greater not only than that of any of his contemporaries, but greater than any man ever before exerted in the United States of America. He and his imperial organization are as independent of the law as it is possible for man or state to be, and the whole charter or contract which binds these forty roads into this one copartnership and confederation, judged by the principles of the common law, is as unlawful and as much against public policy, if we are to accept the declarations of the judges of the common law, as the Louisiana State lottery or any other similar institution which is confessedly without the pale of the common law.

There is a picture of the New York pool. Now imagine a pool or combination of all the railroads in the United States, embracing the whole country under one head and a central government like that in New York, and you see exactly what the railroad men of the United States are trying to accomplish. I have here the New York Journal of Commerce, handed me by a friend, of January 15. I read from the headlines of a column in order to show what the people may expect from the proposed "railroad federation," judging it by the New York pool:

Diverted freights and trade—Mercantile interests sacrificed to railroad pool necessities—Roundabout shipments and delays—Complaints of buyers and injury of trade—Merchants and railroad men in conference—Regulation of interstate commerce.

Now hear the New York State commission and the merchants of New York about the pool:

The Merchants' Club committee was represented by Mr. William F. King, of Calhoun, Robbins & Co., who opened the case with an address setting forth the cause of complaint. "Not only," said Mr. King, "has trade been diverted from our own city, but the merchants have suffered large losses from the return of goods, because of the serious delay in delivering to the consignee. These evils began with the organization of the pooling system in 1878 and have increased with the lapse of time, until for the past two years, and especially for the last year, they have been beyond the patient endurance of the mercantile community. Throughout the business of last spring every mercantile house suffered seriously by transfers of freight from the so-called fast freight lines known as the Merchants' Dispatch, the Star Union Line, the Union Line, the Empire Line, and the White Line to the Lackawanna and the West Shore, the Merchants' Dispatch alone transferring daily from three to two car-loads to the West Shore. The consequence was that from four to eight weeks elapsed before the goods so transferred reached their destination in Michigan, Illinois, and other Western States. The agent of the Merchants' Dispatch himself informed me that there were claims against them amounting to $50,000 for diversion of freight and for losses thereon. If you will pardon an allusion to the house of which I am a member, we had to duplicate a bill of merchandise purchased and pay the charges by express, the original shipment only reaching the customer in Michigan after very nearly two months' delay. All the merchants claim to have had similar trouble during the last spring with all fast freight lines having a system of connections to the West."

Mr. King here presented a quantity of documentary evidence, giving circumstantial details of cases in which delays had taken place. Among the examples was a shipment of goods by the Star Union Line which took fifteen days to reach Chicago. Several shipments to Pittsburgh, made on the 10th, 14th, 18th, and 21st of November, all reached their destination together on December 1, showing that the goods must have been held back to make up a car-load.

Mr. King continued: "The instances which these papers present are only a few of the many thousands of similar impositions from which the mercantile community has been and is now suffering, and on behalf of that long-suffering community the committee of three pray for speedy relief from these serious evils, and that such relief may be had prior to the opening of our spring business, which begins about February 1, so that the merchants here represented may be able to notify the customers that there will henceforth be no cause for complaint because of the slow delivery of whatever merchandise they may choose to purchase in this market."

I read that as a sample. There is a column representing different organizations in which similar statements are made.

I read again:

Mr. Abel Cook, on behalf of the Traders and Travelers' Union, urged that the merchants should have the right to choose the line by which they have their goods go, and said they did not like to be put in the position of suppliants for what they had a right to demand. The remedy they sought was some means of getting into court to enforce their common-law rights without being compelled to resort to the attorney-general and wait his determination in case the railroads refused to carry their freight without consent to the bill of lading imposed upon the shippers. The suggestion that the roads would refuse to act as forwarders beyond their own termini if compelled to do this he thought would be regulated by the principle of competition.

A recess here took place, after which Mr. Depew proceeded to make a general reply to the statements and suggestions presented. At the outset he said the State commission would be met by the difficulty that this is a question of interstate commerce, beyond their jurisdiction. Their action could only affect one section of the business of the New York Central, and could not touch the other roads. He thought the fact emphasized the need of intelligent national legislation on the subject, and denounced the Reagan bill as calculated to defeat the very object here sought.

At the conclusion—

In the course of the colloquy Commissioner Kernan said the commission were of opinion that the pool was illegal.

That was a modest suggestion made by the New York State commissioner, Mr. Kernan. He knows that the courts of the country have declared all such combinations unlawful; but Mr. Depew reminds gentlemen of the New York State commission that this is a matter of interstate commerce, which they as railroad commissioners of the State of New York can not reach, while at the same time he opposes all that is attempted to be done in Congress to give relief to the people.

This is a pool of forty railroads. We see here a column loaded with the complaints of men who are suffering from it, but we have not heard from the people of the other States to whom the goods sold by these merchants ought to have gone. How many of them are broken, how many are crippled, how many are injured by the action of the pool? We have not heard that. Yet in the face of the illegality of a combination admitted to be illegal because so decided by all the courts, the idea of the leading railroad men of the country is to establish a grand universal pool embracing all the railroads of the country.

Mr. President, the railroad problem has evolved an issue between two opposing ideas, and will be solved on one or the other of them. The railroad corporations must be governed by laws passed by Congress, or they will be governed by a despotism created by themselves and over themselves in a universal pool or federation which will embrace all the railroad lines in this country. Congress is brought face to face with this dilemma and must accept one horn or the other of it. Delays are dangerous, because the "grand federation" is already in process of formation under able and skillful operators, its nucleus in the city of New York where more than forty of the leading lines are already confederated or pooled under a central government strong enough already to bring the merchant princes of that great city to its feet. When the single corporation of Erie could dominate the State of New York in the manner so graphically described by Mr. Adams; when the merchants and business men of New York are already suppliants at the feet of the pool now existing there, how can any limit be placed on the power of a great federation of all the railroad corporations of the country backed by unlimited wealth, with the best talent of the country in its service, and an active, vigilant, intelligent, and well-paid army of employés at command, with power to crush all who oppose its schemes by discriminating against them and to reward its friends, with power to build up or destroy at pleasure cities and towns, and to levy such tribute as avarice may suggest, unobstructed and unhindered, upon the great commerce carried over the roads, with all the influences and agencies so vigorously described by Mr. Adams for corrupting legislatures and congresses and governments—I repeat, how is it possible to resist such an organization in possession of such tremendous power? It simply can not be done, and if perfected the railroad federation will dominate and control this Government, will corrupt and undermine it.

This Government must govern and control the railroad corporations or will be governed and controlled by them. We have at this time our choice between these propositions. If we fail to choose between them now, we may not at a future time be able to choose at all. If we adopt the Reagan bill, its moral effect will be very great on the railroad corporations. Mr. Adams says that only "force" will control them. He sees nothing but the despotism of a Cæsar or Napoleon of their own creation. I desire the "force" of law constitutionally enacted and vigorously executed by the Government of the United States, representing the majesty and the sovereignty of the American people. The Reagan bill will give this. If we pass it, these corporations will realize that we are in earnest, that the people are aroused, and will govern themselves accordingly.

The moral effect upon the country of the passage of the Reagan bill will be good, because it will be universally felt to be not only a just vindication of the dignity of the Government, but a grand measure of protection for the best interests of the people. The English railway commission bill has been alluded to in this debate and its admirable operations made an argument in favor of the Senate bill. The harmless and impotent measure proposed in the Senate bill is utterly unlike the English railway law in every respect. There is no point of resemblance between them.

The English commission possesses all the powers and attributes of a court. It is composed of three commissioners. That commission has jurisdiction over every question affecting railroad transportation That court can summon witnesses. It can fine for contempt; it can issue injunctions; it can issue executions; it can do everything that any other court can do. That is the English commission. It is no such powerless thing as is provided for in the Senate bill.

And besides, the English railroad regulations act, as it is called, formulates the law to be administered by this commission. I read one extract from it, which alone contains the substance of the Reagan bill:

That all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate, whether per ton, per mile, or otherwise, in respect of all passengers and of all goods or carriages of the same description, and conveyed or propelled by a like carriage or engine passing only over the same portion of the line of railway under the same circumstances.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I read from the speech of Mr. Charles Francis Adams, delivered before the Committee on Commerce of the other House. He said:

So far as the railroad system and the railroad business of the country is concerned, I propose to argue to this committee, and endeavor to convince it, that hitherto in the case of the vast body of legislation enacted in respect to them no attempt whatever has been made to study anything except outward manifestations; that almost uniformly the symptoms have been mistaken for the disease and the remedies intended to remove the evil have consequently only tended to aggravate it. That I may have any chance of success in this effort, I must ask you to dismiss all preconceptions from your minds and to fairly consider what is the real cause—what is the real cause of the inequalities, the injustices, the discriminations of the existing railroad service—those ills of the body-politic for which you are now undertaking to prescribe? I will not stop to dwell upon them or to denounce them. It is not necessary to do so, for I hold them to be proven and their existence notorious. The record is full of evidence on the subject. We all know—every one knows—that discriminations in railroad treatment and charges do exist between individuals and between places. We all know that railroad tariffs fluctuate wildly, not only in different years but in different seasons of the same year. We know that certain large business firms—the leviathans of modern trade—can and do dictate their own terms between rival corporations, while the small concern must accept the best terms it can get. It is beyond dispute that business is carried hither and thither—to this point, away from that point, and through the other point—not because it would naturally go to, away from, or through those points, but because rates are made on an artificial basis and to serve ulterior ends.

Now, mark you—

In regard to these things I consider the existing system nearly as bad as any system can be. Studying its operations, as I have, long and patiently, I am ready to repeat now what I have repeatedly said before, that the most surprising thing about it to me is that the business community sustains itself under such conditions. The first principles—

Mark this—

The first principles of law governing common carriers are habitually violated. Special contracts, covering long periods of time, are made every day with heavy shippers, under which the common carrier, whose first duty it is to serve all equally—

As the Reagan bill requires them to do—

gives to certain parties a practical control of the markets. There is thus neither equality nor system, law nor equity, in the matter of railroad charges. A complete change in this respect is a condition precedent to any just and equitable system of railroad transportation.

That is what Mr. Charles Francis Adams felt constrained to admit when arguing before the House committee against Congressional legislation. Yet it is said that there is no ground for complaint. When twelve States in the Union have embodied in their constitutions the substance of the Reagan bill; when political conventions, boards of trade and exchange, when the leading railroad man of this country, Mr. Adams, all tell you about these grievances, they are dismissed with the remark that it is popular clamor. Mr. President, it is not popular clamor. I have shown you that in the great State of New York, the leading State in this Union, with all her wealth and power, her authorities have suppressed a little combination, a little pool of ten or twelve hard-handed canal-boatmen as being contrary to law, and that at the time the judge was delivering his opinion, in the heart of the city of New York there was a pool government, pool headquarters, with hundreds of clerks, and an emperor at the head of the pool presiding over the whole, and that the great merchants of the grand and magnificent commercial center of our country were bending their knees before that power. I have shown this, and yet I am told that it is not time for the law to step in and put its hand upon these corporations and say what they shall do and what they shall not do.

Mr. President, in submitting to the lawlessness and power of these corporations we are sowing the seeds which will be reaped in a harvest of communism at some future day. When poor men see that the law takes them promptly by the throat while these powerful combinations of corporate wealth defy the law with impunity, they will think that their own rights ought to be asserted in some form or other. We can avoid this by harkening to the voice of the House of Representatives and giving support to the bill they have sent us. It is a moderate bill. It is a conservative bill. It employs methods well known and well established in the common law. There is nothing harsh about it. It is an assertion of the power of the people and the Government that I desire to see. The moral effect of it would be worth more than Congress could do in any other way. Let the people of this country be informed that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States have determined that this is a people's government, and that no power shall live under it which is not dominated by the Government and by the people, and this the Reagan bill will do.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 288) authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE EVINS.

The message also communicated to the Senate the resolutions of the House on the announcement of the death of Hon. JOHN H. EVINS, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I ask that the action of the House be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). The Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 20, 1885.

Resolved, That this House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOHN H. EVINS, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that fitting tribute may be paid to his memory.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect the House shall, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina presents resolutions which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOHN H. EVINS, late a member of the House of Representatives from South Carolina.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid to his memory.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect the Senate shall, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, adjourn.

Mr. HAMPTON. It has been established by long custom that when one of our associates in the legislative branch of the Government falls at his post of duty we pause for a time from our daily routine of work to pay a proper tribute of respect to his memory. This time-honored custom, which had its origin in the tenderest and noblest instincts of humanity, has been consecrated to us by many and sad precedents. The Senate has just done becoming honor to the memory of one who was, when living, its oldest member, one of its most honored and now one of its most lamented. To-day, the other branch of Congress, by the resolutions just read, tells us that death has again invaded its halls, and stricken down one of its most useful, honored, and beloved members, JOHN H. EVINS, of South Carolina.

As a Senator from the State which now mourns the loss of one of her truest and most devoted sons, it becomes my painful duty to take official action here touching his death. As he was a very close and dear friend, this duty is rendered doubly painful; but, sir, that pain is greatly alleviated by the fact that the best, the highest eulogy that could be pronounced upon him is to speak of him not in the mere conventional terms of panegyric, but in the calm and sober language of truth. The record of his upright and unblemished life, from his youth to its close, gives the strongest evidence of the integrity of his character, and the manner of his death proved the sincerity of his faith as a Christian.

JOHN HAMILTON EVINS was born in Spartanburg District on the 18th July, 1830, of honorable and pious parents, who, besides affording him ample means for a liberal education, taught him early, a lesson he never forgot, that higher and better knowledge, the fear of the Lord. Graduating at the South Carolina College in 1853, he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1856, and soon achieved a high and honorable reputation in his profession. During the war he served in the confederate army with conspicuous gallantry, receiving a severe wound, from the effects of which he never entirely recovered. While detained at home by this wound he represented his district for two sessions in the Legislature with the conscientious fidelity that marked his discharge of every public trust.

In 1876 he was elected a member of Congress from the fourth Congressional district in South Carolina, and he was re-elected for three successive terms, on each occasion by a large majority. At the last election he declined to become a candidate, as his health had failed, and he realized even then that the shadow of death was over him, for his physicians held out to him no hope of recovery. He bore their verdict dooming him to an early death with the heroic fortitude of a soldier and the sublime resignation of a Christian. His sufferings were great and constant, but he never murmured nor repined, and with everything to make him cling to life he resolutely looked death in the face, feeling a confident hope he had so lived on earth that life eternal would be his in heaven.

On the 20th of October last, without one pang, without one struggle, he was summoned to his final rest, respected, honored, loved, and lamented, not alone by his immediate constituents, but by our whole State.

Such, Mr. President, is the brief, simple narrative of a life unmarked by any strange or great events, but which has left an impress for good on every one associated with it. It is in this aspect that I regard the career of Colonel EVINS as so noteworthy and so exemplary, and it is for this reason that I have dwelt more largely on his marked moral qualities than on his intellectual. But I by no means underrate his attainments and his ability, for these were of a high order. He was an able lawyer, an admirable Representative in Congress, a cultivated gentleman, and a wise counselor. In every position he was called on to fill he brought to its discharge a well-trained, vigorous intellect, and an ever-present sense of duty. Thus it was that his influence was always widely felt and beneficently exercised.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the example left by such a life and the lesson taught by it are of higher value to the world than all the earthly prizes that ambition, wealth, power, place can win. These latter may for a time sway mankind, but in the balance held by the hand of the Great Judge at the last day they will weigh but as a feather against integrity, virtue, and piety. All these noble attributes of character were possessed in an eminent degree by the subject of this imperfect sketch, and he surely could have exclaimed triumphantly and exultingly when called to meet his God—

O death, where is thy sting?
O grave, where is thy victory?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, having been a member of the House of Representatives in the Forty-sixth Congress, and having then an acquaintance pleasant and agreeable with Mr. EVINS, I do not feel at liberty to allow this occasion to pass without paying a brief tribute to his memory.

I recall without difficulty the first time I ever saw him. It was on the Sabbath day in a crowded church. I saw a face loving, gentle, and without any weakness in it; and it so attracted me that I inquired as to its owner, and found it to be Mr. EVINS. Subsequent acquaintance with him only justified to me that face as the index of his character.

Mr. EVINS, of course, was not conspicuous in debate in the Forty-sixth Congress. Senators know well that in that brief term of service, even with the highest genius for debate, he could not be. And he was not in any sense a wrangler, and he could not be, for his spirit was never disputatious. He did not force himself to the front, and he could not, because he was as modest as a girl. And yet, sir, he had that strength of character and that acquirement which would have made him conspicuous and prominent in public life or anywhere in time. He had thorough culture, undaunted courage, earnest devotion to principle and duty, quick perception, and a profound sense of responsibility to God and man. He added to an attractive face accomplishments and graces unusual to men in active, stirring life—agreeable manners and a warm social nature. But, sir, he had what seems to me greater and better than them all—he was a devoted, sincere, earnest Christian man. I see from the records of the Spartanburg Presbyterian church, in his own State, this:

On the 4th July, 1867, his membership was transferred to this church, and on the 28th of the same month he was ordained to the deaconship. He continued to serve in this office until promoted by the unanimous voice of the congregation to the eldership, to which he was ordained November 13, 1870. He was also superintendent of the Sabbath school from 1868 until he entered Congress in 1877.

Mr. President, it is easy for men in public life, I care not how eminent they may be, to gracefully acquiesce in the fundamental doctrines of the Bible and to talk eloquently of the glories of a blessed immortality to come; but to lead in the midst of the cares and perplexities and enticements and allurements and distractions of public life a lowly, devoted, practical Christian life,

Hoc opus, hic labor est.

Yet, Mr. President, I have reason to believe that from the day Mr. EVINS entered upon his public life here in Congress up to its close he did so walk day by day. He deliberately chose the straight and narrow way and walked directly toward the goal without swerving to the right or to the left. I believe, sir, that Mr. EVINS dying could say with Paul in chains at Rome, "I have fought the fight; I have kept the faith." I believe, sir, that Mr. EVINS dying could say, "I know there is a crown prepared for me." And now he knows it; he wears it.

Mr. President, may the gracious, loving God temper this heavy but kindly blow to his wife and to his children.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I might safely leave the character of the lamented EVINS where his eulogist and his own unblemished life left it, without stain and without reproach, but a duty of earnest friendship apart from official courtesy and custom requires that I add my contribution, imperfect as it is, to the words of praise so generously and justly bestowed upon him.

South Carolina never had a more devoted son than JOHN H. EVINS, nor popular government a more faithful advocate. The people never had a champion more honest, more courageous, nor this Congress a member more respected for his public and private worth. I knew him intimately for more than a quarter of a century from his early manhood—and there was not much difference in our years—as a friend, citizen, lawyer, soldier, representative of the people; in every relation of life, and can therefore speak advisedly and accurately of him. It was our fortune to be born in the same region of country, the Piedmont belt of South Carolina. The first horizon that greeted our visions was fringed by the same range of mountains, as lovely and picturesque as ever graced the outlines of nature.

He preceded me in the same college but a few years. We entered the confederate armies almost simultaneously, although in different arms of that service. It was our fortune to come upon the arena of national politics about the same time, and here to cultivate relations of the closest personal and political friendship. I knew him, therefore, as few men knew him, and venture to affirm that in the eloquent tributes just paid to his memory in this Chamber and in the other Hall of Congress which he adorned so long and ably, there is not one word of hyperbole or extravagant encomium. He well deserves all that has been so gracefully said of him, and I only wish that in closing these mournful ceremonies of respect to his memory in this the highest forum which an American citizen may enter, I could command language worthy of his exalted character.

I do not know that I need say more of his public life than that he was faithful to every public trust committed to his care. He held the conscientious discharge of every public duty above personal or private considerations. In his public conduct he was honest, he was direct, he was courageous and truthful, he was always true to his constituents, and above all true to himself. There was nothing of the charlatan or demagogue in his nature. He was modest, conservative, considerate, and deferential. He was careful and painstaking, and when he made up his opinion he maintained it with independence, courage, and ability. His judgment was sound, and his intellectual methods were as honest and straightforward as the impulses of his heart were generous. He was well educated and well informed, but did not aspire to the plane of what is known as scholarship or genius. He did not sacrifice the practical to the ideal, nor the real to the theoretical, the substance to the form, and, therefore, was a safe counselor and judicious leader, an able, conscientious representative.

What higher praise, Mr. President, can be conferred upon any public man. What more need be said to embalm his memory in the grateful hearts of his countrymen and establish him as an exemplar to those who come after him. This is my estimate of the man, sincerely entertained. True, something must be allowed to the partialities of friendship on occasions like this, to the license of rhetoric, to the flow of eulogy, and to that inclination of the human heart to speak nothing of the dead except what is good, but, sir, I invoke with confidence the voice of his people to sanction these words in behalf of this distinguished citizen of their State. They are truthful and just; would they could be said of every public servant who assumes a trust for the people. Mr. EVINS was as free from the sordid vices of our nature as the best of his race. He was wonderfully circumspect in his private life, and I believe sincerely and conscientiously true to his profession of the Christian religion. He made no sanctimonious parade, but walked modestly in the fear of God and lived up to his convictions. The duties of life were dearer to him than life itself.

When he was first stricken with the disease that proved fatal to his life, I well remember how earnestly I urged him to leave the capricious winter climate of Washington and seek relief in the mild outdoor atmosphere of Florida, where he could successfully combat the inroads of disease on his vigorous constitution by calling to his assistance not only the curative powers of art and science but the endless resources of kindly nature. In response to my importunities he said his duty required him to remain at his post, and he did and died. Possibly the time allotted him on earth was about to expire, and the change may not have arrested his malady. Of this no one had knowledge, save the God who made him. But I refer to this incident to further illustrate what manner of man he was. It was characteristic of him, and the recital will not surprise those who knew him best.

Military heroes who give up their lives in the flush and excitement and glamour of battle are sustained in the discharge of duty by the rush and conflict of physical forces, the hope of earthly glory and renown, and they are generally bestowed; but the man who stands by his post in the civil walks of life, dying inches by inches, has nothing to sustain him but that high sense of duty, the essence of which true heroes are made. To this class Mr. EVINS properly belonged, and such will be the verdict of his countrymen.

Nothing now remains for me, Mr. President, but to move the adoption of the resolutions before the Senate, which I do with the mournful satisfaction that they have given me the opportunity to pay this sincere but inadequate tribute to the memory of one of the best of men, and that they express, as I believe, the sentiments of his associates and friends.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the resolutions?

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously; and (at 4 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

ACCOUNTS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE STATES.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR asked and obtained unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the following:

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to procure the passage of a law to adjust certain accounts between the United States and the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, as set forth in House bill 110, and dated December 10, 1883.

Whereas on December 10, 1883, Hon. BARCLAY HENLEY, of California, introduced in the House House bill 110, which was referred to the House Committee on Claims; and on December 18, 1883, Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, of California, introduced in the Senate Senate bill 795, which was referred to the Senate Committee on Finance, as follows, to wit:

"A bill to adjust certain accounts between the United States and Territories, and the District of Columbia.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit each of the several States and Territories, and the District of Columbia, with the amounts of money heretofore laid upon and apportioned to said States, Territories, and District of Columbia, respectively, levied as a direct tax under the provisions of the eighth section of the act of Congress, approved August 5, 1861, entitled 'An act to provide increased revenue from imports to pay interest on the public debt, and other purposes;' and he shall thereafter state an account between the United States, and each of said States, Territories, and District, respectively, and he shall pay to each thereof, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums of money as may appear to the credit of each thereof upon the books of the Treasury arising from such settlement."

The foregoing bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall credit each State with the amount of money assessed against it for direct taxes under the act of August 5, 1861.

The effect of the passage by Congress of said bill will be to refund to those States which have paid the amounts of such assessments to the extent of the sums by them so paid, and to release those States which have not paid from hereafter paying all said taxes, and also from all future liability to pay the same. While the right of the General Government to raise revenue by direct taxation is unquestioned, it is patent that this direct tax was in the nature of an enforced loan; and it was made in this form only because it was required to meet the great exigency then upon the country; and

Whereas several of the States now owe the General Government from a quarter to a half million dollars each, on account of this direct tax, while others have paid their full quota: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the general Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to urge the passage of the bill hereinbefore referred to, and use their best endeavors to secure to the State the amount paid to the United States by this forced tax.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of the Senators and Representatives by the governor of Ohio.

A. D. MARSH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN G. WARWICK,
President of the Senate.

Adopted January 14, 1885.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, OHIO,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, James S. Robinson, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the House joint resolution No. 66, adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, on the 14th day of January, A. D. 1885, taken from the original rolls filed in this office.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, the 15th day of January, A. D. 1885.

J. S. ROBINSON, Secretary of State.

SERGT. ERNEST BECHNER.

Mr. ROSECRANS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files without leaving copies the papers in the case of Sergt. Ernest Bechner, Eighth United States Infantry, as the case is covered by the general law.

LABOR IN EUROPE.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred Senate concurrent resolution to print additional copies of the letter of Secretary of State, dated December 12, 1884, and the accompanying consular reports on "Labor in Europe," has been duly considered by the committee and a concurrence in the same recommended.

The letter and reports referred to contain a mass of information valuable to Congress in legislating upon matters wherein our own citizens are directly affected by the condition of labor abroad, and of general use in the investigation of important economic questions.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 14, 1885.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the letter of the Secretary of State dated December 12, 1884, and the accompanying reports of United States consuls, on Labor in Europe, be printed; and that 1,500 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate, 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; and for the use of the Department of State 4,000 copies, and 10,000 additional copies of the Secretary's letter, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the House of Representatives, and 6,000 for the use of the Department of State.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF HEALTH OFFICER, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, from the Committee on Printing, also reported back with favorable recommendation joint resolution (H. Res. 288) authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOLMAN. What publication is that?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have the report read, Mr. Speaker.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committtee on Printing, to whom was referred House resolution 288, authorizing the printing of 500 additional copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia, have duly considered the same and recommend its passage.

These additional copies are intended to supply a general demand, and for the purpose of foreign exchange. The type is already up, having been used in printing the District commissioners' report; which reduces the cost to about $1,000.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the joint resolution, there were—ayes 49, noes 17.

Mr. COBB. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ROGERS, of New York, and Mr. COBB were appointed.

Mr. KING. This resolution I believe provides only for the printing of the health report of this District.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been read.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 59.

Mr. COBB. I will not insist on a further count.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DIBRELL, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill (H. R. 8030) making appropriation for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MILLS. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas reserves all points of order.

Mr. DIBRELL. I give notice that I shall ask the House to consider this bill on next Saturday.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 1017) relative to the Inspector-General's Department of the Army; and

A bill (H. R. 7768) to authorize the National Bank of Bloomington, Ill., to change its name to the First National Bank of Bloomington.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 1565) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1417) to enable Martrom D. Lewis, public administrator, of the city of Saint Louis, in the county of Saint Louis and State of Missouri, having charge of the estate of Gabriel Neudecker, deceased, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of letters patent No. 70012, for a process of preparing tobacco, granted October 22, 1867, to said Gabriel Neudecker, deceased;

A bill (S. 2004) for the relief of W. H. Tibbits;

A bill (S. 2529) for the relief of James M. Lobban;

A bill (S. 2543) for the relief of the heirs of Charles B. Smith, deceased, late a lieutenant in the Fifth Iowa Cavalry; and Joint resolution (S. R. 104) providing for the printing and distribution of the Descriptive Catalogue of Government Publications.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 92, noes 14 (two-thirds voting in the affirmative).

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all general debate in Committee of the Whole be limited to one minute.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope the gentleman will allow us ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. There is a proposition pending in this appropriation bill which from practical experience I know ought not to become a law. We shall not be able to discuss this matter satisfactorily under the five-minute rule, and I do trust we shall have some limited time for the discussion before the commencement of the five-minute debate. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana, who I understand is acting under the direction of the Committee on Appropriations, that some little consultation be had, and that the general debate be extended for a short time.

Mr. ELLIS. Yesterday we had two hours' discussion, of which I think about an hour and a half was dehors the bill—upon matters that did not properly enter into the consideration of the bill. I believe that as a general thing any gentleman will be able to say intelligibly anything he may wish to say upon any clause of this bill in five minutes. I must object, therefore, to any further general debate.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana by striking out "one minute" and inserting "forty minutes."

Mr. CHACE. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to the fact that nearly all the time occupied yesterday in debate upon this bill was on the other side—by gentlemen who advocate the provisions of the bill as reported. Several gentlemen on this side desire to speak on the general merits of the question, and they can not express themselves as they desire in the five-minute debate.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not recognize any "other side" on this bill. It is a bill in which gentlemen on both sides are interested. There is no "other side" of the question.

Mr. CHACE. I did not allude to it as a political question; but I believe the gentleman will find that there is another side, and a very wrong side, in this bill.

Mr. ELLIS. I have no doubt the gentleman knows his own position.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] moves that all general debate in Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill terminate in one minute. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] moves to amend so as to close debate in forty minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "forty minutes" and inserting "fifteen minutes."

Mr. WASHBURN'S amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the amendment of Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 88, noes 36.

The motion of Mr. ELLIS as amended was then agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ELLIS's motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WELLBORN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7970) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

General debate has been limited by order of the House to forty minutes.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, took the floor.

Mr. ELLIS. I suppose that time, Mr. Chairman, will be equally divided between this and the other side of the House.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I do not know how the time is to be divided.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it will be under the five-minute rule, of course.

Mr. ELLIS. Not at all. It is under the rule for general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any agreement as to the division of the time to which the general debate has been limited by the House?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I will state frankly to the chairman while we are making this arrangement I do not wish it to come out of my time. I am not opposed to the bill, but simply desire to discuss an amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any understanding?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. There is no understanding. I shall vote for the bill myself at the proper time, but I wish to discuss an amendment. Shall I proceed?

Mr. ELLIS. I simply ask there might be an understanding. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], my colleague on the committee, who desires to speak, as well as some other gentlemen, I should like to have some understanding before my friend from Arkansas proceeds, and I therefore ask, by unanimous consent, that the forty minutes be divided, twenty minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Arkansas, and twenty minutes by the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Entirely satisfactory to me.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection that arrangement will be made.

Mr. CHACE. What is it?

The CHAIRMAN. That the gentleman from Arkansas shall control twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] the other twenty minutes. Is there objection to that division of the time?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, my purpose this morning in addressing the committee is to invite attention first to the last section of this bill, and I especially invite the attention of my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] and the Committee on Appropriations to that section of the bill.

Now, section 2139 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides as follows:

SEC. 2139. No ardent spirits shall be introduced, under any pretense, into the Indian country. Every person [except an Indian, in the Indian country] who sells, exchanges, gives, barters, or disposes of any spirituous liquors or wine to any Indian under the charge of any Indian superintendent or agent, or introduces or attempts to introduce any spirituous liquor or wine into the Indian country, shall be punishable by imprisonment for not more than two years, and by a fine of not more than $3,000. But it shall be a sufficient defense to any charge of introducing or attempting to introduce liquor into the Indian country, that the acts charged were done by order of or under authority from the War Department, or any officer duly authorized thereunto by the War Department.

The section of the bill which the Committee on Appropriations proposes to substitute for that section differs from it only, so far as my purpose is concerned this morning, in fixing the minimum of punishment. I say frankly, Mr. Chairman, that my objection to the amendment by the committee is not to the maximum of punishment. It is but little difference to me how high the punishment may be. But, Mr. Chairman, it should be kept in mind that it is not always the severity of punishment which prevents crime, but rather the certainty of its execution.

What I object to, therefore, is the minimum punishment fixed by this bill. As amended, the law reads as follows:

Every person * * * who introduces, or attempts to introduce, &c., * * * liquors, &c., * * * into the Indian country, &c., shall be punishable by imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than two years, and by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $1,000.

Let me illustrate to my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS]—and I speak, Mr. Chairman, on this point from personal knowledge on this subject. As some gentlemen know, the court which enforces in the main the intercourse laws with Indian people in the Indian Territory sits at my town. Of course, I am of necessity made familiar with the execution of the law in that court. It will be remembered one of the provisions of the statutes is that no spirituous liquors or alcohol in any quantity can be introduced into the Indian Territory except by authority of the War Department. To illustrate, let us take the case of a man living across the line in the Indian country, a member of whose family is suffering from pneumonia, from consumption, or from some form of malarial disease common in that country.

It is the universal practice of the most distinguished, honorable, and high-minded members of the medical profession in that country to use spirituous liquors in some form in this class of cases, and yet the man who introduces a pint of alcohol or a gill of liquor to save the life of a member of his family, if detected, must be imprisoned under this amendment for not less than six months and fined $50. Now, what is the sense or wisdom of a provision like this? I say frankly, Mr. Chairman, in justice to the Committee on Appropriations, that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs not only recommends what they have done in this bill, but he urges a severer penalty than that which the Committee on Appropriations have provided in this bill.

On page 7 of his report I find these words:

> After the offender has been arrested, tried, and found guilty, the punishment under the law as it now stands may be, and in many instances is, so light as to be no terror to the evil-doer. When from $100 to $500 have been expended in prosecuting a case to conviction of the offender and then have him fined $1 and imprisoned one day, as has been the case in some instances, it is very obvious that this worst of all evils in the Indian country will not be removed, and is so broad a farce as to be justly ridiculed and despised. The only effectual remedy for this is the one which I have repeatedly recommended, and that is to make the penalty not less than $300 fine, and not less than two years' imprisonment. The law now reads not more than $300, and not more than two years' imprisonment.

Mr. Chairman, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, no doubt a kind-hearted, clever old gentleman, and, as he thinks, a friend to the Indians, is as innocent of any practical knowledge of the operations of these laws in that Indian Territory as ex-Governor St. John was of any complicity in the procurement of the recent order from the Secretary of the Treasury touching the tax on bonded whisky. He knows nothing whatever of the operation of these laws in that Territory, and in his efforts to execute and enforce the law he advises this Congress to do that which, permit me to say, with proper deference for him, is precisely what should not be done. I may be permitted to say also, Mr. Chairman, that the Commissioner pays no compliment whatever to the Federal judiciary when he goes out of his way to say that men who have violated the law have been let off with merely nominal sums, or a fine of $1 and a day's imprisonment, thus indicating that they should have been fined a much larger sum. Ne sutor ultra crepidam. For the information of this committee as well as of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I will say for the judge who presides over the western district of Arkansas that it is the public sentiment of the people of that region of country that at times upon this and kindred subjects he has been most severe in the penalties imposed for this offense where such offenses have been shown to be flagrant. Is it not safe and wise to leave the fixing of the proper penalty in the sound discretion of the presiding judge, who can ascertain all the facts and graduate it to the character of the case?

Let me illustrate the wrong contained in this amendment by other classes of cases which I can cite—and I could cite a dozen instances if necessary. Ours is comparatively a new country. The western part of our State, adjoining the Indian country, is rapidly developing, filling up with people from all parts of the Union. I can not forbear to mention that Arkansas, since 1874, under a thoroughly Democratic State administration, presents this remarkable anomaly. During the last fall and this winter, indeed for three years past, perhaps longer, a large number of negroes from other Southern States have been coming and making their homes with us, becoming permanent citizens of the State.

Whether they have been led to believe that our laws are more humane or more impartially enforced; whether they expect cheaper lands and homes, or better wages, better school facilities, or a more healthful climate, I do not know; but, however that may be, the stubborn fact remains, they come and they stay. These people from abroad never heard of this intercourse law which prohibits a man from carrying into the Indian country a gill or a pint of liquor for his own use. With these classes of people, strangers in the country, not knowing the law, technical violations of this statute must occur, and occur frequently.

Under this provision of the law to which I am now referring a man who is as ignorant of any intended wrong as a child unborn is to be imprisoned six months and fined $50 for such technical violations of the statute as I have just stated. Sir, our common sense can not approve a statute like this. Humanity demands a different course. Can we not trust our judiciary in the exercise of a sound discretion, after we have fixed the maximum punishment, to say what ought to be imposed under all the circumstances? If we can not, the fault is not the law, but it is in our judges, and the suggestion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is a reflection either on their capacity or their integrity.

But I repeat that I could go further and cite many other instances of a similar character where the same trouble would arise. Why, sometimes, sir, merchants, druggists in their ordinary business pursuits, in taking liquor from one part of the State to another travel down the Territorial line; there may be, in point of fact there are, slight deflections in the road which takes them into the Indian Territory; they do not stop, but pass through on their way to their destination, and yet under the provisions of this law, and by the rulings of the courts under the law as it stands, these men are not only to be arrested and prosecuted but their property is to be confiscated and they are subject to fine and imprisonment. If the law stands as it is now the court could fine them a dollar and imprison them a minute, but if this amendment is adopted the minimum is $50 and imprisonment six months.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That would not be the case unless they undertook to dispose of the liquor. It would not be a violation of the law simply to pass through in that manner.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Under the provisions of the law as it is now and as it is in this bill, the introduction is a violation of the law. If a man travels down the line between the Territory and the State, and if, as I have said, a deflection in the road shall take him across that line into the Territory, if he is inside of the Territory for only a hundred or two hundred yards, and if he has a gill of whisky in his wagon, he is subject to the punishment imposed by this law—that is to say, fine and imprisonment.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But not if he keeps the liquor in his wagon.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Yes, sir; and not only that, but the wagon itself is liable to be condemned under the statute. He is himself also subject to indictment and prosecution for a violation of the law and to the penalty fixed by this act. The introduction as well as the selling constitutes an offense, and the intent with which the introduction was had is not a necessary ingredient of the offense. The law allows no introduction for any purpose without authority from the War Department.

Let me put another case much stronger than those I have already given.

Every fall there is a constant stream of emigrants from the State of Missouri to the State of Texas, and from the State of Texas back to the State of Missouri. When traveling the roads at this season of the year one will scarcely get out of sight of covered wagons.

In traveling from Missouri to Texas the road for fifty miles borders closely along the line of the Indian Territory, then goes into the Territory, and on to Texas. Hundreds of these people are totally ignorant of this intercourse law. They and their families traveling through this country under these circumstances often have with them small quantities of liquor for medical purposes. However ignorant they may be of the law, if they introduce one gill of liquor of any description into this Indian country they incur the penalty of this act and subject their property, as I have said, to confiscation.

All will agree that if an emigrant with his family, under the circumstances stated, should introduce a small quantity of liquor for the purposes stated into the Indian country, the act would not constitute the evil which Congress undertook to suppress in the passage of these intercourse laws. Yet, if it be held that such introduction was not a violation of the statute, the gates would be thrown wide open for all sorts of imposition and subterfuge to get liquor into the Indian country. Hence it is that the courts have held, and properly held, that every act of this character is a violation of these intercourse laws.

So that—to sum it all up—for no purpose, except by authority of the War Department, can liquor be carried into this country, not even for sacramental purposes, without incurring the penalties of this statute.

The question then presented is whether or not Congress is willing to enact a law which absolutely requires the Federal judiciary, for the classes of technical cases which I have undertaken to state, to impose upon a citizen six months' imprisonment and a fine of $50. Is it not wiser and better and safer to let the law stand as it is now, without any minimum penalty, leaving the Federal judiciary, in the enforcement of the statute and in the exercise of sound discretion, to graduate the penalty in each case according to the nature and character of case developed on trial? I say it is; and the amendment proposed involves unsafe legislation, and I give notice now at the proper time I shall move to strike out the minimum penalty fixed by the act.

Mr. Chairman, the recommendation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on this subject is in keeping with other provisions of the report which he gives to Congress on this Indian question. Let me read for a moment for the enlightenment of the committee on this subject. He says:

> Outside the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory, who have their own legislatures, courts, and judicial machinery, and among whom life and property are as secure as they are in the States, the Indian is not amenable to any law for injuries committed on one of his own race in the Indian country.

I state, sir, that when the Commissioner of Indian Affairs undertakes to say that "life and property are as secure" in the Indian courts as in the States, he innocently, it may be, perpetrates a slander upon the States. I know that statements of this character have come up to Congress in this shape, and have been repeated again and again until the Indian Commissioner himself perhaps believes the statement to be true. But he ought to know better. Let me give you a sample of the administration of the law in that Indian country.

I select for illustration a case somewhat personally known to me—the case of Jerry Ward; it is a recent case—not four months old. That gentlemen may know that Jerry Ward is a citizen of the Choctaw Nation, I refer to the session acts of the Choctaw council for 1880, which I hold in my hand, showing that a resolution was passed by the Choctaw council, signed by the governor, directing Jerry Ward, as judge of a certain circuit, to do certain things. I shall have the resolution itself printed in my remarks.

[Bill No. 14.]

A resolution requesting Judge Ward to revoke or suspend a certain writ of injunction at Savanna.

Be it resolved by the general council of the Choctaw Nation assembled, That in consideration of the public necessity, Hon. Jeremiah Ward, circuit judge of the first judicial circuit, Choctaw Nation, is hereby requested to revoke or suspend a certain writ of injunction granted by Hon. James Thompson, on the 24th day of August, 1880, then circuit judge of said first judicial circuit, stopping the working of a certain coal claim near Savanna, Tobacksy County, Choctaw Nation, which was being operated by the Choctaw Coal and Mining Company under contract with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations.

Be it further resolved, That the national secretary is hereby requested to furnish Judge Ward with a certified copy of this resolution as early as practicable, and this resolution shall take effect from and after its passage.

BENJAMIN WESLEY,
Chairman Committee on Judiciary.

Approved November 1, 1880.

J. F. McCURTAIN, P. C., C. N.

Now, it so happens that I know Jerry Ward personally. He is a man, I think, not less than 60 years of age. I believe since 1867 at intervals he has been elected as circuit judge, holding his office under the constitution and laws of the Choctaw people. At the last election in that country Jerry Ward was again elected circuit judge; and when the Choctaw council met, without notice to him, who held his commission as one of the circuit judges, they passed a resolution declaring he was not a citizen in that Indian country; and upon that the governor issued an order demanding the surrender of his commission and turned him out of his official position.

And this, according to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is that due process of law, that protection to property, which obtains in the States. I assert it is a fair sample of Indian justice in that country. Jerry Ward did not belong to the "Tubbe" or the administration party. He was not a willing tool. He did not answer the purpose. And this old man, more than once honored by his people with high judicial office, educated and intelligent as he is, is to-day, in law, if this is law, an exile.

Jerry Ward never lived anywhere else in his life but among the Choctaws and for years and years in the Indian country, and yet this is the treatment he receives, not at the hands of a subordinate court, but at the hands of the legislative council of the Choctaw Nation, indorsed and carried into effect by the governor of that Territory. I have seen a copy of the resolution, and the original letter of the governor demanding the surrender of his commission, based on that resolution.

I will give another case, by way of illustration. I take the case of Judge Cribbs, of the Choctaw Nation. I will read the forty-third article of the treaty of 1866. It is as follows:

The United States promise and agree, that no white person except officers, agents and employés of the Government, and of any internal improvement company, or persons traveling through or temporarily sojourning in said nations or either of them shall be permitted to go into said Territory unless formally incorporated and naturalized by the joint action of the authorities of both nations into one of the said nations of Choctaws and Chickasaws, according to their laws, customs, or usages; but this article is not to be construed to affect parties heretofore adopted, or to prevent the employment temporarily of white persons who are teachers, mechanics, or skilled in agriculture, or to prevent the legislative authorities of the respective nations from authorizing such works of internal improvement, as they may deem essential to the welfare and prosperity of the community, or to be taken to interfere with or invalidate any action which has heretofore been had in this connection by either of the said nations.

What was the object of this provision of the treaty? Why, Mr. Chairman, it was to teach these people the arts of civilization by actual example; it was to bring into their midst teachers, mechanics, persons skilled in agriculture, honorable and worthy laborers, who would teach them not only letters but how to work, how to open their farms, how to till the soil, how to produce corn and meat, how to become self-reliant and self-sustaining. In short, the object was to promote Indian civilization, letting education go hand in hand with labor; and yet the Choctaw council, in pursuance of what it perhaps conceived to be the correct construction of the provisions of this treaty, but in point of fact in direct contravention of its spirit, as well as of the policy of the Government touching the civilization of these Indians, by an act approved November 2, 1882, imposed a tax of $16.50 upon every lawyer, doctor, carpenter, wagon-maker, blacksmith, wheelwright, millwright, tailor, shoemaker, miller, machinist, sawyer, tanner, clerk, teamster, or any other artisan or non-citizen, and further provided that any person who shall employ any non-citizen in any other manner than is provided for by this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $100.

Thus we find that the action of the council itself nullifies this provision of the treaty; thus we find that the council of this nation brings to bear the whole power of its national administration to impede the development of that country in those very directions which it was the policy of the Government to promote.

Judge Cribbs, whom I have mentioned, is a citizen of the Choctaw Nation. He was indicted under this act of the Choctaw council for the employment of a laborer without first having obtained the permit provided by law. He was fined. He undertook to appeal his case to the supreme court of that Territory, to secure its reversal. He took the necessary steps in their crude practice to secure that appeal. It was granted by the supreme court of that Territory. Afterward, for some cause and without any trial, the appeal was dismissed and Cribbs subjected to the punishment, under the conviction of the lower court.

He sent all these papers to me, and requested that I lay them before the Secretary of the Interior for his revision. I did so, urging my views before the Secretary touching the provisions of this treaty; but I found that a different interpretation had been placed upon it, not only by the Secretary of the Interior, but by a committee of the Senate of the United States, and, of course, no relief could be had, the constitutionality of this act being upheld by the Department of the Interior.

And now I have come to the point which I desired to make in citing this case, and I speak from a personal knowledge of the facts.

When the Choctaw authorities ascertained that Cribbs had called the attention of the Interior Department to his case, and asked its reversal, the chief-justice of that Territory, without notice and without trial, issued an order over his own signature canceling the license of Cribbs and prohibiting him from practicing in the Indian courts; and for the simple reason, as stated in substance, that he had undertaken by his appeal to the Interior Department to overturn the laws of his own people.

I suppose that the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs would regard this as due process of law in any of the States of this Union, but it has been held everywhere in all the States, so far as I know, that no member of the profession can be disbarred without notice and a trial upon specific charges duly preferred.

Let us look for a moment at the operation of this decision. In that Indian country society can be well divided into two great classes. The one which is in power is the one that desires no progress and no development in that nation. The one to which Cribbs belongs is that class of its citizens who are progressive, who seek to make a living on their farms and by their labor. It is this class that deserves well, not only of the Indian government but of the Government of the United States. It is this class which has done more and will do more in the future to civilize and elevate the Indian than all the funds which we have appropriated; and yet we find that this class is the one at which the Choctaw council, by virtue of this act, aimed a deadly blow.

Why, sir, there are Indian citizens in that Indian country who, under the operations of this act, in order to till their farms would be compelled to pay more taxes than, perhaps, the wealthiest citizens of the country in which I live. It will be remembered that there is no necessity for a tax upon its own citizens in the Indian country. Their resources are ample for an economical administration of the law and the maintenance of their schools; while in my own State the highest rate of taxation obtains permitted under the constitution; struggling to meet the obligations of an undisputed State debt and to maintain our common-school system, we go to the very limit of the law. Yet this class of citizens in that Indian country who are doing so much to advance and promote its civilization, where no taxes are required, are taxed under this law, as I have said, more oppressively than the people in the States.

Let me give you another example, Mr. Chairman. All along the line of this Indian country, between it and my State, are large and prosperous farmers—I mean on the State side—men who are pursuing agriculture, who have their horses and their cattle and their little property of that description; and yet, sir, if a cow or a horse turned out on the range crosses the line into the Indian country and the Indians shoot one, hamstring another, mutilate another, or commit any similar injury upon it, there is no authority under the heavens to do anything by way of redress or punish the party who commits this act. Every now and then at my own home honorable and worthy citizens come to me and say that Congress ought to pass some law for the protection of their property that accidentally finds its way across the line into the Indian country.

In other words, we are there without criminal or civil jurisdiction for acts like these. It so happens that even if a rascally debtor in the State desires to avoid his debts he simply picks up his property, crosses the line into the Indian country beyond the civil jurisdiction of any court, and there he is as safe as if he were on the opposite side of the Atlantic Ocean. Yet we stand here to-day, Mr. Chairman, with the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs telling us that in that country life and property is as secure as it is in the States.

Mr. Chairman, I have one other suggestion to make in connection with this bill. I know that the habit of discussing great questions of public policy upon the consideration of an appropriation bill is perhaps more honored in the breach than in the observance. But there is one idea that I desire to throw out now. At some future time, and on some more fit occasion, I shall endeavor to show that the operation of the whole Indian policy in connection with that Indian country is to defeat the very object for which the Government itself has inaugurated that policy.

Sir, as long as these delegates that represent those tribes are permitted to walk around the lobbies of this Capitol, drawing large salaries from these Indians and misappropriating their funds, as I believe one committee of the House has now undertaken to show, just so long they are interested in keeping back the civilization and the progress of the Indian country; and just so long as the Indian agent sent into that country by this Government is permitted to stay there and draw his salary, just so long is he interested in perpetuation of that state of affairs which it is our duty to prevent; for it is our duty, our moral duty, to lift these people up, if we can, to a higher civilization.

Mr. Chairman, our whole Indian policy has degenerated into a single proposition, namely, to appropriate the people's money to feed, educate, and clothe them, while they eke out a life of laziness and indolence. I do not allude now to the Indian Territory so much, but more particularly to the other tribes of Indians in other parts of the country. Sir, there is a philosophical truth underlying this question of dealing with our Indian population which I want to enforce to-day upon the attention of this body. That truth is that no people on earth were ever civilized by simply educating them. Sir, the very soul of civilization is rooted deep down in labor. Education and labor must go hand in hand in order to produce good results. I will give you this idea in a form that I could not give it myself, and in the words of a distinguished Christian and philanthropist who has published a book upon the question of the education of the negroes at the South. It applies with equal force to the Indian. It deserves our candid consideration and earnest thought. The author says:

Doing things for and giving things to people does not lift them up, if the doing and the giving do not spring a new hope, a new aspiration, a new purpose in them, or in some way vivify into fruitful life some dormant good already in their souls. The test of our usefulness to others is to be found in their character. Do we make them wiser, stronger, braver, truer? Then we have lifted them up by helping them to grow out of their weakness and evil into their strength and goodness. Why is it better to give a poor man a day's work than a day's rations without work? The one gift lifts him up, the other pauperizes him. In all our plans and efforts to lift up the negro, let us remember that our best help to him is whatever most effectually enables him to help himself.

Sir, this race must be taught to lay aside the hunting-rifle and take up the hoe and the chopping-ax. The Indian will never learn this lesson in schools and colleges. If the few we educate did learn it, when they return to their own people they must go back to their habits and customs, advocate the measures that are popular among the dominant element, right or wrong; doff the spike-tail coat and stove-pipe hat, and don the hunting-shirt and the navy-six, or they are practically ostracized by their own people. To teach these people to work it must be made honorable among them. The way to make it honorable is to bring them in contact with whites who do work, who desire to improve their condition, who want churches, schools, farms, and homes, and laws that are respected because humanely enforced.

There is a solution of this Indian problem in the Indian Territory. We are upholding these rotten governments there under the pretense of civilizing the Indians. We justify our conduct by clinging to treaties that have served their purpose, and were never intended as anything but temporary expedients. We expected the time would come when the logic of events would enforce a different condition for them. We knew by past history that in the march of civilization these Indian governments must give way.

They are giving way year by year. Everybody seems to realize this except the Indian delegates, the Indian agents, and perhaps the Indian Office. Why, sir, we are treated in this last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to a recitation of what the Cherokee delegates have done touching certain acts of this Congress granting charters to railroads through that country, and reminding us that this legislation overturns the theory of that office touching the construction of the treaties with the Indians. He does not seem to have learned yet that Congress, several years since, settled, after mature debate, that the right of eminent domain obtained there, notwithstanding the Indian treaties; that the Government, being sovereign, could not cede that right if it would.

He does not seem to realize that Congress years ago, overriding the treaties, extended the internal-revenue laws over that country, and the courts upheld the act of Congress. I grow impatient under this Bourbon-Indian policy of ours, sir; the better, the intelligent, and progressive Indians are tired of it. I have talked with many of them; I know their sentiments—sentiments they dare not express among their own people.

They understand that the time will soon come when their numbers will so multiply, by intermarriage with whites and by natural increase, that their distributive shares of their land will amount to but little. They therefore begin to want homes of their own; moved by natural instincts they want to provide for themselves and their offspring.

Sir, I believe the Indian people would consent, if a fair expression could be had, to an equal division of their lands among them and to the establishment of a Territorial government. They do not, as I believe, approve of the suggestion of setting apart to each Indian a limited amount of land and turning the balance over to the Government for sale and investment of the proceeds for them. They, as I believe, prefer to control their own lands; they prefer an equal division of it all, and Congress can by proper legislation make their lands inalienable as long as it chooses. They may prevent its being encumbered. Then they may lease it to those who will cultivate it, and the very contact with the better laboring element of the whites will do more to promote their civilization than all the surplus in the Treasury can do.

Going hand in hand with this is citizenship, courts, and laws. It is coming to this. We know it. They know it. It is their interest to accept the situation. It is our duty to protect them by humane laws. Sir, it is the favorite theme of sentimentalists that we must hold sacred the treaties; that good morals demand it. Sir, good morals demand, wise statemanship dictates, and sound public policy requires that we should establish a humane and an honest government in that country, that life and property should be made safe, that peace and order should be maintained. Sir, I would do these people no injustice; I would lift them up by the adoption of a wiser, a more humane, a more honest policy to a higher plane of Christian civilization. Sooner or later it will be done, and the sooner the better for them and for us.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in charge of this bill perhaps correctly characterized this morning the discussion that went on here yesterday. If he be right in saying that the greater part of that discussion was not confined to the bill, that may still be an excuse for the few remarks that I shall submit. There is no time here, it seems, for anybody to say a word in behalf of these tribes of people who have no voice in the Congress of the United States and yet are being continually legislated about and to their great injury.

Allow me to say, partially in answer to the argument made by the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas], that I think the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs understands all about the operation of the laws against selling to the Indians intoxicating liquors, and it may be time enough to talk about mitigating the penalties in such cases when we find gentlemen coming here and praying us to grant relief to them because they are engaged only in the missionary or philanthropic work of prescribing intoxicants to sick Indians!

The argument which the gentleman makes is on the theory that these people who were engaged in selling liquor to the Indians are so engaged merely for the purpose of relieving the Indians when sick. Now, when we meet a case of that kind we might appeal at least to executive clemency. But the law is directed against those who want to speculate by selling liquor to the Indians, and thus causing nearly all the trouble that we have in that Indian country.

But my principal purpose at present is to say something on a subject that was referred to in the discussion on yesterday.

Some of the speeches made by distinguished gentlemen here have been in effect an excuse for men going into the Indian Territory and settling upon the Indian lands, and their defiance of the powers of the Government. I mean exactly what I say; for an examination of the treaties with these Indians will show that there is no color of right on the part for any of these people, whether they be from Kansas or Arkansas, or wherever they may be from, going into the Indian Territory and undertaking to occupy it. There is not a shadow of right of that kind, and I want to protest, Mr. Chairman, against anything being said in the Congress of the United States to excuse those people for going into the Indian Territory to rob these poor Indians of their lands. I want also to say a word in justification of the War Department exercising a power expressly given to it, a power not only given to it under the Constitution and the laws, but expressly authorized by treaties to be exercised in protecting the Indians in their rights to their lands.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Have not the Indians, so far as the Oklahoma territory is concerned, sold it to the Government of the United States and received their money?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I answer no. Now let me answer the question more fully. I read from the treaty of June 14, 1866. That treaty was made with these Indians after the war, after many of the Indians had gone off with the so-called confederate government and when it was desired to have a treaty that would provide in terms that slavery or involuntary servitude should not exist within the territorial limits occupied by these Indian tribes. Other things, too, were taken into account. The United States with its grasping power sought there, under the claim that it desired to settle other tribes of Indians upon a portion of the territory of the Creeks—not only other tribes of Indians, but also freedmen who had gone off into that territory—upon part of those lands, and for that purpose a stipulation was put into this treaty. I will read it, or at least enough of it to be a perfect answer to the question of the gentleman from Kansas. I read:

ARTICLE 3. In compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon, the Creeks hereby cede and convey to the United States, to be sold to and used as homes for such other civilized Indians as the United States may choose to settle thereon, the west half of their entire domain, to be divided, &c.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that furnishes a complete answer to the gentleman's question. The language is: "In compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon." These lands were ceded for what? By the express terms of this article they were ceded to the United States to be sold to and used as homes for such other civilized Indians as the United States may choose to settle thereon, and not for any other purpose. The Indians may very well prefer to have as their neighbors other civilized tribes of Indians or freedmen than white men. They may greatly prefer to have Indians as neighbors than people who under the guise of settlers would occupy lands and then encroach upon the reservation until ultimately the Indians, the rightful owners, were driven away.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. PETERS. Did the Indians have a right to select what class of people or what tribes should be located upon those lands?

Mr. KEIFER. The Indians by this treaty stipulated that only other Indian tribes and freedmen were to be sent upon those lands, and under that clause of the treaty settlers have no right to go there and usurp the lands, and every one of them should be driven at the point of the bayonet from that Oklahoma territory.

Mr. PETERS. Was it not also decided that the word "freedmen," as there used, was confined to those who were freed by the Creek and Cherokee Nations?

Mr. KEIFER. I am not certain about the reading of the decision, but that does not affect my argument.

Mr. Chairman, I have but very little time, and I wish to call the attention of the House to the position of this territory on the map.

Mr. PERKINS. Has not Congress provided that no Indians shall be settled there?

Mr. KEIFER. I think not. If Congress has provided that Indians shall not be settled there, does it follow in law, reason, or logic that any person in the United States may go there and occupy the land? Congress can yet provide for the settlement of Indians on these lands according to the terms of the treaty.

Mr. PERKINS. Then, I will ask, what shall become of the land?

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman asks, what shall become of the land? I reply, hold it for the purposes for which we obtained it, and for no other.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Or else recede it.

Mr. PETERS. If no Indians are to be settled there, why hold it?

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman says no Indians are to be settled there. I say there are Indians to be settled there. If no others, there are the Creeks and Seminoles who might have the right to use it until the United States shall choose to use it as the treaty provides.

Mr. PETERS. The Creeks reserved the eastern half of their territory to themselves.

Mr. KEIFER. And by treaty limited the use the western half was to be put to.

Mr. RYAN. I suppose my friend does not wish to produce any false impression. The land ceded by the Seminoles and Creeks was ceded absolutely for the purposes specified.

Mr. KEIFER. For the purposes I have stated.

Mr. RYAN. But you have just stated that by the terms of the treaty they had a right to retain possession of the ceded territory until the Indians were located upon it.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I can not allow the gentleman to occupy the little time I have remaining. I have stated nothing of the kind. The gentleman did not understand what I said. In answer to gentlemen who wanted to know what would be done with this land, and who undertook to say there were no Indians to occupy it, I said there were yet Seminoles and Creeks who could occupy it if the United States could not cause it to be used as agreed in the treaty of June 14, 1866.

But, Mr. Chairman, in a brief debate of ten or fifteen minutes I am not going to enter into a legal discussion as to the effect of the stipulation of the treaty in regard to this land and whether, if the United States should fail to use it for the purposes for which it was ceded, it should revert to those tribes. That would be the ordinary result in a transaction between citizens of the United States; but when we are dealing with a poor helpless tribe of Indians it may be that the rule is the other way. At all events, I am justified in saying that the United States did not acquire this territory for any public purposes at all.

The Oklahoma region of country is located [pointing to a map of the Indian Territory] in the very heart of the Indian Territory, the whole of which has long since been dedicated as an Indian country for the settlement of various tribes of Indians. The Creek Indians originally owned all this Oklahoma territory; then a part of it went by treaty to the Seminoles, and the Creeks and Seminoles together ceded, as I have already stated, this Oklahoma territory. On the part of this Indian country originally owned by the Creeks there have been settled the Seminoles, the Iowas, the Kickapoos, the Pawnees, and the Sac and Fox Indians, but there is a portion, commonly called Oklahoma, which has not been occupied at all, and because it has not been occupied the land thieves of the country claim they have a right to go and steal it. I want to enter my protest here as strongly as I can against that being done. If the time should come when we must take this land from these poor Indians and give it to our people because we need more room, let us do it by purchase. If we must steal it let us do it boldly and openly, acknowledging to the world that we are robbing those Indians of the country that has been by solemn treaty dedicated by the United States to them forever. Let us not take possession step by step and piece by piece; let us be open and, if possible, manly about the matter.

Mr. PETERS. Was there any law other than the law which included the whole Louisiana territory that designated this as Indian country?

Mr. KEIFER. Treaty after treaty with the Cherokees, the Choctaws, the Creeks, and other tribes of Indians has dedicated this territory for the occupation of Indian tribes.

Mr. PETERS. I meant any general law.

Mr. KEIFER. Gentlemen talk about the Cherokee lands. Let me say one or two things about the way we deal with these Indians. The Cherokees owned all the northern part of the Indian Territory. They originally stipulated upon the idea that they were to have an outlet indefinitely to the far West. They were settled on the Arkansas, but they wanted an outlet to the great buffalo plains, as they called them. They found that they had more land than they needed or wanted; and they entered into a treaty with the United States by which the western part of their reservation was to be appraised and taken by the United States for the very purpose for which the Creeks and the Seminoles surrendered the western half of their lands.

The United States was to appraise them. It sent a commission there, and that commission went over the country and selected the better parts of it. It appraised some of it at about a dollar an acre and some at 30 cents. It appraised it at various prices and made return to the Government. The average appraisement was 50 cents, or about that, per acre. When that appraisement was returned here to our Government—I do not know what officer is responsible, and care not—it was fixed at an average price of 47 cents an acre for all these Cherokee lands. The United States under treaty said, We will take some of these lands at that average rate of 47 cents, and it sent surveyors in there to select and survey reservations of the very best and choicest of those lands, proposing to pay only to the Cherokees therefor the average price of 47 cents an acre, leaving the comparatively worthless lands for the Indians. Up to this day the United States has not said it was willing to comply with the treaty by paying these Indians the average price for all of the lands. This adjoins the Oklahoma country on the north, and our people are claiming they are public lands, although we have not paid the Cherokees for them. We have not even paid for the good lands we have arbitrarily taken and sold to other Indian tribes for an increased price.

It is in this way that we deal with the Indian tribes, and I want, in the very brief time I have allotted to me, to have it understood there are at least some persons in the Congress of the United States willing to protest, if they have no stronger voice or vote, against such a policy.

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that we are approaching the time when we shall consummate that barbarity of ours growing out of a policy which looks to the final extermination of the Indian tribes, and by taking away from them all their lands. It may be that the decree of destiny has gone forth that they shall all go, but I protest, sir, against this generation at this late day, in our supposed high civilization, I protest against our being charged with the infamy of the Indian policy as it was originally adopted. We can do our duty in the light of the present toward what remains of these Indian tribes. We can keep our own contracts made in recent years with these Indian people. We should pay them according to the terms of our agreement, paying all we agreed to pay them. We should deal justly with them. It is true we abrogate treaty after treaty, and say to the Indians you are getting too much beef and too much bread, and having too good a time under a particular treaty.

When we abrogate a treaty with the Indians we never go and say to them come and take your land. No; but we hold on to all we have got from them and say to them, we must make a better treaty for the United States with you for the future. So we go on, and I think the time has come when we should have a policy carried out, not pretended to be carried out, but actually carried out, that would at least relieve us from some of the charges of the great injustice done toward these people. They are Indians, it is true, but we ought not to stand up here in the presence of the American people and say they have no rights; and when we undertake to trade with them let us be honest to ourselves and to them. They are at least our wards and entitled to our tender care. In conscience we should not rob them.

If I have any time remaining I will yield it to the gentleman from Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired, and the bill will be reported by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to pay, out of the treaty funds herein appropriated for the Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches, to William Midkiff, $2,600; to J. M. Waide, $3,250; and to Henry A. Whaley, $1,650; the same being claims for damages caused by depredations by said Indians, and examined, approved, and reported to Congress by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. ELLIS. By direction of the committee I move to strike out from line 162 to 170 which has just been read; and in lieu thereof to insert the provision which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to pay out of the treaty funds herein appropriated for the Kiowas and Comanches, 15 per cent. to each of the following-named persons upon their respective claims herein described, and in part payment thereof, to wit: To S. N. Wood, $1,285; to William Beddo, $18,600; to L. W. Vaughan, $247; to R. Vaughan, $695; to J. H. Baker, $110; to J. D. Halsell, $19,625; to James Martin & Brothers, $1,950; to C. C. Fuller, $800; to John Hensley, $2,350; to William M. Hardin, $1,385; to A. J. Henson, $1,250; to C. W. Cooper, $2,250; to Henry A. Whaley, $1,500; to Daniel E. Moore, $3,000; to James P. Lindsey, $2,625; to F. C. Bulkley, $7,500; to the legal representatives of John S. Chisum, $20,000; to J. M. Waide, $2,250; to William Midkiff, $2,600; to Overton Love, $7,350; to Mary Stick, administratrix of Wyatt Gilchrist, $300; the same being claims for damages caused by depredations by said Indians, and examined, approved, and reported to Congress by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Louisiana if it has been usual to put those claims in the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir; it has been done year by year. We appropriate all these moneys in fulfillment of treaty stipulations, and by other clauses in those treaties it is provided these amounts for depredations shall be paid out of the treaty funds.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have seen them on the deficiency bill.

Mr. ELLIS. The Government in paying trust funds pays the obligations on them.

Mr. BLOUNT. That may be the reason for making up the bill in this way; but the general practice I think has been to put these on the deficiency bill when they are allowed at all.

Mr. ELLIS. The deficiency bill does not deal with Indians. This is the practice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to pay, out of the treaty funds herein appropriated for the Pillager band of Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, to John Cook, $1,500; the same being a claim for damage caused by depredations of said Indians, and examined, approved, and reported to Congress by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. ELLIS. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations I send an amendment to the desk. It appears that John Cook, whose name is mentioned in this paragraph, is dead, and it is necessary to provide that the payment shall be made to his executor.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 243, after the word "to," insert "the estate of;" so that it will read "To the estate of John Cook."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, due the Choctaw Nation, to be placed to the credit of the Ghoctaws on the books of the United States Treasury, to draw interest at 5 per cent. per annum from the 21st day of May, 1883, the date of the passage of an act by the Choctaw legislature to adopt the Choctaw freedmen as citizens, being three-fourths of the balance of the sum of $300,000 stipulated to be paid and to draw interest under the third and forty-sixth articles of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaws and Chickasaws, dated April 28, 1866, less such sums, at the rate of $100 per capita, as shall be sufficient to pay such persons of African descent belonging to said nation who shall elect to remove and actually remove from the said nation, $52,125; in all, $82,157.89.

Mr. ELLIS. By direction of the committee I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the claim of the Cherokee Indians residing east of the Mississippi River at the date of the treaty of 1835-'36, and also the claim of the old settlers or Western Cherokees, both claims being set forth in the report to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior of February 3, 1883, made under the act of August 7, 1882, and as contained in Senate Executive Document No. 60 of the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress, and such sum or sums as may be found to be legally and equitably due to them, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication, disposition, and report as provided by the Cherokee treaties of 1835-'36 and 1846, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine the rights of all parties interested therein, and to enter a decree respectively defining such rights; and said claims shall be heard and tried by preference and without delay; and in case of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States the said appeal shall also be advanced and tried without delay and by preference; and said court shall especially determine the respective interests of the various bands of said Cherokee Indians and the amounts due each band or any individual members thereof.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. ELLIS. I believe points of order were not reserved upon this bill when it was reported and referred.

Mr. HOLMAN. That may be; but this is an amendment to the bill and subject to the point of order.

Mr. ELLIS. It is an amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Undoubtedly; but like all other amendments it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. ELLIS. However, I will waive that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish the gentleman to waive anything. The point of order is good against it.

Mr. ELLIS. Then I will urge the adoption of the amendment at the proper time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to be heard now?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am willing to withhold the point of order.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, in the year 1882, by the act approved August 7 of that year, the Congress of the United States enacted the following law:

The Secretary of the Interior shall investigate and report to Congress what, in his opinion, would be an equitable settlement of all matters of dispute between the Eastern band of Cherokee Indians (including all the Cherokees residing east of the Mississippi River) and the Cherokee tribe or nation west; also all matters of dispute between other bands or parts of the Cherokee Nation; also all matters between any of said bands or parts thereof and the United States, arising from or growing out of treaty stipulations or the laws of Congress relating thereto, and what sum or sums of money, if any, should, in his opinion, be paid in such settlement; and the sum of $2,500 is hereby appropriated for such investigation.

That act was approved by the President of the United States; and under it the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior, appointed a commissioner who was duly sworn and has fully examined into all matters between these people and the United States growing out of unfulfilled treaty stipulations. This commissioner reported that a sum of between $700,000 and $800,000, with interest, is due to them. This sum was sent up by the Department to be appropriated for, but on account of our inability to determine to what respective bands of Cherokee Indians this sum properly belonged, or rather the proportion belonging to the eastern and western bands, we were unable properly to distribute the sum found due. Moreover, Mr. Chairman, there was a legal question involved, and we thought it best to refer the whole subject to the Court of Claims.

There is no question, gentlemen of the committee, but that these sums are due the Indians on account of unfulfilled treaty stipulations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon the point of order that this proposition to refer these claims to the Court of Claims is new legislation. I understand that questions of order were not reserved upon the bill, but as a matter of course, this being an amendment, it stands simply upon the footing of any other amendment to an appropriation bill, and is subject to any point of order that would lie against a similar amendment if points of order had been reserved upon the bill.

I wish to say in behalf of the point of order that if this were a provision for paying this money, near $800,000, directly from the Treasury, it might be that the point of order would not apply. But here is a proposition, involving independent legislation, referring the subject to the Court of Claims, conferring jurisdiction upon that court to hear and decide the cause and providing for the mode of procedure, which provisions are not authorized by any existing law or treaty.

I wish to say one word, with the permission of the gentleman from Louisiana, in regard to the merits of this matter. I raise this point of order for the reason that these are ancient claims running back half a century. We are not informed as to the thoroughness of the investigation which has been had under the act of the last Congress. The subject does not legitimately belong to the Committee on Appropriations; it belongs to the Committee on Indian Affairs. That committee has considered the subject, and I understand the subcommittee having charge of this subject is prepared to report adversely on these claims and to the effect that the claims are without just foundation.

I have been willing all the time that these claims should go to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the law providing for the employment of that court to ascertain the facts and report to Congress. But I am not willing that these very large claims which have been resting there nearly half a century, some of them more than half a century, shall receive the sanction of Congress to the extent of being referred to the Court of Claims and jurisdiction conferred with a view to a final judgment, which of course Congress must pay. I am therefore compelled to insist on the point of order.

Mr. ELLIS. The rule provides:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except, &c.

The intendment of that is separate and independent legislation, legislation not growing out of or based upon any existing law; and certainly not legislation intended to carry out existing law.

The legislation intended by the provision offered is based on the treaty stipulations of the United States, which are the very highest law of the land, and the provision is in the nature of carrying out those treaty stipulations. The whole legislation is based on the treaty stipulations of 1835, 1836, and 1846. I suppose the gentleman from Indiana will not dispute the proposition that the claim of these Indians which it is proposed to refer to the Court of Claims is based on treaty stipulations which are the law of the land.

Is there any change intended, sir? The only change intended is that we shall fulfill our duty like men, as we should do, and carry out our treaty stipulations with these people, and do what we have promised them we would do, instead of by a niggardly and falsely economical style of legislation letting these things grow upon our hands year by year, until they have assumed a proportion that has frightened the economist. The provision is based upon existing law. It does not change existing law except in the mode of the execution of the law, and is intended to carry out the provisions of the existing law. The gentleman from Indiana will not dispute that this legislation is based on treaty stipulations which are in existence to-day.

Now, sir, as to the merits. Here is a report carefully drawn in which every single item of these treaty stipulations is gone over, a report covering twenty-nine pages, sanctioned by the Secretary of the Interior, sanctioned by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and it comes here with their authority, in which it is shown, ay, it is demonstrated, if a proposition be susceptible of demonstration, that we do owe these Indians justly and righteously a very large balance under our treaty.

What are we going to do about it? Why, sir, to place it in the Court of Claims and hurry it to trial is in the direction of economy. These Indians are getting 5 per cent. interest, and the law of the treaty says they shall have it, and the sooner this litigation is ended between these parties, the Government and the Indian, the better for all parties concerned.

I hold it is not new legislation, but legislation based on existing law for the purpose of carrying out existing law. It is not separate and independent legislation at all.

Can we trust our own courts? Can we trust the Supreme Court of the United States? If it be within the breast of any member of this House to dispute this claim, will he not concede at once that the Supreme Court of the United States can be safely trusted with whatever interest the Government of the United States may have in this matter? The proposition is to refer the question to our own highest tribunal and let that tribunal decide what are the rights of the parties to this controversy.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, if we had had honesty in the administration of these Indian treaties; if there had not been this false sense of miscalled economy, this littleness of soul, by which men have constantly sought, for partisan purposes, to cut down appropriations; if it had not been for this dishonest sort of legislation, this claim would not have risen up here to-day in these great proportions to vex our souls. I say let it be carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there let it be finally determined.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to add to what I have already said that there is nothing in either one of the treaties referred to by this amendment which contemplates the reference of any controversy or contention between this tribe of Indians and the United States to any court or tribunal.

Mr. ELLIS. No; except the tribunal of common honesty.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no provision in either of those treaties which contemplated any such reference. This is purely independent legislation, conferring jurisdiction which does not now exist by law over the subject-matter of this amendment.

I wish to add a word in relation to what the gentleman has thought proper to say outside of the question of order. I wish to say that there is reason to believe that there is not a shadow of foundation for this claim.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman from Indiana give the reason?

Mr. HOLMAN. And inasmuch as my friend near me [Mr. PEEL] is a member of the proper committee to investigate this subject—which the Committee on Appropriations is not—and inasmuch as the committee to which my friend from Arkansas belongs has had occasion to make an investigation of these claims, I trust that he will be heard by the House upon this question.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Chairman, the question now proposed to be referred to the Court of Claims was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, of which I am a member, on a memorial of these claimants, and it was submitted to my colleague on the committee, Mr. SMITH, from Pennsylvania, and myself as a subcommittee. I have given the question, so far as it regards the claim of the Settlers, or Western old Cherokees, a very diligent and very thorough examination. They claim this amount upon alleged errors which they say were committed by the accounting officers of the Government in 1850, four years after the date of the treaty of 1846, out of which this claim springs. This claim is based, they say, upon errors committed against them in stating their accounts by charging them with the removal and subsistence of the Eastern Cherokees as stipulated in the fifteenth article of the treaty of 1835. Those accounts were adjusted by the accounting officers, and passed upon and confirmed by the Senate, and the sum of $887,480.15 appropriated, which has been paid to these Old Settlers, save and except a small balance of $660 which is now in the Treasury, for the payment of which I have an amendment now in my hand which I will offer to this bill at the proper time. The act appropriating that $887,000 coupled with the appropriation a proviso that it was not to be disbursed by the disbursing officer unless each Indian for himself executed a receipt acknowledging that it was in full satisfaction of all claims against the Government under the fourth article of the treaty of 1846. I have examined most thoroughly the report of Mr. C. C. Clements, the special agent employed under the resolution of the Senate by the Secretary of the Interior to investigate this question. I have also examined the report of the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon the same subject. Both those reports bring out the Government in debt to these Indians on these claims in the sum of $1,120,000 and odd. But I can say to this committee and to the members of this House that I do not think any lawyer can examine those reports and the treaties upon which these claims are based without coming to the conclusion which I have reached, that we do not owe these Indians one single cent.

Mr. ELLIS. Then why not refer it to the courts?

Mr. PEEL. This same question has been referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act at this Congress and is now pending there, and I understand that a report has been made—indeed I have a copy of the report—in which the auditor of the Court of Claims shows that these claims have no foundation.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see that report.

Mr. PEEL. I have it at my room.

Mr. HOLMAN. That shows the importance of having the proper committee consider matters of this kind.

Mr. PEEL. My friend from Louisiana is mistaken also in regard to the interest. That was fixed by a resolution of the Senate allowing these parties 5 per cent. on whatever amount might be found due.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman whether the report of the Court of Claims, of which he has spoken, is printed?

Mr. PEEL. I have the printed report of the auditor at my room.

Mr. ELLIS. But I understood my friend to say that the question had been referred to the Court of Claims by the Senate under the Bowman act.

Mr. PEEL. Yes.

Mr. ELLIS. And that the Court of Claims had reported upon it. Now, what I want to know is whether that report is published.

Mr. PEEL. The report is not published, but I have a printed copy of the report of the auditor to the Court of Claims.

Mr. ELLIS. Is that the report of the Court of Claims?

Mr. PEEL. I can not say that it is. It is the auditor's report to the Court of Claims.

Mr. ELLIS. It is the report of an expert then.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to this claim being investigated by any tribunal. I have my report upon it prepared, and I have to-day notified the counsel who represent these claimants that I will submit it to the full committee on Tuesday next. When I commenced the investigation of this matter my partialities were all with the claimants, because it came to us so highly indorsed by the authorities to which the gentleman from Louisiana has referred here that I felt strongly inclined to believe that the claim was just; but the more I have investigated it the more thoroughly have I become satisfied that it has not a shadow of foundation, and never has had any foundation since it was first made in 1851.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order against this amendment is raised, as the Chair presumes, under the third clause of Rule XXI; and the ground is taken that the amendment violates that rule, because it changes existing law and does not on its face retrench expenditures in any one of the three ways specified in the rule. In reply to this point, it is urged by the gentleman from Louisiana first that points of order were not reserved on this bill, and that this amendment having been proposed under direction of the Committee on Appropriations, the failure to reserve points of order admits the amendment. The Chair thinks that this position is not tenable; that an amendment offered under direction of the Committee on Appropriations occupies precisely the same attitude, so far as this question is concerned, as an amendment submitted upon the individual responsibility of a member,

The other answer urged to the point of order is that the amendment does not change existing law. The Chair, however, thinks that it does. There is not in any treaty or in any existing law any provision for the reference of this claim to the Court of Claims or to any other tribunal. This amendment not only proposes the reference of the claim to the Court of Claims, but it goes on to prescribe the method of trial, the mode of payment, &c., all of which provisions are, in the opinion of the Chair, modifications of existing law. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest on $675,168, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, under provisions of third article of treaty of June 14, 1866, $33,758.40.

Mr. COSGROVE. I would like to hear some explanation of the provision just read.

Mr. ELLIS. That is the customary provision of law, unchanged.

Mr. COSGROVE. Has this appropriation been customary in former bills?

Mr. ELLIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] will allow me a moment, I will try to explain the purpose of this proposition. My friend will find that the sundry civil appropriation act passed at the last session contained the following provision:

For this amount, to pay the Creek Nation of Indians for 151,870.48 acres of land, being the amount taken by the United States in excess of the estimate made in the third article of the treaty with said Indians proclaimed August 11, 1866, at 30 cents per acre, $45,561, in full payment for said land.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say one word in addition. Congress at the last session in appropriating the sum of $45,561, and using the term "in full payment for said land," manifestly intended that that should be the final disposition of this matter. It has not been up to this time the policy of Congress to pay interest.

Mr. ELLIS. But here there is a treaty stipulation.

Mr. HOLMAN. But this being a subject of adjustment and compromise, it does not stand on the same footing as the provision of a treaty. It is matter outside of the treaty.

If I may add a single word in this connection I will say I do not concur in the view which has been expressed that the land which was acquired from these Creeks is to be regarded as public land and subject to settlement as such. It is absolutely certain that the treaty of June 14, 1866, with this tribe of Indians by which this land was acquired repels, every word of it, the idea that this land was acquired as public lands of the United States for general purposes, and to be subject to the laws governing the public domain; but, on the contrary, the treaty expressly declares that the land acquired from the Creeks under that treaty should be acquired solely for the purpose of settling thereon civilized tribes of Indians, not for the general purpose of settlement or disposition by the United States. Hence it would be a palpable violation of public faith and national honor if Congress, without the consent of the Indians, should appropriate these lands for any other purpose.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I do not understand what lands the gentleman is discussing.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Creek lands ceded to the United States.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The Oklahoma strip?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; a part of it.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, yes; a part of it.

Mr. ELLIS. This is the same old story of dishonesty and bad faith. By the treaty of 1866 with the Creek Nation, article 3, the United States made this agreement with them. They agreed to purchase from the Creek Indians the west half of their entire domain, to be divided by a line running north and south, a meridian line running directly north and south. They were to purchase lands from these Indians, exactly one-half, for the same price of 30 cents an acre. Then they estimated what that would amount to and fixed the amount at $975,000. They agreed, after disposing or paying over certain portions in certain ways, they would place a certain portion of it in the United States Treasury, after this language: "The United States agree to pay the said Indians, in such manner and for such purpose as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the date of the ratification of this treaty."

There it is, sir, written in the law made by your people. Your Government, I call the attention of the gentleman, agreed to pay these people at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum upon the purchase price of this Territory—upon all there was left of it in the Treasury.

By another provision of the treaty the United States Government was to make the survey and run the lines directly north and south. How did you do it? With your usual bad faith, with your usual violation of solemn treaty, what did you do? Your own surveyor ran a line north and south, and I call the attention of the committee to this line of shame [holding up a map]. They ran it north and south until the surveyor found it conveniently necessary to diverge a little, to steal a little from the Indians in order to fill out a reservation for the Seminole Indians. We stole by that survey 350,000 acres of land. These are the plain unvarnished facts.

Mr. COSGROVE. Is it customary to make this appropriation for the payment of interest on former appropriation bills?

Mr. ELLIS. So far as this is concerned you have settled the Seminoles on the stolen portion. They have built their homes; they have cleared their fields; they have their stocks, and let the Government of the United States be honest and carry out its solemnly plighted faith to these Indians.

Now, sir, when this steal was discovered the Indians made a claim for it, and after a long time the Government of the United States paid the interest—they paid the interest and acknowledged the principal.

Mr. HOLMAN. Paid the principal, you mean.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, paid the principal. The Indian had no voice here. One of the contracting parties to the treaty wrote in it "in full," as if I owed the gentleman from Indiana a note of hand for $100 with interest for two or three years, and I should pay him $100 and then should write in an ex parte contract and say I have paid $100 in full for all I owed him. I can not better illustrate it. We stole 350,000 acres of lands from these Indians; after nearly twenty years we acknowledged the theft and paid the principal. Now here is the law which we made for the Indian and bound ourselves to pay 5 per cent. interest. What member of the committee will move to strike it out; what man who believes good faith should reside in the breast of government as in the breast of individuals, and particularly so, Mr. Chairman, when dealing with the plundered, robbed, oppressed, and outraged ward? This provision simply closes the books and makes settlement in full by paying the stipulated interest.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been indulging gentlemen in this debate although there is nothing before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is conceded that we acquired the west half of the Creek lands under the treaty of the 14th June, 1866. No one denies it, that we have acquired that west half at the rate of 30 cents an acre.

Mr. ELLIS. I deny it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It turns out when the line was run there was embraced within the limits of our line 151,870 acres more land than one-half. Of course, it was fair and proper for the Government to pay for it if it took it or placed any other tribe of Indians on it. If the Government took the additional 151,870 acres the Government should pay for it at the rate of 30 cents an acre. For that purpose the last Congress appropriated the sum of $45,561 to pay for the land. We concluded to take it according to the line which had been run. We agreed to pay the Indians $45,561 for it. We paid the money, and now the proposition comes in after this has been finally disposed of—after that line was ratified and confirmed by the passage of that act last year and the acceptance of the money by the tribe—now it is proposed that interest shall be paid on the $45,561 from June 14, 1866, at 5 per cent. per annum, paying interest from the date of the original treaty.

Mr. ELLIS. Wait till we come to the other clause.

Mr. HOLMAN. The clause I wish to speak upon is the pending clause as it is involved in the other clause. I concede the whole of this matter is not involved in the pending provision, but it is in part so involved; and the remarks of the gentleman himself which were addressed to the pending clause were much more applicable to the subsequent clause than the clause now under consideration. But I concede the discussion more fitly belongs to the subsequent clause than to the one now pending; and for that reason and for the purpose of making the discussion more intelligible I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BURNES rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion has been withdrawn and there is no proposition pending. Debate is not in order.

Mr. RYAN. I did not understand why the Chair admonished my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] that debate is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion has been withdrawn, and there is nothing pending before the committee.

Mr. RYAN. I desire to renew the amendment for the purpose of saying a word.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdrew the motion thinking the discussion can be better taken up on the next paragraph.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For interest, at 5 per cent. per annum, on the sum of $45,561, being an additional amount appropriated for cession of land under the third article of their treaty dated June 14, 1866, by act approved July 17, 1884, from July 19, 1866, the date of ratification of the treaty, to July 19, 1884, the date said principal was placed to the credit of the nation, eighteen years, $41,004.90; in all $112,973.30.

Mr. BURNES. I desire, if points of order have not been reserved——

Mr. RANDALL. They have been.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to reserve the right to make a point of order against this paragraph; and with that reservation I have a few remarks to offer that I think may throw some light upon this whole transaction. First, however, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following at the end of line 353:

"Provided, however, That no part of the above sum shall be paid until the Creek Nation shall make and file in the office of Secretary of State a deed of cession and conveyance transferring to the United States 150,000 acres of the east half of said Creek lands reserved by the Creek Nation for a permanent home in the treaty of June 14, 1866; and also a statement in writing releasing the United States from the seeming trust created by said treaty as to the west half of said Creek lands sold to the United States by said treaty."

Mr. ELLIS. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. Now I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that under the treaty of June 14, 1866, the Government of the United States obtained a conveyance from the Creek Nation of the west half of all their lands, and they reserved the east half for their permanent home forever. The line dividing the nation into two parts, according to the terms of the treaty, was to be a direct line running from north to south.

Mr. CHACE. Which treaty was that?

Mr. BURNES. The treaty of June 14, 1866. Now, you observe that by the terms of that treaty and by the granting clause of the treaty, the Government of the United States obtained a title, subject to certain limitations, to the west half, and the west half only. It obtained no title to the east half—to any part of the east half. It obtained title to the west half, and the east was reserved as a home for the Creek Indians forever. This being so, it is conceded, I apprehend, by my distinguished colleague, who has this bill in charge, and it is a fact, that if this line had been run directly from north to south, dividing this territory into two equal parts, the quantity of land paid for would have been the quantity of land that we received. This being so, will any one contend that it was our duty, or that we had a right at the last session of Congress, to appropriate $45,000 for the purpose of paying for land not within the west half. We did appropriate the $45,000, under the gentle coercion of a Senate amendment, and it looks to me now as if we were appropriating for interest on a claim that never rightfully existed, and for which we receive nothing; for I say to the committee now that we get no legal title to the 150,000 acres of land—none whatever, either by statute or under the treaty.

Mr. KEIFER. Why not?

Mr. BURNES. For the reason that the Creek lands were to be divided into two equal parts by a line running due north and south; the west half to be ours and the east half to belong to the Creeks forever. But a surveyor, not having the fear of God or the United States before his eyes and in violation of the express grant under the treaty, voluntarily chose to make a détour from what ought to have been under the treaty a direct line, and pretends to take into the west half 150,000 acres which belonged then and belongs now to the Creeks and was a part of the east half. Will my distinguished colleague on the committee [Mr. KEIFER] please read the granting clause of the treaty and dispute if he can the express grant of the west half and the express reservation to the Creeks of the east half as a permanent home forever? He will find it was a perfect and complete reservation of every part and parcel of the east half. My colleague, able lawyer that he is, will find a further answer to his question in the certainty that title to unpurchased land can not be obtained in the face of express reservation or otherwise by an illegal line run by some surveyor in direct disregard of the law of the land.

Now, then, by the terms of this treaty the Creek Indians ceded and conveyed to the United States the west half, and the west half only, of their lands. If you pay this purchase-money, or the interest on it, do you get the title to the lands? You may say that you have a right to take the lands from the Creek Indians, and that they would acquiesce in that proceeding. But I say that there is no sanction of law, there is no title to or ownership of the lands in the Government of the United States at all. Of course I am not speaking of mere equities that such conditions might create. This being true, the question arises, shall we sit here, having appropriated $45,000 to pay for that to which we have no title either under any existing law or the treaty of 1866, and now appropriate for interest on the former illegal appropriation? Shall we appropriate and pay this money for that which we do not lawfully get; which we can not lawfully hold; which does not belong to us, and which we have solemnly, by treaty obligations, pledged as a permanent home for these Creek Indians forever? That is the question.

But it will be said, and it has been said, that the Seminole Indians have a portion of it. We purchased, or properly speaking coerced, from the Seminoles their entire tract of land at 15 cents an acre and sold to them, good Yankee traders as we are, 200,000 acres of this so-called Oklahoma country, the ceded lands of the Creeks—200,000 acres at 50 cents an acre. So that while the Seminoles sold us their lands at 15 cents an acre we sold to them 200,000 acres at 50 cents an acre. So much, therefore, for the Seminoles and their connection with this transaction. Under threats of confiscation, just after the war had closed, we drove a hard bargain with them as with the Creeks.

I desire, now, sir, to call attention to another feature——

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Before the gentleman leaves this subject will he give, if he can, or state what reason is given for making this détour?

Mr. BURNES. When a surveyor, without any sanction or without any authority of law, either statute or treaty, goes and makes a détour or deviates from a direct line established by law I can see no motive in such a proceeding that is lawful or justifiable. No department of the Government could empower him to violate the law, yet he did it. No other reason is assigned for the action of the surveyor.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is there any reason given for the divergence? Was it possibly to follow the course of a stream, or anything of that kind?

Mr. BURNES. There is nothing whatever that I have ever heard of to warrant or justify the proceedings at all. It seems to be wholly unjustifiable. Perhaps the gentleman who has the bill in charge—the gentleman from Louisiana—can explain if there is any reason for the divergence except lawlessness. I do not know of any; on the contrary, he must have known he was violating the law of his country, and that no sanction of his proceeding by any officer or department of the Government, save the one of which we are a part, could give even a color of legality to it. I would also say to my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] that there were no topographical or other impediments to the running of a straight line as the treaty requires. It appears to have been done without any sanction of law and in violation of the treaty of 1866, by which we acquired these lands.

I would like to ask the Clerk to read the third section of the treaty of 1866.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE III. In compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon, the Creeks hereby cede and convey to the United States, to be sold to and used as homes for such other civilized Indians as the United States may choose to settle thereon, the west half of their entire domain, to be divided by a line running north and south; the eastern half of said Creek lands, being retained by them, shall, except as herein otherwise stipulated, be forever set apart as a home for said Creek Nation; and in consideration of said cession of the west half of their lands, estimated to contain 3,250,560 acres, the United States agree to pay the sum of 30 cents per acre, amounting to $975,168, in the manner hereinafter provided, to wit: $200,000 shall be paid per capita in money, unless otherwise directed by the President of the United States, upon the ratification of this treaty, to enable the Creeks to occupy, restore, and improve their farms, and to make their nation independent and self-sustaining, and to pay the damages sustained by the mission schools on the North Fork and the Arkansas Rivers not to exceed $2,000, and to pay the delegates such per diem as the agent and Creek council may agree upon as a just and fair compensation, all of which shall be distributed for that purpose by the agent with the advice of the Creek council, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior; $100,000 shall be paid to soldiers enlisted in the Federal Army and the loyal refugee Indians and freedmen who were driven from their homes by the rebel forces, to reimburse them in proportion to their respective losses; $400,000 shall be paid per capita in money to said Creek Nation, unless otherwise directed by the President of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, as the same may accrue from the sale of land to other Indians. The United States agree to pay to said Indians, in such manner and for such purposes as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the date of the ratification of this treaty, on the amount hereinbefore agreed upon for said ceded lands, after deducting the said $200,000; the residue, $275,168, shall remain in the Treasury of the United States, and the interest thereon, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, be annually paid to said Creeks as above stipulated.

[During the reading of the foregoing the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RANDALL was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. BURNES.

The Clerk then resumed and concluded the reading as above.

Mr. BURNES. Now, let me call the attention of the committee to another proposition. You will observe that this treaty was made in 1866. These Creek Indians had been unfortunate enough to array themselves against the United States in the civil war just then closed, and you will observe, by reading the provisions of the treaty, that following the example of adventurers in the Southern States the administration of the Government of the United States at that date seemed disposed to speculate upon the misfortunes of the terrified Indians. The Creeks, having been transported from their early homes in this country to the western wilds of the Indian Territory, had been given their territory as a permanent home forever. They were at the mercy of the Government at the close of the war. They were told by the treaty itself that they had forfeited all their lands, their rights, and their other property; that by the ceding of one-half of these lands to the Government at 30 cents an acre they might hold the rest for themselves as a permanent home. Now we are taking, at the instance of a Government surveyor, without sanction of law, 150,000 acres more of their territory at the rate of 30 cents an acre, while we are selling at the rate of 50 cents to the Seminoles.

Mr. KEIFER. Is not the correct amount 350,000 acres?

Mr. BURNES. Two hundred thousand acres are provided for and sold in the Seminole treaty of the same year. I have found nothing in any treaty with either the Seminoles or Creeks to justify the statement which I have heard made upon this floor that the Government sold the Seminoles 350,000 acres of the ceded land of the Creeks. I would like for some gentleman who asserts the fact to point us to the treaty that gave more than 200,000 acres to the Seminoles. And if the fact exists, will some one inform us when and where and how the Seminoles paid for the excess? I apprehend it can not be found. The treaty of 1866 between the Seminoles and the United States sustains the statement I have made.

I mention these things now for the purpose of making a basis for the amendment which I have had the honor to offer. We have been told that a state of war exists in this territory of Oklahoma, and that the settlers are now face to face with their destiny, that destiny being under the command of an officer of the United States Army. There can be no fair-minded man, I apprehend, who will for one moment claim that the grant of this Oklahoma territory, so called, is not subject to an express trust created by the treaty, the third section of which has been read in our hearing. These settlers, it had better be said here, have not the lawful right to go upon those Oklahoma lands.

I say this in the face of valued and esteemed constituents who are desirous of going, and some of whom have gone there, and I warn members of this committee that they will be responsible for the blood which may be shed in the conflict said to be impending if they hesitate to speak here and now firmly and distinctly to the high-hearted and gallant people hovering on the borders of Oklahoma that they have no lawful right to invade or settle that territory at this time. They should be told the truth. Congress should give them the right to enter and settle—a right denied them by solemn treaty stipulation. They see large cattle companies enjoying the blessings of the territory, and naturally and properly they think they have as much right there as these favored few with their great herds.

This being so, what follows? The Creek Indians and their enterprising attorneys want $45,000 in money. The always able and fair-minded gentleman who has this bill in charge has investigated this claim, and comes to the conclusion that the Government owes this money to the Creeks. I do not believe a word of it; but it may be so. In this condition of things what had we better do as American representatives? Let us compromise this matter and save the threatened bloodshed to which allusion has been made here. Adopt this amendment, and let the compromise be made, providing that we shall have the lands which my esteemed friend thinks we ought to pay for, and that the Creeks in receiving the money shall relieve us from this seeming trust in the treaty, and allow this fair land to be opened up for the lawful settlement of the poor and homeless people of this country who may desire to go there. It has been seen in this discussion that it is lawful now to settle on these lands Indians and freedmen; and it is a well-known fact that practically a few white men with immense herds of cattle enjoy them without military or other interference on the part of the Government as completely as if they owned them in fee-simple. Let it be our work, by adopting the amendment, to make the honest and humble seeker of a home in this splendid region equal in right there with the favored ranchmen, Indians, and freedmen for whom it now seems to be exclusively held.

Sir, there are in this Oklahoma territory a little less than 5,000 square miles of territory. Shall we prepare the way for 20,000 hardy, honest, industrious families to make their happy homes thereon, or by inaction allow them to be driven off by the Army of the United States, and under the merest pretense of keeping the lands for Indians and freedmen, who are not there, allow a few cattle-kings to hold and enjoy it all without let or hindrance?

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] to modify his resolution so as to require that the Creek Indians shall file with the Department an acceptance on their part of the survey that was made; because the lands that are sought here to be paid for are all on the west side of that line, and there might be at least some ambiguity as to whether we were paying for lands east or west of the line if the resolution or the amendment should be adopted in its present form. The object my friend has in view is simply to require the Creek Indians to accept the survey that was made, because it is by reason of that survey that the surplus number of acres that we are required to pay for is ascertained.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that the suggestion of my colleague is a good one, and I accept the amendment.

Mr. RYAN. I want to say one word more in this connection. We agree by treaty to divide the Creek country in two equal parts. As my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] has said, the survey that was made and finally accepted does not divide it in two equal parts, but gives to the Government the larger portion by 350,000 acres.

Had the territory of the Creeks been divided in two equal parts we should have received 35,000 acres less than we estimated and paid for. Hence there are 151,000 acres more than we paid for by reason of running the line too far to the east.

Now let me call the attention of the House for one moment to what is stated in a letter upon this subject by the present Secretary of the Interior. He says:

> It is found that the line was not so run as to divide the reservation into two equal parts, but was surveyed in such manner as to embrace in the portion west thereof 3,402,430 acres, or an excess of 186,935 acres over and above the one-half of the whole domain, or an excess of 151,870 acres over and above the estimated quantity stated in the treaty. The quantity of 3,250,560 acres stated in the treaty has been paid for at the stipulated price of 30 cents per acre.
> I am of opinion, after a careful review of the whole case, that the Creek Indians are entitled to payment at 30 cents per acre for the additional 151,870 acres taken by the United States and not paid for, with interest at the rate provided by the third article of the treaty for the unpaid portion of the consideration for the ceded land.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we should be greatly embarrassed if we should require a resurvey of those lands and divide them exactly in the middle.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL obtained the floor and yielded his time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN].

Mr. RYAN. I ask only a moment more in order to explain the embarrassment that the Government would encounter if it were to resurvey this Territory now and divide it in the middle, instead of paying for the surplus lands we have taken under the incorrect survey. And now, Mr. Chairman, let me call the attention of the House to the fact that we have located the Sac and Fox tribes of Indians right up against the line, as we find by that survey. If we were to have a resurvey and run the line exactly in the center, we should be obliged not only to remove the Sacs and Foxes but also the Pawnees, who are located upon a portion of it. That could only be done at great expense—much greater expense than the mere payment of 30 cents per acre for these surplus lands.

Besides, the Sac and Fox Nation of Indians, as I understand, have paid for their lands to the Government of the United States; and they believe, of course, that the boundaries as already determined are correct. Therefore it seems to me to be equitable and just to pay for the lands we have taken by this inaccurate survey rather than undertake to resurvey them and open this question of difficulty with the Indians, whom we have already located upon these lands.

One word more. This question came up in the last Congress. The Senate of the United States put upon the sundry civil appropriation bill an amendment providing for payment for these excess or surplus lands, amounting to 151,000 acres, together with interest, as provided by the treaty. That amendment went into conference, and finally came out in a form providing for the payment of the principal without interest. I have explained, I believe, as clearly as I am able, the exact status of this proposition now pending, which is to pay the interest on that sum, which we did not provide for in the last bill.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I would like to put a question to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN]. I find from the gentleman's remarks that he is familiar with this whole subject; and I now ask whether in connection with the proposition he makes we ought not to ratify this false survey?

Mr. RYAN. That was the first suggestion I made to my friend from Missouri.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. It escaped my attention.

Mr. RYAN. I suggested to the gentleman that he so modify his amendment as to require the Creek Nation of Indians to file a ratification of this survey before this money is paid over.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to amend by striking out the last word. My friend from Missouri offers this amendment and calls it a proposition for compromise. I am glad he agrees with me in one thing—that no citizen has a right to go upon these Oklahoma lands and make settlement. But I must differ with him widely upon his proposition, whether he leaves it in the form in which he presented it or whether he modifies it as suggested by the gentleman from Kansas. The proposition is that these 150,000 acres of stolen land, which not only by the terms of the treaty fixing the basis of payment but by the highest sense of national honor we are bound to pay for at this low rate, at least shall be made the basis of a compromise by which we are to compel these Creek Indians, willing or unwilling, to recede to the United States unconditionally all the western portion of their former reservation. By the latter clause of this amendment they are required to file in the Indian Office a statement in writing, releasing to the United States the seeming trust created by the treaty as to the west half of the Creek lands sold to the United States by the treaty of June 14, 1866. In other words, without a shadow of right on our part, as the gentleman from Missouri must agree, to withhold one cent of the money proposed to be appropriated in this bill, we undertake to say that before we pay them this money these Indians shall waive the trust, waive the condition as found in article 3 of the treaty of June 14, 1866. This is to be done without consulting these Indians. This proposition is as bad as the clause which the gentleman from Indiana has read from the act of July 7, 1884, in which we undertook to say to the Indians that they should accept a given sum of money in full payment for the lands that we have taken from them.

Mr. Chairman, it is agreed on all hands that 150,000 acres of these Creek Indian lands have been taken from the Indians; and now I do not think it very important whether we have a release in writing filed in the Indian Office or not. If we take these lands and settle for them in the manner we have already settled the circumstances in regard to this disputed tract, we need not be very particular about the form of our title, for if we are to go on with our present policy we shall steal the balance some day. We need not be very critical in regard to any release, guarantee, or warranty. If we will only pay for the land we shall have some shadow of title to it. We have already authorized the occupancy of this land by other tribes of Indians, to whom we have sold it, and from whom we have received the money. And now we are talking about the title!

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I can not permit to go unchallenged the statement made several times in this debate that persons endeavoring to occupy this Oklahoma territory are doing so without any shadow of right. The first question which presents itself to be decided is whether this Oklahoma territory is Indian country. The only law to be found anywhere in the statutes of the United States that describes any territory as Indian country is the law of 1834, the first section of which reads as follows:

> Be it enacted, &c., That all that part of the United States west of the Mississippi, and not within the States of Missouri and Louisiana or the Territory of Arkansas, and also that part of the United States east of the Mississippi River, and not within any State, to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, shall for the purposes of this act be taken and deemed to be Indian country.

There is the only foundation in all the laws of the United States for this cognomen "Indian country." When you come to examine the Revised Statutes you will find this section has been omitted; it is not now regarded as a part of the laws of this country. Under that first section of the act of 1834, if it still remains in force, Kansas is Indian country, Nebraska is Indian country, Colorado is Indian country. Will gentlemen stand up here to-day and claim that those States are a part of the Indian country? The courts have decided what is properly Indian country. By their decisions they have proclaimed that Indian country is country to which the Indian title has not been extinguished. Now, has the Indian title to this Oklahoma country been extinguished? Where is the man who will say that under any treaty or any law these Creek Indians can go into that Oklahoma country and claim it as theirs?

Where is the man or lawyer who will say this Creek Nation can go into Oklahoma territory and exercise supervision over it? Their title has been extinguished by the treaty of 1866. I care not what provisions were made in that treaty in reference to its occupation by the United States, the title of the Creeks in that territory was extinguished, and by the extinguishment of that Indian title it ceased to be Indian territory; and whenever it ceases to be Indian country then it comes under the general provisions of law in relation to pre-emption and homestead of the public domain.

Mr. LONG. How was the title extinguished?

Mr. PETERS. By the Indians themselves ceding it.

Mr. LONG. For a specific purpose?

Mr. PETERS. I say that the title was extinguished so far as the Indian was concerned. I am not saying anything about the proviso, but I say in the absence of any provision in that treaty providing in case the United States should not occupy this country by settling in it civilized Indians, or by any other means under the proviso, that in the absence of any statement in the treaty providing this land should revert to the Creek Indians, their title is absolutely extinguished, and it is only a question with the United States what it shall do with this country. Under the provisions of section 2257 of the Revised Statutes the law says all land belonging to the United States to which the Indian title has been or may hereafter be extinguished shall be subject to the right of pre-emption under the conditions, restrictions, and limitations provided by law.

Now, the whole trouble with this Oklahoma territory is there is no machinery there under the law of the Government by which the settler can occupy this land.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELLIS. I insist on the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has raised the point of order, as the Chair understood him or reserved the right to make the point of order, against the paragraph.

Mr. BURNES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. After that point of order is disposed of the point of order of the gentleman from Louisiana against the amendment will be heard.

Mr. ELLIS. Is not the amendment to the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but the gentleman from Missouri raises the point against the paragraph, and the Chair is desirous of hearing what that point of order is.

Mr. BURNES. The point of order I desire to make is this, that there is no law by treaty or statute authorizing the appropriation of this money, and that the appropriation is in fact in violation of law. But I will not insist upon the point of order now if the gentleman from Louisiana will withdraw his point of order to the pending amendment.

Mr. ELLIS. No; I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the point of order to be that the amendment changes existing law and does not retrench expenditure. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on that question?

Mr. BURNES. I desire to say only this: Here is a paragraph in this bill which appropriates $45,000 for the purpose of paying interest alleged to be due to the Creek Indians eighteen years ago under the terms of a certain treaty.

Mr. ELLIS. I thought the subject had been debated.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been no debate on this point of order.

Mr. ELLIS. I understood there had been; I knew, however, it had not touched it.

Mr. BURNES. I wish to say on the point of order of the gentleman from Louisiana that this is a paragraph appropriating $45,000 under the terms of the treaty of June 14, 1866, alleged to be due the Creek Indians eighteen years ago. By referring to that treaty I find this is interest on land not included in that treaty. Then the gentleman comes to the point and says although it is not included under the treaty we acquired title to it by the unlawful act of our surveyor. This, therefore, is a proposition to pay for land never ceded to the United States, never granted and never conveyed to the United States, but, on the contrary, expressly reserved by the terms of the treaty to the Creek Nation of Indians as a home forever. I say the Government can not acquire title to real estate by the act of a surveyor. This is an alleged appropriation under the treaty, and that treaty says the appropriation is illegal and without consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order against the amendment and rules it out.

Mr. ELLIS. Which point of order does the Chair sustain?

The CHAIRMAN. Against the amendment, and it is ruled out. The other point of order the Chair understands was withdrawn.

Mr. BURNES. Did I understand the Chair to overrule the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. BURNES. Then I desire to press upon the attention of the Chair my point that the paragraph is without the sanction of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that point to be waived.

Mr. BURNES. No; I beg the Chair's pardon; I expressly stated I would not insist upon it unless I was forced to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman state that he did state he would withdraw the point of order?

Mr. BURNES. I did not, or at least I did not intend to. I remarked I would waive my point of order if the gentleman from Louisiana would waive his.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to state in reference to this matter that while the gentleman announced that the point of order was waived temporarily, I think he did in fact waive it altogether when he offered the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. But that was offered with the implied understanding on the part of the committee, and acquiesced in by the Chair, that he reserved the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. As against the clause?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, as against the clause.

Mr. BURNES. I desire now not only to have the Chair pass upon the point of order as to the paragraph itself, but to have a vote upon that paragraph in the committee if the Chair shall overrule the point of order.

Mr. ELLIS. I understand the point of order of the gentleman from Missouri to be that there is no provision of law upon which to base the appropriation contained in the paragraph?

Mr. BURNES. That is correct.

Mr. ELLIS. In the first place, I will say that it is too late to make the point of order now, the Clerk having passed from that particular paragraph.

But there is this point which I think is fatal to it, and that is when this bill was reported to the House, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, no points of order were reserved upon the provisions of the bill. That, I take it, would be in itself fatal to the point of order.

But, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Missouri, I will state that there is law for it. In the first place, there is the treaty of 1866, by which we purchased the lands from the Creek Indians at so much per acre, part of which we paid and a portion of which we did not pay. The balance of the principal we paid by the law of last year. The interest—and this is the paragraph which makes provision for the interest—necessarily follows the principal.

Now, what is the gentleman's argument? He argues that the Government acquires no title. Why, sir, the Creeks are claiming this money for the sale of that land made to the United States. We have paid the principal, and they have acquiesced in that arrangement. They now ask that the interest due them be paid and when we pay the interest we will have paid the purchase-money, the price agreed upon by the treaty of 1866, and the equitable title follows.

Mr. BURNES. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly.

Mr. BURNES. I would like to ask my colleague on the committee if it be not the fact that by the terms of this treaty there is neither cession nor conveyance of these 151,000 acres of land, or any part of it, to the Government?

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Louisiana will yield to me for a moment I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that his question would be fully answered by reading the eighth article of this treaty.

Mr. BURNES. Then the gentleman from Rhode Island can answer the question asked of my colleague.

Mr. CHACE. It seems to me the language of this article is so clear that there is no room for a mistake. Besides that, if there be any charge that this Government itself made a mistake, they are estopped from taking advantage of their own laches.

I will read this section of this article of the treaty; it is very short:

ARTICLE VIII. It is agreed that the Secretary of the Interior forthwith cause the line dividing the Creek country, as provided for by the terms of the sale of Creek lands to the United States, in Article III of this treaty, to be accurately surveyed under the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the expenses of which survey shall be paid by the United States.

Now, if the United States Government has made this survey, as the report of the Commissioner shows, can the Government come in here and take advantage of its own laches?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. By doing what?

Mr. BURNES. I hope the gentleman from Rhode Island will not object to my answering his question by the old process of asking another. I ask him in the first place was this an "accurate survey" under the terms of the treaty? And secondly, can the Government acquire title by an inaccurate survey by a surveyor of its own selection?

Mr. CHACE. There is nothing to show that this is an inaccurate survey. The gentleman from Missouri has asserted that it is, but so far as I am aware he has not produced any evidence in support of the claim.

Mr. BURNES. I beg pardon; it has been read in the hearing of this committee, and it shows clearly that this Territory was to be divided into two equal parts; that we were to have the west and the Creeks the east half of the territory. Now it is shown that the division is not equal.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana desire to be heard further upon the point of order?

Mr. ELLIS. No. Let us have a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no difficulty in overruling this point of order; and he does so on the ground that the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union without the reservation of any points of order.

The Clerk will read.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 353:

"Provided further, That no part of the above sum shall be paid until the Creek Nation shall make and file in the office of the Secretary of State an acceptance and ratification of the survey made and approved by the Department under the treaty of June 14, 1866."

Mr. HOLMAN. That amendment, I suggest, is subject to the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. To test the sense of the committee, the Chair having overruled the point of order on the paragraph, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the paragraph has been moved. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] for the purpose he has indicated at a later stage.

Mr. ELLIS rose.

Mr. RYAN. I hope my friend will not object to the amendment.

Mr. ELLIS. I have no objection to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I do not know what the point of order is.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order is that it is new legislation.

Mr. ELLIS. I hope the point of order will not be insisted on. The amendment perfects the title of the Government.

Mr. HILL addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist on the point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to reserve the point of order until I shall have made a brief statement.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before doing so I wish to say this: By the act of the last Congress we appropriated $45,561 to pay for this land, and that money has been accepted. I submit there is a complete estoppel here against the Creeks setting up any claim to the land lying between the line intended to be run in terms of the treaty and the line actually run. There is no trouble about the line title. But my desire is, so far as I am concerned as a member of the House, that that land shall go under the provisions of the treaty, and that it shall not be kept over separate from the land covered by the treaty, which would be a violation of the spirit and purpose of the treaty.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The only point involved is whether or not the Creeks by the acceptance of the payment last year are estopped now to deny the title to this property in the Government. The object of the amendment I have offered is to preclude any controversy for all time on that subject.

If we have taken this land unjustly, which seems to be conceded, by an improper survey, and we have partially paid for it without getting any relinquishment of title from the Creeks and that operates as an estoppel, as the gentleman from Indiana seems to think, and perhaps he is correct, what is the objection to requiring these parties to relinquish to the Government whatever claim they may have, and forever put a stop to any controversy?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will answer the gentleman from Arkansas by saying that the body of this land is acquired under that treaty and for a specific object. The land that would be acquired under this provision if acceded to by the Creeks would be on an entirely different footing. And here we would have a strip of land, subject to settlement on the part of our people, creating disturbance from the beginning. It would be far better that all the land we buy from the Creeks should rest on one condition—the provisions of the treaty of 1866; let us acquire whatever right we acquire from them hereafter by treaty.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. My friend from Indiana is mistaken. The object of the amendment was simply to require these parties to ratify the survey, so that the unjust survey shall become law in the future, and that the title of the Government shall be perfected by virtue of this ratification, so as to place it beyond all controversy in the future.

Mr. ELLIS. Under the treaty?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Yes; not under this act, but under the treaty, and under the survey made under the treaty also. That is the object of the amendment; and I hope my friend from Indiana will not insist on the point of order against the provision, which manifestly secures the Government against any controversy in the future.

Mr. HILL. It seems to me a very strange proposition that an amendment should be offered here to require a few Indians to agree now to what they agreed to do several years ago; that is, to ratify a survey which they bound themselves to do under a treaty. Now, sir, if I read this treaty aright, under article 3 they specially agree to cede these lands to the United States upon certain conditions, and those conditions are that these lands are to be subject to settlement by Indians and freedmen, not by citizens of the United States.

This Oklahoma territory is situated in the very heart of the Indian Territory, and whenever you open it up to settlement by citizens of the United States, by cattle-kings or monopolists or any other persons, you grant them the right of way through the Indian Territory, and you might as well talk about putting a bullet through a man's heart and expect the blood afterward to circulate through his veins as to talk about taking that territory and giving it to citizens of the United States, while you reserve the right to use it to these Indians. They are the wards of the Government. A guardian has no right to make bargains with his ward; and in Ohio, where I live, when a guardian swindles his ward he is sent to the penitentiary.

It was a mere case of "might makes right." That is all there is of it. I agree with my colleague [Mr. KEIFER] that those lands ought to be held sacred for these Indians until in the course of nature, which takes its way in everything, they have become extinct, as they will. But so long as they are powerless, so long as they are lying at our feet, a poor people dependent upon our magnanimity, we should not violate the honor, the dignity of the American Congress by robbing them, piece by piece, until we have robbed them of everything which they originally owned on this continent.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that amendment be again reported. I wish to suggest that if the terms are so limited as that this shall be deemed only a portion of the ratification of the acts of the Government under the treaty, so that this strip of land shall stand on the same footing as the balance of it, imposing as to the whole of it good faith on the part of the Government toward these Indians, then I shall be willing to withdraw the point of order, although I think the appropriation ought not to be made.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make one suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana and to the committee. The object which is sought is precisely the object of this amendment; and I want to make this additional suggestion, that perhaps it would be wise to modify it so as to require the Indians to make this acceptance and ratification within a limited period of time, so as not to keep it open longer than, say, six months or perhaps four months. I ask to have the amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the line 353 the following:

"Provided, however, That no part of the above sum shall be paid until the Creek Nation shall make and file in the office of the Secretary of State an acceptance and ratification of the survey made and approved by the Department under the treaty of June 14, 1866."

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] to consent to add the following language:

The additional lands to be held by the United States under the provisions of the treaty of the 14th of June, 1866.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I have no sort of objection to that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ELLIS. I suggest further to the gentleman from Arkansas that his amendment be inserted after the word "cents," in line 352, so that it shall not conflict with the title.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I accept that modification also. And now, if it will be satisfactory to the gentleman having the bill under control and to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], I suggest that there be an additional provision that the acceptance shall be made within six months or twelve months or whatever period may be acceptable to them.

Mr. ELLIS. Make it twelve months.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment reported again; and I wish to ask whether all points of order are reserved?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has not yet been perfected. The gentleman can, of course, reserve his point of order.

Mr. CHACE. I will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was made originally by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and the question is now whether or not he will withdraw it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I should determine to withdraw it after this amendment is read of course the gentleman from Rhode Island can renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. Unquestionably the gentleman can renew the point of order. The Clerk will report the amendment as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That no part of the above sum shall be paid unless the Creek Nation shall within twelve months make and file in the office of the Secretary of State an acceptance and ratification of the survey made and approved by the Department under the treaty of June 14, 1866.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that modifies existing law and puts a new condition into this treaty.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I now move to strike out the whole section, from line 342 to line 354.

Mr. CHACE. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again submit the amendment as soon as it is perfected according to the agreement.

Mr. KEIFER. If there is to be further modification of it we reserve all rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as perfected according to the agreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "cents," in line 352, the following:

"Provided, however, That no part of the above sum shall be paid unless the Creek Nation shall within twelve months make and file in the office of the Secretary of State an acceptance and ratification of the survey made and approved by the Department under the treaty of June 14, 1866; and the additional lands acquired by the United States by the survey shall be held by the United States under the provisions of the treaty of June 14, 1866."

Mr. KEIFER. That is right.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask whether that may not be construed to mean that when the Indians accept this money lands will then be opened for settlement?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Not at all.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I suggest whether it had not better be understood now that this is not for the purpose of opening up those lands to white settlers, and that the intention is to reserve the lands for the purposes expressed in the treaty.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Will my friend from Kentucky allow me to make a statement on that point? I will state to him that in two, or perhaps in more, cases, in the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas, under the provisions of this treaty the court has held that this land was not open to settlement, and Payne was convicted under the criminal statutes of the United States for invading that territory, and then he was sued in the civil court and judgment for the penalty of the law recovered against him for moving in there a second time, and I think that at the time of his death two other suits of the same character were pending against him. So that up to the present time, so far as the courts have passed upon this question, they have uniformly held, so far as I am advised, that these lands are not open for settlement under the treaty of 1866.

Now let me say another thing. It is to be deprecated as exceedingly unwise that one single word should fall from any gentleman upon this floor urging the people of the States to go into that country under this treaty. The courts having decided that it is not open, and that those people have no rights there, it is wiser and better for us to meet the issue as it now stands, and either pass some law fixing a penalty that can be enforced, or else, on the other hand, take direct steps for the opening of that country to settlers.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to suggest also to the gentleman from Kentucky that these lands that have been taken by this wrongful survey are now in possession of the Sac and Fox and Pawnee Indians, and would not come within the Oklahoma tract as that now stands.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I understand that.

Mr. KEIFER. It is all possessed by other tribes of Indians and paid for by them.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am very much obliged for the information. Information is what I am trying to elicit. The question raised in my mind by the reading of the amendment was this: Whether when the Creeks accepted this money it would not be said that this Oklahoma reservation would be open to settlement, inasmuch as this money was in lieu of the extra amount of land that was taken, when Oklahoma was surveyed, from the eastern portion of the Indian Territory?

Mr. KEIFER. The modification which has been put upon the amendment settles that.

Mr. RYAN. The proposition does not affect the status of the Oklahoma country one particle.

Mr. KEIFER. Not at all.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ROGERS, of Aakansas, as amended, it was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I now move that the paragraph as amended be stricken out. This motion is in the interest of peace and the people at large. It will be for the interest and the well-being of the people, especially of the Western States, whose citizens have a deep concern in this matter. The sight of a number of large cattle companies spread out all over this Indian Territory, like a network of steel, protected by our Army, has deeply impressed itself upon the minds of the people of the West. They see a few persons occupying those lands as fully, to all intents and purposes, as if the Indian title were entirely extinct and a fee-simple title vested in these few occupants. The struggling and anxious settler, poor and needy, sees Oklahoma to-day practically in the possession of a small number of persons composing cattle companies. He feels that by some means special privileges are given by his country to others and denied to him; and he realizes that a wrong is being done to him. An American, and least of all a homeless frontiersman, will not long submit to wrong or outrage.

Let us not by neglect or indifference still further arouse the deep-seated sentiment of the people who are now hovering upon the borders of this Territory. Let this provision be stricken out. Let the members of this House take time to investigate a subject upon which depends, it may be, the blood and lives of American citizens. When we have investigated it carefully and thoroughly some action perhaps may be reached which will quiet the public mind, bring peace and happiness to a people upon whom now sit gloom and discontent, and mark another victory for that great principle of equality of right in all which is dear alike, we trust, to every Representative of the people on this floor.

Let this paragraph for the present go out. It is of doubtful propriety. It is outside of any treaty, outside of any law. Say what you please about acquiring title by the act of a surveyor, you are appropriating this money after the lapse of eighteen years for interest on a pretended debt that never existed—an old, stale claim—and nothing is offered by it that will in the least show a disposition to protect rights of persons now threatened, abolish special privileges now grown hateful to great masses of earnest men, or save the border from commotion and conflict.

Mr. VALENTINE. Are there any cattle now upon the Oklahoma territory?

Mr. BURNES. The Oklahoma territory, 5,000 square miles in extent, is covered with cattle as a dead carcass in midsummer with flies.

Mr. VALENTINE. Is that country so occupied under a lease?

Mr. KEIFER. They ought to be driven off.

Mr. BURNES. To my friend from Nebraska I answer no; neither lease nor known tribute to any one. I blame no one; I censure no one; but the fact exists that this Oklahoma country in its entirety is occupied without molestation by the cattle of great cattle companies. They occupy every acre of it to the practical exclusion of the individual settler. Our people believe that if it is lawful for a man with a vast herd of cattle to go into that territory, it is lawful for the settler to go there with his wife and little ones. They can not help feeling this way. Under these circumstances I hope the Committee of the Whole will strike out this provision and let the matter rest until some proper provision can be made that will give peace, quiet, and equal rights in Oklahoma to all alike.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to disabuse the mind of this committee of the impression that the payment of this debt to the Indians will in one way or another affect the status or the dedication of Oklahoma. Some gentlemen seem to have Oklahoma "on the brain." The strip of land now in question does not affect Oklahoma, does not touch Oklahoma, but is a portion of the lands purchased from the Creek Indians, which the Government took title to or took possession of, and upon which it has settled the Seminoles and the Sacs and Foxes.

Mr. KEIFER. And the Pawnees.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is not this eastern line of the survey, as described by the gentleman from Missouri, on which the Government has located the Sacs and Foxes and other Indians—is not this a part of the Western Creek territory which was ceded to the Government?

Mr. ELLIS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. And if that part is affected is not the whole affected?

Mr. ELLIS. Oh, no! There is no dispute about the status of Oklahoma. That has all been paid for. The dispute is about 150,000 acres of land which were included in an unjust survey made by the United States. This matter does not affect the status of Oklahoma at all.

Gentlemen say there is no law for the payment of this money. Why, sir, here is the treaty of 1866, by which we bought this land at 30 cents per acre. We were to run a line north and south. We did so until, running south, we reached a certain point, and then we diverged so as to cheat the Indians out of 150,000 acres. After eighteen years we acknowledge our error and pay the principal. But the treaty carries a provision for interest, which it is now proposed to pay. Yet gentlemen say there is no law for it. If ever the Government of the United States owed a just debt, it owes this debt to the Creek Indians; and never do I want to hear a member of the American Congress cast one slur upon any weak and unfortunate State that has repudiated a portion of its obligations so long as our archives show the utter repudiation of the obligations of the Government, the shameless violation of its plighted faith to these wards of the Republic.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I desire unanimous consent to insert an additional clause in the amendment just adopted. I take it to be essential that in the ratification of this treaty these Indians proceed in pursuance of an act of their national council. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment as adopted by inserting after the word "months" the words "and in pursuance of a resolution of its national council first had and obtained."

Mr. KEIFER. I think that is right.

Mr. ELLIS. There is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to modifying in the manner now proposed the amendment already adopted? The Chair hears none; and the amendment will be modified accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] thinks this claim to $45,000 is without foundation, and that really is the question to be considered. It is admitted by running this line more eastwardly than was contemplated by the treaty the Government acquired 151,000 acres of land, for which it ought to pay at the rate of 30 cents per acre under the terms of the treaty if the new line was approved by the United States and the tribe; and it is proposed to pay the tribe interest at 5 per cent. per annum on the price of the land at 30 cents per acre, amounting to something over $45,000, the interest on the $45,000 to be computed at the rate of 5 per cent. for eighteen years, that is, from 1866. The survey was not made in 1866, but I am not able to say how much later. The Government did not acquire the ownership of this strip of land in any form in 1866. It did not acquire it when the survey was made. The basis of the Government title rests entirely upon the act of the last Congress appropriating $45,561 to pay for the lands. The Indians accepted the money, and there is the basis of our title.

Mr. KEIFER. What does the gentleman do with the treaty of 1866.

Mr. HOLMAN. It provides for a definite line dividing the tract in equal parts, and the amount which would be given to the United States by that line, as has been stated, has been provided for and secured to the tribe to the extent of every dollar. I do not say paid, but provided for. This is for other lands and the 151,000 acres. We did not acquire those lands until the survey was made and until we voted the money to pay for them. That was only last year. Until that time we had no title to this 151,000 acres of land. We had no right of occupation to the land. The Indians had not acquiesced in it, and Congress had not acquiesced in the line run until we appropriated that $45,000 for the land and the Indians accepted the money. There is its title, and there is its origin, to the 151,000 acres, and yet it is proposed to pay interest on that sum of money as though we had acquired the land eighteen years ago. I object to that view as clearly untenable.

Mr. KEIFER. Was not the land acquired at the time of the ratification of the treaty?

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly, and taken possession of.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not. By the treaty we acquired the half of the lands of the tribe and no more. This survey was not made until after that treaty was ratified and the line by which we acquire the additional 151,000 acres was not surveyed in conformity with the treaty; if it had, no question could have arisen; but the line was run farther east, giving us the additional 151,000 acres.

Mr. KEIFER. But we certainly put Sac and Fox Indians there. We sold it to them before we surveyed it.

Mr. HOLMAN. We provided by the eighth article of the treaty that an accurate survey should be made of that line. The survey was afterward made, and was not in conformity with the treaty. The subject was brought to the attention of Congress, and we appropriated the money to pay for the land, and the Indians received it. Will you tell me on what basis any claim for interest rests?

Mr. KEIFER and Mr. RYAN rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. Excuse me for a moment. It has been said the act we passed appropriating $45,000 contemplated the payment of interest. On the contrary, the concluding words of that law are "in full payment for said lands."

Mr. KEIFER. That is what we said, but the Indinas did not have anything to say about it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Until then we did not acquire the lands. What title have we acquired until the Indians accepted the money and thus recognized the line established by the survey which gave us the increased amount of land?

Mr. KEIFER. We sold it and got the money for a good portion of it.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman inform the House when the Government located the Sac and Fox Indians on these lands?

Mr. HOLMAN. It located them on the land many years ago, but after the treaty of 1866; the Government, I think, did not locate them on the land between the true line and the line actually run. It located them on the land ceded to the United States by the Creek Nation, as they had the right to do; but I am not certain as to the time or manner of their location.

Mr. RYAN. They located the Sac and Fox Indians on these lands before the survey was made.

Mr. HOLMAN. On this specific strip?

Mr. RYAN. Yes; on the lands embraced in this specific strip.

Mr. ELLIS. In 1866 they took possession of it and settled these Indians on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. BURNES'S motion to strike out the paragraph was disagreed to.

Mr. PEEL. I offer an amendment to this clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 15, after line 353:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States pay to the treasury of that part of the Cherokees known and denominated as the Old Settler or Western Cherokees the sum of $660.80, together with 5 per cent. interest from the 12th of June, 1838; it being the balance now in the Treasury of the appropriation of $887,480.15, made to them by act of Congress September 30, 1850."

Mr. PEEL. I ask the Clerk to read the report which I have made in respect to this matter to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and which was referred by that committee to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. PEEL), as follows:

The committee find that on September 30, 1850, Congress appropriated to pay to that part of the Cherokee Indians known as the "Old Settler" or "Western Cherokees," in compliance with treaty stipulations, the sum of $532,896.90, with interest thereon from June 12, 1838, until said amount should be paid, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum (9 Stat., page 556).

That the payment of that sum, with the interest thereon as aforesaid, was made on September 22, 1851, and the whole amount to be thus disbursed was the sum of $887,480.15.

It appears that the disbursement was made by John Drenan, as superintendent of Indian affairs. The Second Auditor of the Treasury, by his letter to J. M. Bryan, commissioner of the "Old Settler" or "Western Cherokee" Indians, dated June 27, 1882, states that of the sum thus appropriated there was remaining in the hands of said John Drenan as such superintendent, upon the settlement of his accounts as such disbursing officer, the sum of $660.80, which was not paid to said Indians; that said Drenan turned said balance over to Thomas S. Drew, also superintendent of Indian affairs, and that the said Drew failed to either pay the same to said Indians or to account therefor and pay the same into the Treasury of the United States. The Second Auditor states that upon the failure of Superintendent Drew to account for said balance suit was instituted against him to recover the amount of said balance, and the sum of only $449.30 was collected from him, which seems now found to be in the Treasury.

The committee are satisfied that there was withheld from these Indians of that appropriation, by the agents of the United States, the sum of $660.80, which ought to have been paid to them at the time the other disbursement was made, namely, on 22d day of September, 1851. That that sum, with interest thereon from September 22, 1851, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum until the same shall be paid, is now due to these Indians. Therefore, the committee report the memorial back to the House with the recommendation that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations for the necessary appropriation to pay the said balance and interest as above stated, amounting to $——.

Mr. PEEL. I ask that the memorial appended to the report be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The memorial is as follows:

MEMORIAL OF THE "OLD SETTLER" OR "WESTERN CHEROKEE" INDIANS.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist, J. M. Bryan, as the commissioner and agent of the "Old Settler" or "Western Cherokee" Indians, for and in behalf of said Indians, respectfully represents unto your honorable bodies that there is now due to said Indians, from the United States, the sum of $660.80, together with interest on said sum from September 22, 1851, until the same shall be paid, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, the same being a balance not disbursed of the appropriation of $532,896.90, made by act of Congress approved September 30, 1850, to be paid to said Indians in compliance with the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Nation of Indians in the year of 1846.

Your petitioner further represents that the circumstances under which this claim arose are as follows: After the above-mentioned appropriation was made, one John Drenan, a superintendent of said Indians, was authorized and directed by the Department of the Interior to disburse or pay the same to the said Indians, as prescribed in and by said treaty, and for that purpose the amount of money necessary therefor was placed in his hands by the proper authorities of the United States; that he, on or about September, 1851, disbursed said amount, except the sum of $660.80 aforesaid, being the balance aforesaid, and for which, together with interest as aforesaid, this claim is made.

That the said John Drenan, after making the disbursements aforesaid, and in the month of May, 1853, turned over to one Thomas S. Drew, another superintendent of said Indians, the said balance of $660.80, and that the said Drew failed and neglected to disburse said balance, or any part thereof, to said Indians, or account therefor to the United States. That, to recover said balance, the United States instituted suit against him, upon which a recovery was had, and upon the judgment the sum of $449.30 only was collected, as will more fully appear by reference to a letter of Hon. O. Ferriss, the Second Auditor of the Treasury, hereto attached as Exhibit A.

Your petitioner further represents that said Indians have repeatedly applied to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and requested the payment of said balance with the interest thereon, as aforesaid, but without avail.

Wherefore your petitioner, for and on behalf of said Indians, prays your honorable bodies to authorize and direct the payment of the said balance and interest, and to make the necessary appropriation therefor, and to direct the payment of the same to said Indians may be made by the proper officer of the United States in such manner as the said Indians by their counsel have or may request. As in duty bound he will ever pray.

J. M. BRYAN,
Commissioner and Agent of the "Old Settler" or "Western Cherokee" Indians.

Mr. PEEL. This sum, Mr. Chairman, $660.80, is the balance of that appropriation of $887,000 made in 1851. The law appropriating that sum to the payment of these Indians required that it should be distributed among them per capita. By reason of that requirement of law in making the distribution of the fund this small balance was not paid by the commissioner appointed for that purpose. The change could not be made, and this sum was left over. It can not be paid to them per capita under the terms of that law, because the amount is so small. There is no question that it belongs to the Cherokees, and is now in the Treasury as a part of the fund appropriated to them. If paid, however, under the terms of that law it would require a new census of the nation. This simply provides that it shall be paid into their treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Arkansas this question, whether or not, from his examination of the subject, the Committee on Indian Affairs find this to be the total amount due with reference to the claims set up by the Cherokees which accrued prior to 1851?

Mr. ELLIS. Let me ask the gentleman if this is based upon treaty stipulations?

Mr. PEEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELLIS. Did not that treaty require that it should be paid per capita?

Mr. PEEL. No, sir; that was a provision in the act of Congress.

Mr. ELLIS. This, then, is an addition to the treaty?

Mr. PEEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELLIS. Then I make the point of order against it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point comes too late.

Mr. PEEL. I will state to the gentleman that the act of Congress appropriating $887,000 was a provision of law to pay the amount found due to them by the Senate in 1851—the amount found due to the old settlers, which we are discussing here now.

Mr. ELLIS. I make the point of order upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is too late to make the point of order now.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not think it is. I submit the point to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair). The present occupant of the chair is not informed as to the exact condition of this amendment. As the Chair understands it, the amendment was offered by the gentleman from Arkansas, and he proceeded to make an argument in support of it. The report which has been read by the Clerk was read as part of his remarks. The Chair thinks it is now too late to make the point of order.

Mr. ELLIS. Very well. [Cries of "Question!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether or not, upon his examination of the subject, it would be proper to add the following:

In full of any balance due to said Indians prior to that date.

Mr. PEEL. I see no objection to that.

Mr. ELLIS. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. RYAN. That will not do at all.

Mr. ELLIS. I shall oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and reserve the point of order upon that portion of it.

Mr. RYAN. As I understand it, the gentleman from Arkansas makes the motion to pay the balance due to the Western Cherokees. The Western Cherokees are but a small portion of the Cherokee Nation. It is what is called "the old settlers' claim." The old settlers who get the benefit of this particular claim are, I repeat, but a small portion of the nation; and now if you add the amendment suggested by my friend from Indiana, you preclude the rest of the nation from asserting a claim they have pending here also. It would be grossly unjust. The nation has a claim pending here for something like $300,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. But my friend says that claim has no foundation whatever.

Mr. ELLIS. In that he differs from the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the sworn commissioner who investigated the claim.

Mr. RYAN. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that the same authority which determined that the old settlers are entitled to their claim here has also determined that the nation is entitled to the claim which it has presented; and if one is unjust it is altogether likely that the other is. I do not mean, however, to be understood as saying that the old settlers' claim is unjust.

Mr. PEEL. I think I can explain this satisfactorily in a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana submit his amendment in writing?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the gentleman wishes to be heard on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. PEEL. I wish to be heard for a moment.

This amendment simply includes the balance of the appropriation of 1851. That appropriation was found to be all that was due to the Old Settler or Western Band of Cherokees growing out of the treaties of 1835 and 1846. When that settlement was made in 1850 by the Senate this sum of $887,000 and over was appropriated and paid. It was all paid excepting this balance to which I now refer. This part of it remains in the Treasury and can not be disbursed, because it would require the distribution to be made per capita, as I have said. The superintendent who disbursed the money could not make the exact change, and hence this balance remains on hand, amounting to $660. It has been in the Treasury ever since, and can not be paid out now without a new census was taken. The reason it can not be paid per capita is that it does not amount to 5 cents apiece to each member of that band.

Mr. RYAN. What is the amount?

Mr. PEEL. Six hundred and sixty dollars and eighty cents.

Mr. RYAN. That is not the claim I had in view. I think this claim is just.

Mr. ELLIS. I withdraw my objection.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. PEEL, it was adopted.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

KANSAS.

For interest, in lieu of investment, on $200,000, at 5 per cent. per annum, per second article of treaty of January 14, 1846, $10,000.

Mr. ELLIS. Under instructions of the Committee on Appropriations I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 405 insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to apply the net proceeds arising from the sales of Kansas Indian lands, in the State of Kansas, now in the Treasury, and such as shall from time to time be in the Treasury, to the credit of the Kansas tribe of Indians, to the payment of all of the present indebtedness of said tribe, principal and interest, represented by the certificates issued in the years 1862 and 1863, and known as Kaw or Kansas Indian scrip; said payment to be made as follows: He shall, ninety days after the approval of this act, apply $67,386.89, being the net proceeds on hand March 27, 1884, together with such sum as may have accrued since said date, in pro rata payment, principal and interest, of all such scrip certificates aforesaid as shall be filed in the Department of the Interior on or before the said ninetieth day after the approval of this act, and of the genuineness of which he shall be satisfied; and thereafter whenever the proceeds, after the deduction of the expenses of the sale of said lands, shall equal the sum of $10,000, the Secretary of the Interior shall pay said sum, together with any excess thereof, upon such certificates as aforesaid as shall be on file at the Department of the Interior on the date of such payment and for thirty days thereto preceding, and shall continue so to pay until the indebtedness of said tribe represented by said scrip certificates, with the interest thereon, shall be fully liquidated, or until the entire net proceeds of the sale of said lands, that are now on hand or that may hereafter be acquired, shall be exhausted: Provided, That not exceeding 5 per cent. interest per annum shall be allowed on any of such scrip."

Mr. ELLIS. If the committee desire an explanation I am ready to give it. Perhaps it may be as well that I should give it.

In 1859 the Kaws in Kansas had more land than they desired. By a treaty of 1860 they agreed to move to what is known as the diminished reservation in Kansas. It was furthermore agreed that the proceeds of the surplus lands should be sold and applied to purposes of their comfort and civilization. In 1862 some parties were employed, one of them now an honored member of this House, Mr. STEVENS, of New York, to build houses for these people and to do work and labor for their civilization. In accordance with the terms of the treaty of 1860, that work was done. There was no money to pay for the work done. Under a provision of that treaty the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to issue this scrip, which he did to Mr. STEVENS and others to the amount, I believe, of about $76,000. This has remained unpaid up to this day. It was to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the surplus lands of the Kaw Indians.

By the report of the Commissioner of the Land Office there was on the 27th March, 1884, $67,386.89 of the proceeds of this land upon which this scrip bears a lien, to pay which it is devoted.

The committee recommend that the proceeds of this land—the money on hand in the Treasury—be applied to the payment of this scrip. They have changed the interest on the scrip from 6 per cent. to 5 per cent., so as to make it the same rate of interest as the settlers are paying on the lands. It is right and ought to be paid.

The amendment offered by Mr. ELLIS was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to pay to Dennis Sheedy the sum of $4,658, and to B. J. Everett $3,550, out of treaty funds herein appropriated for the Northern Cheyenne Indians; the same being claims for damages caused by depredations of said Indians, and examined, approved, and reported to Congress by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to offer an amendment, to insert after the words "Cheyenne Indians," in line 495, the words "to be carried to the surplus fund;" and to strike out the words "out of treaty funds herein appropriated." That is the suggestion of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that this be carried to the surplus fund.

Mr. ELLIS. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

OMAHAS.

For third of twelve installments, being last series, in money or otherwise, per fourth article treaty of March 16, 1854, $10,000.

Mr. ELLIS. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 503 insert as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of the Interior to appraise and sell, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to provide for the sale of a part of the reservation of the Omaha tribe of Indians in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes,' approved August 7, 1882, that portion of said reservation in township 24, range 7 east, remaining unallotted on the 1st day of June, 1885, $1,000; said sum to be reimbursed from the fund received from the sale of said lands: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may in his discretion and with the consent of the Indians extend the time of payment for lands as fixed by section 2 of said act, so that one-third of the purchase-money shall become due and payable in two years from the date when the land shall be or has been thrown open to settlement, together with one year's interest on the amount of the first installment, to be paid when entry is made, and the second installment of one-third shall become due and payable in one year, and the remaining one-third in two years from date of first payment, with interest as provided in said act. And in case of default in either of said payments or interest thereon the person thus defaulting for a period of sixty days shall forfeit absolutely his right to the tract which he has purchased and any payment or payments he may have made: Provided, further, That also with the consent of the Indians the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause to be appraised and sold to the highest bidder, under such regulations and upon such terms as to payment as he may deem to be most advantageous to the said Indians, that part or parcel of said reservation described as follows: All that portion of the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 27 and the west half of the northwest quarter of section 26, in township 25, range 6 east, lying east of the Sioux City and Nebraska Railroad, containing about fifty acres, more or less, conditioned, however, that the purchaser thereof shall erect, operate, and maintain a flouring mill thereon."

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask whether or not this amendment is subject to points of order. If so, I desire to reserve them until we have an explanation of it.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, the hour has arrived that has been fixed by the House for the consideration of the resolutions in relation to the death of Hon. HENRY B. ANTHONY, late a Senator from Rhode Island. I therefore move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WELLBORN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7970) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1017) relative to the Inspector-General's Department of the Army; and

A bill (H. R. 7768) to authorize the National Bank of Bloomington, Ill., to change its name to the First National Bank of Bloomington.

DEATH OF THE LATE SENATOR ANTHONY.

The SPEAKER. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the House the resolutions of the Senate in relation to the death of the late Senator ANTHONY.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, January 19, 1885.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of HENRY B. ANTHONY, late a Senator from the State of Rhode Island.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute of regard to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has received with deep sorrow the official announcement of the death of HENRY BOWEN ANTHONY, late United States Senator from the State of Rhode Island.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be afforded to give expression of our sense of his personal worth, of his public services, and of the loss which the country and his native State have sustained.

Resolved, That at the conclusion of these tributes to his memory the House shall stand adjourned.

Mr. CHACE. Again Rhode Island is called to mourn the loss of a distinguished son. A second time in my brief career in this House it becomes my duty to pay the last tribute of respect to the memory of one of her Senators. Again we are reminded how swiftly glide these lives of ours; that the dreams of hope are but shadows; that the honors for which we clutch must wither in our hand; that the cares, the joys, the fears of life alike soon find an end. It is well for us to pause for a brief season and look back.

When, in the closing days of 1859, the Senate of the Thirty-sixth Congress met, the two sides of that Chamber more nearly resembled the representatives of two hostile countries than an ordinary legislative body, met to calmly discuss questions of common interest. All of those wonderful intellectual giants, the product of the primitive days of the Republic, had passed off the stage of action. Clay, full of years, but weary and worn with compromise, had sunk to rest with only anxious hope, and was reposing at his own beautiful Ashland; the ashes of Calhoun were mingling with the soil of his native Carolina; Webster, almost heartbroken and full of forebodings for the future of the Union, had been laid in the simple tomb at Marshfield, where the ocean which he loved so well might sing his solemn dirge through the coming ages. The gathering storm which these men had vainly sought to avert was darkly impending over the nation. All the great economic questions were swallowed up in this one absorbing topic.

Among those who entered that Senate and took sides with the defenders of freedom was HENRY B. ANTHONY, of Rhode Island. In the prime of life, at 45 years of age, inheriting from a long line of virtuous ancestry a constitution of wonderful strength and vigor; of singular beauty, both of person and of feature, with a commanding presence, highly educated, cultivated in his manners, with a rare grace and urbanity, and a charming felicity in social intercourse, he at once became a favorite, even in those days of intense partisanship, with members of both sides of the Senate. Possessed of intellectual gifts of the very highest order, thoroughly furnished as he was by the peculiar training which a long career of journalism had given him, he was fitted to take a high position in the councils of the nation.

Possessed of a peculiarly well-balanced mind, his caution and prudence often restrained him from labored efforts of oratory and from participating in the excitements of clashing debate. In all the legislative history of the country but few men have introduced measures of great and far-reaching importance. The qualities that dazzle and captivate the popular mind are not always those which are of most value. As in nature, so in the operation of paliamentary bodies, we find the silent forces are often the most potent. It is by patient toil and careful prevision in committee that the public interests are guarded and promoted. This was the peculiar field of usefulness to which our lamented friend bent his attention. On the floor of the Senate he was alert, attentive, and careful, and when occasion required, quick to penetrate the armor of error, to expose its purpose, or to defend those measures for which the public weal called.

He did not speak often, but when his voice was heard it commanded attention. His speeches, always bearing evidence of great learning and research, were couched in the purest and most polished English. His intellect was broad and vigorous, with wit as keen and incisive as a Damascus blade, that would have been a dangerous weapon with one less gentle, for he was as kind and loving as a woman.

In all the long list of names borne on the Senate roll two men only have been elected to five consecutive terms—Thomas H. Benton and HENRY B. ANTHONY. And yet, although serving so long, much of the time during the most stormy period of our parliamentary history, no man of all that throng of fellow-Senators could say that he had just cause of offense toward him, and with rare exceptions all were his friends.

Serving at a time when from the necessities of the Government growing out of the war money was poured out like water, when in the mad fever of speculation and grasping for sudden wealth through Government contracts reputations went down like soldiers in battle, he came out unscathed, not a breath of suspicion resting upon him. Holding the most pronounced views on all the questions which agitated the public mind like a seething cauldron during the period before and after the war, though abating nothing, he retained the friendship of his most earnest opponents. Knowing the weakness of indecision, he reached forward for political truth with a firm hand and still preserved a strong balance of conservatism.

Deeply learned in the foundation principles of our Government, and as deeply skilled in the use of language, he sometimes presented those principles with wonderful effect.

He was twice elected governor of Rhode Island and twice President of the United States Senate. But long and honorable and useful as have been his services in the Senate, it is as a faithful son of Rhode Island that the citizens of that State will most cherish his memory. Born in the town of Coventry of a Quaker family whose ancestors had dwelt there from the days of its earliest settlement, spending his youth among the hills of his native State, educated in her schools and at her university, putting forth the first labors of his early manhood as well as the more brilliant efforts of his maturer years in defense of her constitution, he loved her as a man loves his mother.

He was, indeed, a part of Rhode Island. He believed her constitution to be the most perfect instrument of the kind ever drawn by the hand of man, and his defense of it is unanswerable. His name and his fame is linked with Rhode Island and her happily constituted system. There, as a journalist, he attained a most distinguished position, building up, from small beginnings, one of the most influential and useful journals in New England; earning, by the purity of his diction, clearness and conciseness of style and felicity of expression, a high reputation. Honored and trusted by her people, he honored them by the faithfulness of his services.

I have known Senator ANTHONY from my youth up—known him as did all, to respect, to admire, to love him. In every sphere, in all circles, under all circumstances, wherever he went, his progress was a constant conquest of friendship, and friends once won, he "grappled them to his soul with hoops of steel."

How many who commenced the race of life with him have fallen by the way while he passed on. The friends of his youth died and he found others.

During his service in the Senate he saw the shackles stricken from 4,000,000 slaves, the deed of manumission written in the blood of 300,000 men; the Union, tottering to its foundation, purified and restored, the dream of the fathers that this land should be consecrated to liberty realized. During his term he saw men rise to distinction in both Houses of Congress and pronounced their eulogies. As Senator, he saw Lincoln inaugurated; held up his hands during the vigils of those weary four years of war, and saw him buried, mourned alike by friend and foe. Saw Garfield rise from obscurity to distinction in the forum, the field, and in this House—elected Senator, made President, and laid in his grave on the shores of Lake Erie. Grant's wonderful career from the store in Galena to his triumphant progress around the world was but an episode.

Of his hopes for the future life I can not speak. He rarely spoke of it to me.

As life is ordinarily viewed, it may be said that his was a success; but if we could go with him through the long journey, full rounded up to near three-score and ten, we might not maintain our estimate of what is human success. He had hosts of friends and few enemies; was honored as but few men have been; but with all he carried for many years a great sorrow. The wife of his youth, beautiful and accomplished, was early stricken down, and ever after he continued alone the journey of life. He realized, as all must, that—

> All pomp was but a name;
> That gold and silver were not life and joy;
> That what to-day bestowed of love or fame,
> To-morrow's breath would wither and destroy.

He realized, as do all who grapple with great public questions, of how much too little avail are our best endeavors to establish justice, to put an end to inequality, or to satisfy those less favored. He saw how empty a thing is honor, what a dream is life itself, and how decay and death follow quickly after youth and strength, as cloud-shadows chase the sunshine on the mountain-side. Occupying as he did for many years so distinguished a position, he realized that—

> He who ascends the mountain tops shall find
> Its loftiest peaks most wrapped in clouds and snow;
> He who surpasses or subdues mankind
> Must look down on the hate of those below;
> Though far above the sun of glory glow,
> And far beneath the earth and ocean spread,
> Round him are icy rocks, and loudly blow
> Contending tempests on his naked head,
> And thus reward the toils which to those summits led.

With him "life's vain parade is over." But though "he walked with throngs of good friends, now at last he is called to pass alone the dread portals of death."

He will long be remembered by his associates here for the radiance of his genial presence, for his careful attention to every detail of legislative duty, for the warmth of his friendship, and the absence of partisan rancor. In his native State his memory will be cherished by young and old for his gentleness, his dignity, his faithfulness to trust, for his long and useful services.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I address the House not because I believe I can add anything of value to what others will say of the character and labors of the late Senator ANTHONY, but because the sweet memories of an unclouded friendship which extended through a quarter of a century and endured the friction of personal, political, and official relations impel me to offer a tribute, however unworthy of its subject it may prove to be.

HENRY B. ANTHONY entered upon the duties of Senator from the State of Rhode Island in December, 1859, at the opening of the Thirty-sixth Congress, and I entered fully upon my duties as Representative from the fourth district of Pennsylvania on the 4th of July, 1861, when the two Houses, in obedience to the proclamation of President Lincoln, met "to consider and determine such measures as in their wisdom the public safety and interest may seem to demand."

The times were disjointed before the elections of 1860 were held. The controlling spirits of the South having determined to submit the interpretation of the Constitution to the arbitrament of war, the Senators from that section of the country withdrew from the Senate, and those who had been looked to to represent the people in the House of Representatives declined to accept Congressional nominations and refused to recognize the Thirty-seventh Congress as a body whose enactments would be binding on them in law or conscience. The situation produced by this action was novel and portentous. In matters of gravest import and responsibility the Executive must act without the aid of precedent or tradition, and the President and his Cabinet naturally sought counsel from the recently chosen representatives of the loyal people. It thus came to pass that gentlemen elected to the Thirty-seventh Congress, who, under ordinary circumstances would probably not have met until the month of December, became habitués of the capital and co-workers from the 4th of March, between which date and the organization of Congress I frequently met Senator ANTHONY in such social intercourse as the already disturbed condition of Washington would permit, and in consultation with the President, heads of Departments, Senators, and members-elect of the House of Representatives.

Though a man of broad and varied information and profound convictions he preferred no claim to leadership, and superficial observers more readily regarded him as a devotee to society than as an earnest man of affairs. He was in the vigor of mature manhood, and I recall with pleasure the sweet smile that wreathed his handsome face upon the slightest provocative to mirth. Within an irreverent but limited circle of acquaintances he was called "the rosebud Senator," which sobriquet might have been bestowed as a tribute to the healthful glow which mantled his cheek or from the fact that in those days when boutonnières were in less common use than now he constantly wore a bud or other choice flower.

He had none of the impetuosity or burning enthusiasm of Senators Wade, of Ohio, and Chandler, of Michigan, or of the intense devotion to the advanced opinions, approved by his judgment, which characterized my great colleague Thaddeus Stevens; yet he was the trusted counselor of his more impulsive fellow-Senators, and his fidelity to the convictions which sustained the Republican party and impelled its advance from point to point in the cause of personal freedom until American slavery had perished was never doubted by that imperious and exacting party leader, the great commoner of Pennsylvania.

The means of communication between the capital and remote sections of the Republic were, in comparison with those of to-day, very restricted, and the President could not with propriety name an earlier day than the 4th of July for the assembling of Congress. But that the armed forces of the improvised confederacy should be prevented from invading the capital or any of the loyal States, he had upon his own authority put 75,000 men into the field to which the United States had been challenged. When, on the designated day, Congress had assembled, the President in his message expressed the estimate of the executive department of the Government as to the draft the rebellion would make upon the resources of the Republic. In suggesting the number of men and the amount of means he hoped Congress would provide he said, "It is now recommended that you give the legal means for making this contest a short and decisive one; that you place at the control of the Government for the work at least 400,000 men and $400,000,000."

From that day until Grant had restored to Lee his sword, the surrender of which had symbolized the defeat of the confederate army and the collapse of the pretended government which had called it into existence, until the work of reconstruction had been completed, so far as legislation could promote its completion, the opinions of Senator ANTHONY were sought and weighed by the Executive and those legislators who from their greater prominence in the proceedings of Congress were popularly regarded as the men who were shaping the destinies of our country. His judgment was rarely or never at fault. He seemed to comprehend every question as it arose, whether it was a measure to provide men and means for successful warfare; or to establish a system of finance which should, without embarrassing the productive interests of the country, enable the Government to furnish the Army and Navy with the amplest munitions of war; or to restore to the position in the Union they had sought to abandon the impoverished and decimated States of the South; or to reduce our revenues without impairing the public credit by the repeal of many of the taxes which had been adopted as a war measure, and which bore, as all internal or excise taxes must bear, specially upon the producing classes.

Caution is the parent of prudence, and caution was a marked characteristic of Senater ANTHONY. While appreciating the greatness of the duties before the Government, he would delay, if not postpone indefinitely, the adoption as a policy of any measure or set of measures that seemed to involve the possibility of encouraging the enemies of the Government by the abandonment of a declared purpose. It was this characteristic which, above all others, secured him the supreme confidence of President Lincoln, whose caution is now seen to have been as efficient in bringing the war to a successful close as were the skill and courage of the most brilliant of our soldiers.

But I am trespassing upon the time of the House, my object in addressing which was, as I have said, to simply lay a humble tribute on the bier of a long-cherished friend.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I should hardly have felt justified in occupying a moment on this occasion except for the fact that I am one of the few members of this House who served in the other with the deceased Senator ANTHONY.

My acquaintance with him commenced with the opening of the Thirty-ninth Congress, the first Congress after the close of the great war. The ten years which followed were as trying and difficult to the men engaged in the administration of public affairs as any in our history. The questions as to how the seceding States were to be restored to their proper places in the Union, how peace and harmony were to be again restored, and the whole country again united after the fearful disruption, and the financial question of how to provide for the immense indebtedness, were all new and difficult, and might well appall and distract the wisest statesman. The proper settlement of some of these questions was embarrassed and complicated by the bitterness and acrimony naturally engendered by the losses and sufferings caused by the war.

Having been in Congress myself during the ten years succeeding the war, I feel justified in saying that Senator ANTHONY bore a much more important part and exercised a much greater influence in the proper settlement of all these great questions than he was generally credited with in the country. He made no pretension to oratory, and did not mingle largely in general debate. But his associates soon learned his value, the breadth and solidity of his judgment, his extended and accurate knowledge upon all public questions, and he exercised the influence accorded to a wise and sagacious man. While the war was waging he gave most earnest and vigorous effort to make it successful. When it was over, he ranked among those who desired in settling and adjusting the questions growing out of it to show all possible kindness and magnanimity.

The Senator was exceedingly ready and adroit in practical suggestions to meet and avoid difficulties which arose in the routine of legislative business.

I may be pardoned for relating an instance when he relieved me from a great embarrassment. Members who were here from 1865 to 1875 will remember that during that period the great work of revising the national statutes was begun and completed. I was chairman of the committee on the revision in the House and had the general charge of the matter before Congress. The revision as reported by the commissioners to Congress was printed on large paper, in coarse type, like ordinary bills, making a very large bulk. The amendments proposed by the committee and adopted by the House numbered many hundreds.

The rules of the House required the whole bill and all the amendments to be engrossed on paper by the Clerk before being sent to the Senate. As this would consume a great deal of time, the House, upon my application, suspended this rule, and allowed the bill to be engrossed by incorporating the amendments into one of the printed copies of the bill, by interlining, writing on the margin, or pasting on such amendments as were too long to be written in. In this form the revision was sent to and passed by the Senate. The joint rule of the two Houses requires that a bill passed by both Houses shall be engrossed on parchment to be sent to the President. This would require a great amount of time, and the end of the session was approaching. The House thereupon passed a joint resolution to suspend the joint rule for the engrossment on parchment, and authorized another copy to be prepared as before to be sent to the President. This joint resolution came back from the Senate disagreed to. Senator Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, a most excellent gentleman, but who tolerated no innovation upon established usages and ancient ways, led the opposition, and was horrified at the notion of sending such a patched bundle to the President to be preserved in the solemn archives of the State Department. The House asked a conference. I was one on the part of the House, Senator Davis one from the Senate, and he stood for a parchment engrossment of the whole Revised Statutes. I was in a great dilemma. I had given years of work to it and had obtained its passage through Congress, but it was likely to fail because I could not get it to the President for his signature. Fortunately Senator ANTHONY was one of the Senate conferees, and he proposed that the whole be reprinted and send it to the President in that form. I supposed that would take too long, but the Congressional Printer was sent for, who said it could be done in a week, and thereupon Senator ANTHONY'S proposition was reported by the conference and adopted. I think I ought to finish this story by saying that the whole work was set up and printed at the Government Printing Office in three days and brought to me on the morning of the fourth day in a handsomely bound volume, which I still keep as the earliest edition of that work.

He was utterly without ostentation. He disliked all show and parade. His manners and habits were of the plainest and simplest character. One of the pleasantest recollections of my life is of a somewhat protracted visit I made him in his plain, quiet, quaint old home in the city of Providence. He was a thorough scholar and a clear and forcible writer. His long connection with the public press, his ability as a writer, and the fairness and candor with which he discussed public questions enabled him to do much in shaping the public judgment of the country during the eventful years of his manhood.

But the crowning glory of our deceased friend was the perfect kindness and amiability of his character. His heart warmed to all men. Perhaps he had enemies, but I never heard of one. His culture and his character seemed to combine in some of his literary composition. On some occasions of this kind, when called upon to pay tribute to the memory of a deceased friend or colleague, his efforts have equaled in tenderness of thought and beauty of expression anything I have ever heard or read. I have known no man whose whole life was more charming. All his words and deeds, both public and private, seemed imbued with the spirit of the holy evangel, "On earth peace, good will toward men."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, it may be presumptuous on my part to rise on the floor of this House to attempt to deliver a eulogy on the late Senator ANTHONY, but being beloved by the people of my State as much as he was in his own, and particularly so by the people of my district, I feel it my duty in their behalf to say a few words.

Mr. Speaker, so closely allied are the neighboring States of Rhode Island and Massachusetts in martial renown, in commercial interests, and in social ties, that I feel it to be my duty, as it is my pleasure, to cast my humble tribute on the grave of HENRY BOWEN ANTHONY. We knew him well in Massachusetts as the editor of the Providence Journal, which has a large circulation in the southeastern portion of our State; we respected him as the governor of our sister State, proud of her history and a stalwart defender of her institutions; we honored him as a Senator who represented the smallest of States, but whose noble intellect and patriotic heart covered the length and breadth of our great Union; and we loved him as an honorable gentleman, without fear and without reproach, who has during the last quarter of a century played important political and social parts in the great drama of life performed on this busy Washington stage.

Others have eloquently narrated the successive events of his life. My own personal acquaintance with him in this Capitol was mainly concerning those matters which had been referred to the Naval Committees of the Senate and the House, of which we were respectively members. He having served on the Naval Committee of the Senate from 1863 until his death continuously (and having again and again declined its chairmanship because he preferred to remain chairman of the Committee on Printing), he was well acquainted with the condition and the needs of our gallant Navy, its officers, its navy-yards, its academy and school. Officers of merit, with untarnished records, found in him a friend and an advocate. He was, however, sternly opposed to the retention on the quarter-deck of those whose known indulgency rendered them at times unfit to command without jeopardizing the safety of the vessels and the men under their command.

Intercourse with Senator ANTHONY on public and private business was at all times attractive and acceptable. Few members of Congress have retained during twenty-five years of continuous service, amid the labors, the intrigues, and the conflicts of political life, so many of the sterling, manly qualities which are here destroyed.

His character as a statesman, as a citizen, and as a friend were so truly and so lovingly portrayed at his funeral by Rev. Augustus Woodbury, his religious adviser and the chaplain of his deceased associate, General Burnside, that I annex the funeral discourse to these remarks.

When Senator ANTHONY was here last winter the stamp of illness was on his features, but he had the same ease and grace of manner and conversation which had so endeared him to his friends when he was in health, and he spoke of his bodily troubles with calm composure. Before the summer months had ended he had gone to his rest, surrounded by his relatives and friends, with the beauty of the setting sun, after having lived out what the psalmist calls "the days of our age," adorned with the richest virtues of the heart. He has gone, full of years and honors, to meet the experiences of another world. Nothing is left but sweet remembrances of his purity of character, his generosity and liberality of spirit, his proud and noble manhood.

Immortality o'ersweeps
All pains, all tears, all time, all fears, and peals
Like the eternal thunders of the deep
Into our ears this truth, He lives forever.

REV. MR. WOODBURY'S DISCOURSE.

The silent and secret forces of insidious disease are among those mysterious elements of our physical being which seem to baffle human skill. The physician faithfully studies the problem, but can only approximate its solution. Death by slow degrees saps the foundation, and in due time overthrows the structure of life. Nature gradually succumbs; the inevitable hour approaches with sure steps; the organs of the body cease to discharge their functions; the eyes look their last upon the faces of dear friends; the spirit exhales, and there is nothing left but the rigid form, soon to change to dust and ashes. When death comes suddenly, we who remain are stunned by the shock, and can not make real to our hearts and minds the departure of our friend from the scenes in which he was a familiar object of our affection and regard. But, in the progress of long-continued sickness, we sadly watch and wait, in the anxiety of a protracted suspense, the fond eye of love catching the glimpse of every favorable symptom, hoping against hope, or noting, with quick and sympathetic recognition, the gradual failure of the physical powers, till the fatal change comes and leaves the heart bereaved.

All this we say is the Providential ordering, and we submit to the decrees of that Almighty Power which joins with its action the designs of infinite wisdom and the exercise of infinite love. To the sufferer himself who is obliged to feel that death can not be averted, although its coming may be somewhat delayed, the experience is not without its compensations. Human intelligence can not devise a remedy, but divine Providence furnishes an alleviation in the training of character. Patience, courage, trust, obedience, are cultivated in the soul. "Not as I will" becomes the habitual expression of the heart—difficult to say with a full comprehension of its meaning, but when completely realized, the sublime word of a victorious faith. To be weak is to be miserable! It is quite true, for ambition is quenched, energy is dissipated, mental and physical activity is stopped, and one is forced to be a spectator merely of scenes in which he would gladly have taken part, and to confess that his work in the world is done. Yet this weakness may be re-enforced by the Divine presence and power, and the spirit may be lifted up into a plane of life from which it can look serenely down upon the weaknesses and pains of this mortal state, and prepare itself for the entrance into immortal life. For death, as I have said on former occasions, is not the end. It is the transition stage of the soul, the door which opens to the spirit the boundless realm of immortality.

Do I err in saying that to our friend, whose obsequies we observe to-day, this discipline of the spirit has been exercised for his eternal good? The disease to which he has yielded was certain in its progress, and its end was calmly foreseen. He could not have deceived himself by any flattering indications of temporary improvement. He has himself anticipated the hour when his physical life would be extinguished. Perhaps he may have preferred to die at the Capitol; possibly in the Senate Chamber itself, the scene of his patriotic labors, in the midst of associates who had learned both to honor and to love him. For men, who, when living, serve the state with passionate devotion, may fittingly desire to die on the spot which has been rendered memorable by their presence, as the soldier would wish to fall upon the field of battle, or the man of God would wish to be stricken down wearing the harness of his valiant endeavor for the divine kingdom. But, whenever and wherever the summons might come he was ready. With a cheerful courage, with a patient submission, with an undoubting trust, he has calmly looked forward to the time of his departure from the field of active life. For him death had no terrors, for he had schooled himself to that serenity of soul which could not be disturbed either in life or death. Not given much to introspection, certainly not disposed to make public his private and personal experiences, he was yet, without doubt, conscious in himself of this calm and peaceful state, and thus passed painlessly and quietly to his final rest. Long has he filled the public eye, well has he accomplished the mission of his public service, faithfully has he discharged the public trust committed to his care, and now he leaves to his fellow-citizens and his fellow-countrymen the record of his diligent and devoted labor. We attempt no labored panegyric. We pass no judgment. The future will determine the value of his service, and posterity will pronounce the verdict, "Well done." To speak a simple word of appreciation, before the grave shall shut him from our sight, is the office of the hour.

Mr. ANTHONY was a genuine child and a faithful representative of Rhode Island. Born upon her soil, nurtured in her traditions, educated at her university, receiving the highest honors she had to give, he thoroughly believed in the perfection of her policy and the permanence of her institutions. When called upon to defend the peculiar features of her government, he brought to the task both the ability of an advocate and the devotion of a son. In the editorial chair of the journal which he controlled, and in his seat in the Senate, he never forgot the obligations he owed to the mother who had reared and raised him to the position which he occupied and filled. He was jealous of her honor, and was always prepared to do valiant battle for her ancient prerogatives. The arguments which more than once he made both in the Journal and in the Senate in her behalf may not have wholly convinced those who believed that in the changes of the times a more generous extension of suffrage and a freer commercial policy were desirable. But no one could question the depth of his convictions and the sincerity of his faith. He was positive that the prosperity of the State and the welfare of its people were bound up in the maintenance of institutions which its history had sanctioned. With the power of this assurance he went to his duty with an unflinching resolution to give to it the fullest ability he could command. This element of strength is not to be lightly valued in making up the estimate of his character.

But the claims of his native State were not permitted to lessen his devotion to his country's need. His patriotism was as wise and enlightened as it was eminent and marked. Entering the Senate at a time when the first mutterings of the storm that was to sweep the land were heard, he was prepared with a calm courage to face the tempest when it broke. Feeling the full sense of the responsibility of the occasion, as a representative of the Union he was fearless and urgent in all measures for the defense of free institutions and the preservation of the Republic. He never doubted the result of the struggle in its darkest days, but cheerfully and bravely wrought on for the achievement of a full success. In the days of reconstruction he endeavored so to work that no second misfortune might befall. The constitution of the Senate changed. One by one his early associates passed away. Some paid the debt of nature. Others were swept away by political revolutions. But no revolutions touched his seat or alienated the support of the people of his State. Repeated re-elections returned him to his Senatorial chair. He became the "Father of the Senate," and as the new members came in they sought both his counsel and his friendship. He was elected President pro tempore, and with grace and dignity he conducted the deliberations of the distinguished body which called him to its chief post of honor. It was something more than a compliment when the Senate, notwithstanding his precarious health, still elected him to the office, hoping that he might be able to discharge its duties. It was a recognition of his worth, and though he was obliged to decline the position, he was touched with gratitude and made more conscious than ever of the warmth of feeling which his fellow-members cherished toward him in their hearts. He was the model legislator of the upper branch of the national Congress, not indulging in long debate, but always attentive and always present in the spirit of conscious duty. His practical wisdom is perpetuated in the rule for facilitating the business of the Senate which bears his name.

Public life has many temptations, and there have been men in public station who have thought it not beneath them to serve themselves and their own interest while engaged in serving the state. It is true that many stories that are bandied about in the public press with too ready an appetite for scandal are gross exaggerations. In the fierce light that beats upon official station peccadilloes become crimes. Of these indeed we condone nothing, we excuse nothing. But partisan zeal may sometimes put a wrong construction upon innocent motives and acts. Happily for ourselves we have no need to speak here with bated breath. For honor has followed merit and the laurel bears no blighted leaf. Of the value and honesty of Mr. ANTHONY's public service there has never been the slightest question. No breath of detraction ever tarnished the luster of his well-earned public fame. He did not seek or use his office for private gain or personal emolument. If he did not rise—or even aspire to rise—to the summit of the highest statesmanship, he yet allowed no one to surpass him in the singleness of his purpose to advance the interests of his State and to promote the welfare of his country. His stainless patriotism and his unsullied public service are known of all men. They are as creditable to the people of our Commonwealth as to himself. The representative reflects the character of his constituents. If the fountain of public virtue be pure the stream can not well be turbid.

It seems but commonplace to speak of Mr. ANTHONY's literary attainments. Accepting journalism as his profession, he rapidly carried the paper which he edited to the foremost rank. With a clear, incisive, direct style of composition, he brought to the daily discussion of current events and public measures the ample stores and equipment of a well-furnished mind. He brightened the columns of the Journal with delicate humor and lambent wit. When indulging in satire, he carried in the velvet scabbard of his well-turned periods a sword sharp as the scimeter of Saladin. In the consideration of graver themes he exhibited a cogency and vigor which revealed the strength of an original and carefully trained intellect. If one should meet him in controversy, it were well to see that there were no weak or unguarded places in the joints of the armor. For his keen eye was sure to find them and his trenchant blade would be thrust home with fatal result. His election as governor did not take him from his daily labor, while he neglected no public duty. With intervals of leisure, until the advent of his late associate—whose recent death was like the loss of his right arm—he still continued the management of the Journal. Its columns were enriched by frequent contributions from his ready pen. After Mr. Danielson assumed control, the daily mail brought to the office the letter which he found time amid engrossing cares to write. He loved the Journal, for it was his offspring.

His fellow Senators will, in due time, bear witness to the excellence and variety of these literary gifts. In a larger field, on a more conspicuous stage, the same qualities of mind and heart were displayed. He did not often speak at length. It would be far from his habit to occupy an entire session with prolonged address. But when he spoke, it was from a thorough knowledge of his subject and in pregnant and weighty words. His long experience and his accurate acquaintance with public affairs gave him a commanding influence. He was well entitled to the respect and attention with which he was always heard.

His work in the committee-room was thorough and efficient, and the public measures which he brought to the Senate, well digested and prepared, were accepted as the conclusions of one who knew well the true character and purpose of national legislation.

In one department of public speaking he certainly excelled. The memorial addresses which from time to time he delivered in the Senate are among the finest specimens of elegiac oratory to be found in our language. In this he discharged no perfunctory duty. Speaking from the heart, with a delicate appreciation of character, with a marvelous felicity of diction and facility of expression, with a complete and clear conception of the gravity of the occasion, he uttered the sincere sentiments of brotherly affection and friendly regard. Of these the three addresses which he made on the death of Senator Sumner are pre-eminent. It became his duty to deliver to the authorities of Massachusetts the body of the deceased statesman. I have been told by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, who accompanied the committee to Boston, that Mr. ANTHONY was not informed till reaching the frontier of the State of what was expected of him.

Amid the noise and turmoil of the railway journey he composed in his mind the brief but touching address which deserves to be inscribed on the imperishable bronze. It was the grateful expression of profound feeling when, in committing to the governor of our neighboring Commonwealth the mortal part of her honored son, he further said: "The part which we do not return to you is not wholly yours to receive nor altogether ours to give. It belongs to the country, to freedom, to civilization, to humanity." The heart of the man spoke from the tongue, and when on other occasions he addressed the Senate in eulogy of the friends who had fallen by his side, we may well believe that his heart was stirred by the warm emotions that found expression on his eloquent lips.

Glimpses of his inner life are thus vouchsafed to us. And if we were permitted here to enter into those sacred precincts, where personal and private sorrow has its home, there would be a full revelation of kindness, gentle consideration, fraternal love, generous helpfulness, loyal friendship, and uplifting faith. An early sorrow touched our friend soon after he had entered upon his public career. There is no doubt but that it tinged all his subsequent years. For though in social intercourse he was a most genial host, a delightful companion, and the center of a charmed and charming circle of friends, there was still the unseen presence of a melancholy which checked the exuberance of his spirits. It was the minor chord in the harmony of his life. It is not for me to dwell upon the theme.

Those who have through life felt the warm contact of his love, who have experienced the joy of his friendship, who have shared his confidence and secured his esteem, carry in their hearts the fervent, grateful appreciation of his virtue, and will long cherish the memory of his worth. Those who were associated with him in the common duties and labors of humanity, those who were employed by him in the conduct of his chosen occupation, those who for many years have looked upon him as a master and leader in their business, will acknowledge the justice and honor with which every detail was observed, the fidelity with which every obligation was met, and the thoroughness with which every task was performed. Three-score years and ten have nearly passed. The heavy burden has been laid down. The weary body is at rest. The busy mind has transferred its activity to another sphere of being. The spirit is with its God.

Mr. ANTHONY has seen in the Senate a generation of statesmen pass away. He has seen a new generation come upon the stage of public life. Is the past better than the present? As we bid farewell to those who vanish from our sight, have we no word of welcome to those who are pressing forward? We grieve over the death of men who we hardly thought could be spared. We look around to see who are to take up and carry on the work which they have been doing. A pillar of the State has fallen, and as we look upon the fragments we fear that the structure is weakened. But the Republic, bereaved afresh of one of its most trusted and trustworthy counselors, still lives. Divine Providence finds its agents and instruments, and by the inspiration and help of the Divine Presence the blessed results for humanity will be attained. I can not more fittingly close this address than in Mr. ANTHONY's own words: "When I recall those whom I have seen fall around me, and whom I thought necessary to the success, almost to the preservation, of great principles, I recall also those whom I have seen step into the vacant places, put on the armor which they wore, lift the weapons which they wielded, and march on to the consummation of the work which they inaugurated. And thus I am filled with reverent wonder at the beneficent ordering of nature, and inspired with a loftier faith in that Almighty Power without whose guidance and direction all human effort is vain, and with whose blessing the humblest instruments that He selects are equal to the mightiest work that He designs."

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, again the Congress of the United States pauses in its important legislative duties to commemorate the illustrious dead.

HENRY BOWEN ANTHONY, of Rhode Island, though much my senior, was my personal friend.

He was born April 1, 1815, in the State he served so long and so well. He graduated at Brown University in 1833. He was five times elected by his State to full terms in the United States Senate. He was an honored member of that august legislative body from March 4, 1859, to September 2, 1884, the date of his death.

At 23 years of age he entered upon the highly honorable work of a journalist in his native State. He never entirely gave up the profession of journalism. In 1850 and 1851 he was governor of his State, and served it acceptably. He was then a Whig. He was a born gentleman, of Anglo-Saxon blood and Quaker principles. His generous, kind, and genial nature seemed to save him from many of the hard blows that most great men have to receive in a successful life. He was just and considerate to friend and foe, never arrogant. He was charitable and never ostentatious. He did not rely on high public position to attain name or fame, but upon accomplished deeds. He was a patient toiler after useful knowledge, and when acquired he wielded it for his country's good. A single fact with him was prized more highly than a volume of loose generalization. He had a critical constituency to watch him in his public life. It was exacting, but not unreasonable. Another has well said:

He was a stalwart champion of Rhode Island, of her sons and daughters, of her traditions and her institutions.

He personified in his whole life, as citizen, editor, chief executive of his State, Senator, and presiding officer of the United States Senate, the true type of an American gentleman. He has been aptly called the "gentleman-statesman." He lacked none of the noble qualities of a high-spirited American. He was ever keenly sensible to all the manly qualities. He was filled with convictions, and they were his own. His views are impressed upon many of the laws of his country.

His Senatorial life began when rebellion and treason were ripening in and around this Capitol. He saw both rise in the full bloom of defiant power, and then fall prostrate by the judgment of war. He never faltered in his patriotism, and when war came he held up the hands of President Lincoln from Bull Run to Appomattox. His was not a blind patriotism, but an enlightened devotion to a country he loved.

He hated slavery because he believed it was an obstacle in the progressive march of civilization and condemned by Christianity. He spoke and voted for every measure looking to the eradication of the institution of slavery in the United States and of every other injustice incident to that institution. He favored all the amendments to the Constitution of the United States adopted since the war. He was for universal amnesty and universal suffrage.

He was twice elected (March, 1863, and March, 1871) President pro tempore of the Senate, and in that position served four years. He displayed rare abilities as a parliamentarian and presiding officer. His principal committee work was on the Naval and Public Printing Committees. He was chairman of the latter committee for twenty-one years. He served with distinction on other standing and special committees during and since the war.

During his chairmanship of the Committee on Public Printing and under his direction great improvements were made in the character and speedy execution of the public printing. Under his master care and wise counsel the most wonderful and extensive printing establishment in the world has grown up.

He was not a frequent debater on the floor of the Senate, though the Congressional Globe and RECORD contain many of his eloquent speeches on important subjects. He talked when he had something useful to say. He always, when speaking, commanded the attention of the Senate. His nearest, longest, and most confidential friend, Maj. Ben. Perley Poore, speaking of his addresses, says:

His eloquence is practical and sensible, unadorned with worthless verbal embroidery, yet throughout its solid Senatorial sentences there is a classic grace that charms the ear, while his dignified presence, pleasing manner, and pleasant voice aid in gratifying the audience.

He was bold and honest in the expression of his views, and thus made himself felt in public affairs. He loved the editorial profession, and always tried to ennoble it and give it greater weight and more universal influence for good.

Speaking in the Senate on this subject, he said:

I know something about the management of a newspaper. It is almost the only matter that I do know anything about; and for the truth of the maxim which I am about to declare I appeal to those Senators, on both sides of the Chamber, who, if they have not had greater experience than I have in that honorable profession, have reflected greater credit upon it. It is this: A paper that can not support itself can not be of any service to a party; to depend upon it is like leaning upon a man who can not stand up; to spend money upon it is like wasting fuel in the attempt to kindle a stone. The day when such papers were read has passed; and the day has long since arrived when a paper, to be of service to a party, must first establish a value to the public. It must acquire a character for the reliability of its facts and for the candor of its arguments; it must have the public confidence before it can affect the public opinion; it must be in a considerable degree independent of party before a party can derive any great value from its services. Of all the foolish expenditures that are made for political purposes, none are more useless and wasteful than those for the support of the class of newspapers that very few read and that nobody believes.

Senator ANTHONY'S services to his country in time of war had substantial recognition by the District of Columbia Commandery of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion. He was the first man elected by it a companion of the third class, a degree conferred only on civilians who rendered distinguished service to their country in the war of the rebellion. The resolutions adopted by that commandery after his death are considered worthy of repetition here.

Mr. ANTHONY, by his kind consideration for others, was in all social circles a special favorite. In private conversation he had the rare quality of being a respectful listener, while at the same time he was an entertaining talker.

Though advanced in years, and decorated with well-earned public honors, he never spoke of himself or his acts with pride or egotism. Retrospection is a habit of the mind in the aged, and there is no reason why they should not speak with pride of their past successes.

The aged veteran soldier—

> Shoulders his crutch, and shows
> How fields are won.

And why should not the veteran statesman speak of his exploits and victories? Senator ANTHONY was too modest to do this.

He outlived nearly all his early Senatorial colleagues. The names of Douglas and Yates of Illinois, Baker of California, Sumner of Massachusetts, Fessenden of Maine, Seward and King of New York, Chase, Wade, and Pugh of Ohio, Crittenden of Kentucky, Collamer of Vermont, Hale of New Hampshire, Carpenter and Howe of Wisconsin, Morton of Indiana, Chandler of Michigan, and many others equally distinguished have long ago been "carved on the marble that covers their dust." Rhode Island has buried but recently (September, 1881) another United States Senator—General Burnside. He was a soldier of renown as well as a statesman.

While both Senators ANTHONY and Burnside belonged to the State they so faithfully and ably represented, yet their fame and deeds belong now to the whole country, to freedom, to civilization, and to humanity.

Resolutions of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion, District of Columbia Commandery, adopted November 5, 1884.

HENRY BOWEN ANTHONY, a companion of the third class, died at his residence in Providence, on the 2d day of September, 1884.

Senator ANTHONY was born in Coventry, R. I., April 1, 1815. His ancestors were among the oldest inhabitants of that town, their Saxon blood and Quaker principles indicating their origin and their character. Receiving a classical education, he was graduated from Brown University in 1833. His health failing, he relinquished his legal studies, and in 1838 he assumed the editorial charge of the Providence Journal, and soon gave evidence of his common sense, his practical energy, and his varied learning, spiced with a refined humor that attracted the attention of the reading people of Rhode Island. No man in that State had a wider circle of devoted friends, and those who did not enjoy his personal acquaintance could say that—

> He, in a general honest thought,
> And common good to all, made one of them.
> His life was gentle; and the elements
> So mix'd in him that Nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, "This is a man!"

In 1849 Mr. ANTHONY was elected governor of the State of Rhode Island, and he was re-elected in 1850, but he declined being a candidate for a third term. His course as chief magistrate of his native State was marked by a strict attention to its material interests and devotion to the great principles of public liberty.

On retiring from the gubernatorial chair he again devoted his whole time to his editorial labors until 1859, when he was elected United States Senator. He took his seat in the Senate on the 5th of December, 1859, and continuously occupied it, having been successively re-elected in 1865, in 1871, in 1877, and in 1883. He was several times elected President pro tempore, and at the time of his death he was the Puter Senatus.

At the outbreak of the rebellion Mr. ANTHONY at once took a decided stand in defense of the Union. A typical conservative, and by birth a lover of peace, he faced the secession movement with unflinching firmness and advocated its unconditional defeat. The sagacity which prompted the decision which nerved and the resolution which supported him are stamped upon the legislative annals of the war for the restoration of the Union, and the soldiers and sailors of Rhode Island will ever cherish their recollections of his patriotic generosity.

Senator ANTHONY was not a frequent speaker, but when he addressed the Senate he was always listened to with attention. His eloquence was practical and sensible, with no attempt at worthless verbal embroidery, yet amidst its solid Senatorial sentences there was a classic grace that engaged the ear, while his dignified presence, grace of manner, and pleasant voice aided in gratifying his audiences.

The commandery of the District of Columbia selected Senator ANTHONY as a companion of the third class, an honor which he highly appreciated. He was not, however, permitted to meet with the commandery many times. Death claimed him, and the summons had to be obeyed. His stalwart form, crowned with white locks, will no more be seen in the Senate Chamber; his kind heart is cold; his friendly hand is numb. It is pleasing to know that his mental faculties were bright, clear, and firm to the last, and he died in the mellow evening-shine of matured faculties, as he had lived, a philosopher, a gentleman, and a Christian.

Resolved, That this memorial be entered on the records of the commandery, and that a copy of the same be forwarded to the family of our late companion.

Committee.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, the death of Hon. HENRY B. ANTHONY, late Senator from the State of Rhode Island, who, by his long and distinguished public service and his private virtues, has entitled himself to this memorial consideration by the two Houses of Congress, recalls to our minds the relation of his mother Commonwealth to our Federal Union at the foundation of the Government and at the ordeal crisis of its history during the period in which he was her representative in the Senate of the United States.

"Rhode Island and the Providence Plantations" constituted one of the original thirteen States which, under the loose league of the Continental Congress and afterward under the Articles of Confederation, fought together for the independence of the American States. But when the convention of 1787 met in Philadelphia to frame a new Constitution for these United States Rhode Island was conspicuous for her absence from its counsels, and signalized her jealousy of any change in the terms of the Federal Union by declining to supersede the old Articles of Confederation by the Constitution of 1789. Eleven States only ratified that instrument, and without the concurrence of North Carolina and Rhode Island the new Government was launched upon its voyage under the new Constitution. For nearly a year North Carolina, and until June 16, 1790, Rhode Island, were not members of the new Union constructed upon the terms of the Constitution of 1789.

The accession of Rhode Island by the act of her convention, dated May 29, 1790, was accompanied by declarations and demands of amendments, which evinced at once her jealousy for her rights as a State and her apprehension of danger from the powers delegated to the Federal Government.

She entered the Union as the equal of every other State in the Senate but with only one vote in the House of Representatives. Shorn of her equipollent power in the House, and fearful of its effects upon the rights of the States and the liberties of her people, she declared in like terms with Virginia, and in the same terms with New York, "that the powers of Government may be reassumed by the people whensoever it shall become necessary to their happiness;" and she proposed amendments, which foreshadowed those subsequently adopted within a few years after the adoption of the Constitution, by which the reserved rights of the States were more explicity secured, and the delegated powers of the United States were more clearly defined. In all of these views Virginia, the then largest, and Rhode Island, the then smallest, State were wholly in acord.

But in the next seventy years alienation of views and feelings were produced by diversity of interests, and from the existence of slavery in the South, to which the people of Rhode Island were strongly opposed. The tariff, the Missouri restriction, the relation of slavery to the Territories and to this District engendered contentions which brought the Union to the crisis of 1860, about which time Mr. ANTHONY entered the Senate of the United States.

He was then about 45 years of age and in the prime of his powers. A member of the Society of Friends, his political, personal, and religious sentiments made him a warm and earnest opponent of slavery. Originally a Whig and devoted adherent of Mr. Clay, he became a Republican when that party absorbed all opposition in the Northern States to the Democratic party. Of course he promoted the election of Mr. Lincoln in 1860, and supported with zeal and consistency all the measures for the war upon the Confederate States. At the close of the war he sustained the reconstruction measures and the entire policy of the party to which he belonged until his death in September, 1884.

It is difficult in any part of his political career for me to find a point of agreement between us. Without doubt there may have been questions on which we concurred, but they were few and on matters of minor importance.

But this variance of opinions, and even upon such questions as involved the two sections of the country in a civil war, can not prevent me from offering my willing testimony to his talents, to the purity of his private character, to his incorruptible integrity as a Senator, to the sincerity of his convictions, to the patriotism of his intentions, and to the urbanity, dignity, and courtesy which distinguished his personal and official intercourse. I knew him not intimately, but well enough to appreciate his intellect, to admire his public and private virtues, and to pay willing tribute to his patriotic devotion to what he thought was for the best interests of his country.

And why should differences upon political questions stint our praise of men whose conscientious convictions were as pure and honest as our own? Why should the embers of civil strife kindle again a wall of fire between me and one who was from genuine patriotism our enemy during the four dreadful years of carnage and of devastation? Why shall not men of both sides ascend to the heights of a magnanimity of thought which will accredit to their one-time foe, but now their fellow-citizen and compatriot, as sincere convictions and as genuine purposes to maintain the right and uphold the truth as is claimed for themselves? Who professes infallibility in thought or action? What standard can we who are prone to err erect for pronouncing judgment on others? If others are honest in opinion and purpose, who of us shall dare to condemn them for opinions contrary to our own?

For myself I declare in the solemn presence of the dead that I can and do forget all the diversities and hostilities of the past, and accord to him as much of virtue in purpose and of conscientiousness in action as I claim for those to whom he was hostile. Let the dead past be thus buried in the graves of the dead of both sections, and let the living practice that noble charity which accords to every other what each claims for himself, and we will in honorable recognition of each other's virtues and forbearance for each other's faults move on with mutual respect and affection to the achievement of the best results for our common country in the grand future of the American States. It is thus, and only thus, that we can secure to the future of our country a true and genuine peace between the once hostile sections and make us one in heart and purpose, as we are one in constitutional Union. For myself, in all sincerity, I rejoice in this opportunity to testify these catholic sentiments and purposes, by laying upon the tomb of the late Senator from Rhode Island this chaplet which Virginia weaves through my humble hands as her tribute of honor to the character, virtues, and fame of the lamented dead!

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, the "Father of the Senate" is dead. A long life of usefulness, largely devoted to the public service, has closed. A career unexampled by that of any son of his native State and almost unparalleled in the history of the Republic has terminated. All that was mortal of HENRY B. ANTHONY has been borne to its final resting place, reverently escorted by representatives of the National and State governments and by the mourning people of Rhode Island, and tenderly committed to the soil from whence he sprang.

His obsequies have been said; his virtues and attainments depicted, and his great services to his State and the nation fittingly portrayed. The General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, the Board of Trade of the city of Providence, the Commandery of the Loyal Legion of this District, of which he was an honorary and an honored companion, the Senate of the United States, the public press, and the voice of the people have all recounted and recalled the incidents of his honorable life and pronounced their eulogies upon his private character and his distinguished public services.

The utterances of this hour, devoted to the memory of the deceased Senator, properly supplement the many similar tributes to his worth; and, though evolving little perhaps not already said, may at least, while giving appropriate recognition by this House of the public loss and the public sorrow, point again the lessons of a completed and well-spent life; and so, while appreciating the completeness of the tributes already paid, I can not omit the opportunity offered to render this last testimonial of respect and regard for my late friend and colleague.

It was Senator ANTHONY'S fortune to live in stirring, troublous times, and to be a prominent participant in events which have largely contributed to the making of our history. From early manhood to almost the allotted life of man he may be said to have been constantly concerned in the direction of public affairs; first as an influential editor and controller of public thought; then as governor of his State; and finally as United States Senator by five successive elections and during more than twenty-five years of continuous service, embracing the most eventful period of our national existence.

Liberally educated and graduating at Brown University in 1833, with great natural talents and no small degree of cultivation and adaptability for the work, Mr. ANTHONY five years later became sole editor of the Providence Journal, in which capacity he established that newspaper among the leaders of New England opinion, and attained his earlier reputation as a graceful, vigorous writer, and a keen and discriminating critic of men and of public affairs.

The period of his earlier editorial career was in those years which immediately preceded and included the so-called "Dorr rebellion," when wide and irreconcilable differences among the people of Rhode Island concerning their suffrage gave rise not only to bitter discussions and personal and party dissensions, but even to domestic strife and an appeal to arms, threatening the peace and the very existence of the State. In those days Mr. ANTHONY and his paper were the stern, uncompromising supporters of the so-called "Law-and-order" party of Rhode Island, urging the supremacy of existing law and of the government organized under it until the same should be changed by and through the instrumentality and processes which that law recognized, and earnestly demanding the suppression by armed force of any armed resistance to what they claimed to be the only lawful government of the State.

It was during that period that Mr. ANTHONY established his reputation as an editor and first illustrated the proportions of his ability and the grasp and insight of his intellect. Yet, bitterly as the conflict was waged between the "Dorrites" and the "Algerines," as the contending parties were called, and virulent as were many of the animosities and antagonisms aroused—families and former friends dividing in hostile array—and although no man in Rhode Island more persistently and vigorously opposed Thomas W. Dorr and his associates than did HENRY B. ANTHONY, his peculiar characteristics, both of manner and method, are illustrated by the fact that many of his most hostile opponents in those days of internal strife subsequently became his faithful political adherents and closest personal friends. Indeed, within a few days I have read a letter recently written by an old "Dorrite" and a strong political opponent of Mr. ANTHONY in the "days of forty-two," who there speaks of the deceased Senator as one among his "ideals of great men."

Largely by reason of the reputation earned and the political alliances with which he became associated during the years of and immediately succeeding the contest referred to, Mr. ANTHONY was in 1849 nominated by the Whig party of Rhode Island and elected governor of the State; and in the following year re-elected to the same office, receiving upon this second election more than three-fourths of all the ballots polled—a marked evidence of his popularity with the people and of their satisfaction with his discharge of his duties as chief magistrate during his preceding term.

It is a peculiarity of Rhode Island politics, due I believe partly to the size of the State and partly to the characteristic independence of her people, that party lines are frequently broken for the expression of individual preferences, and votes often cast in direct antagonism to the nominal party affiliations of the voter; and Mr. ANTHONY, having perhaps to a greater extent than any other of his fellow-citizens a large following of personal friends, of varying shades of political opinion, captivated by his genial manners and won by his unquestioned integrity and the constancy of his friendship and his purpose, always found many staunch political supporters among those whose political alliances were usually widely at variance with his own; and, although originally a Whig and subsequently always a Republican, through the course of his long public life he enjoyed the continuous confidence and political support of many Rhode Island Democrats.

A Rhode Islander by birth and descended from old Rhode Island stock; by nature, descent, instinct, and education saturated with the ideas, principles, and convictions peculiar to the people of his State; with an affection akin to admiration for her traditions, her history, and her ancient institutions, Mr. ANTHONY was for more than a quarter of a century recognized as that one of all her citizens best qualified to represent her interests, as was evinced by his repeated elections to serve her during all that period in the United States Senate. His Senatorial career, extending from 1859 to the time of his death in September, 1884, spanned the lifetime of a generation. It saw the rise and overthrow of the great rebellion, the abolition of slavery, and the reconstruction of the Union, with constitutional liberty for black as well as white as a foundation-stone; it witnessed the restoration of financial safety and integrity and that wonderful expansion of American industries which wise legislation had fostered; it beheld that marvelous growth and prosperity which, within that period of time, had nearly doubled the population of Rhode Island as well as the population of the United States, and had nearly tripled the value of their manufactured products; it saw the star of the Republic, which had seemed about to set in clouds and darkness, blazing again in the peaceful sky as a beacon-light to progress and to freedom!

The long and faithful services of Senator ANTHONY in the national councils form a conspicuous part of the recorded history of our country, and scarcely demand recital here. They constitute a record of high patriotism, fidelity to duty, and prudent statesmanship during those trying seasons of peril and of strife when numerous new and important questions affecting the safety and perpetuity of our institutions vexed the public mind and demanded Congressional action; they embrace the period following the war, when matters of scarcely less importance to the welfare, peace, and prosperity of our people—the reconstruction of the Union, and questions of finance and traffic and taxation—called for that wisdom in legislation which he was so competent to exercise. Affable and courtly in manner, earnest yet prudent and conservative, diligent in the work committed to his charge, possessing rare gifts of eloquence and persuasion as well as a logical mind united with unusual power of statement and analysis, Senator ANTHONY, though seldom indulging in formal speeches in the Senate and but infrequently engaged in debate upon the floor, was for many years a power in the affairs of Government and one of the most influential of Senators. As an industrious member and as chairman of important committees, and for four years as President pro tempore of the Senate, he has left the impress of his statesmanship and his patriotism upon much of the legislation enacted during his term of Senatorial service.

If Mr. ANTHONY had not been called to public life, but had continued to actively occupy his early editorial chair, I believe I may safely assert that he would have attained both reputation and fame as a great editor. That was a career for which he was peculiarly adapted and most admirably equipped by his ability, his inclinations, and his attainments.

Few men possessed a keener appreciation of men and motives or better understood the course and the cause of the progress of affairs, or could express their views more clearly, forcibly, and attractively. A master of good English, some of the earlier as well as the more recent products of his pen are among the best examples of correct and graceful diction which our literature affords. He could be witty without being offensive; humorous and yet not gross; severe but still kindly and discriminating; complimentary yet not effusive; vigorous, or sympathetic, or critical, or sad, or gay; and through all he wrote there ever ran a genial, human vein, with a captivating style of thought and expression; and though his wit and satire were keen and incisive, yet, like the scimeter of Saladin, they seldom left a ragged wound to fester long after their blows had been delivered.

But I will delay the House no longer.

The "Father of the Senate" rests from his labors; the voice of the master of eulogy is hushed; and, with the memory of his glowing periods ringing in my ears, my simple tribute to his memory seems but discordant music.

His fame is a part of our common history, interwoven with the fame of Lincoln and Grant and Seward and Sumner and of those other patriots, now largely of the past generation, who labored, or fought, or died that the Union and free institutions might live.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and in accordance therewith (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 22, 1885.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 20, 1884, a report from the Chief of Engineers and accompanying report from Lieut. Col. George H. Elliot, Corps of Engineers, submitting an estimate of the cost of the proposed improvement of the harbor of Providence, R. I., by the removal of Green Jacket Shoals; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 20th instant, a statement showing the settlement of claims for lands taken by the Government under the act of July 15, 1882, for increasing the water supply of the city of Washington, and the obstacles thereto; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF DISTRICT HEALTH OFFICER.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 288) authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing, if there be no objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Committee on Printing have had that subject-matter under consideration. A joint resolution of similar purport was introduced in the Senate and referred to the committee, and I was instructed yesterday to report in favor of the joint resolution. It being identical with the one passed by the other House, I ask that the House joint resolution be now considered by the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; 100 for the use of the Senate, 350 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,050 for the use of the said health officer of the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask before we proceed further whether the joint resolution on this subject passed by the Senate is the same as that passed by the House?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is exactly the same. The joint resolution now before the Senate is identical in language with the one acted upon by the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very sorry I was not here when it was acted upon. I should certainly have opposed the proposition to let the House of Representatives have three hundred and fifty copies and the Senate only a hundred.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is about the equal proportion of membership of the two Houses. It is not a document, I will inform the Senator from Missouri, that seems to be in much demand by our constituents.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand perfectly what it is. I have had application for it, and have had to send it off, and I know something about it. The proposition is not just or right to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order except by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill or joint resolution? It is a joint resolution by its title on the outside, and a bill by its enacting clause on the inside. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill, as it legally is, that being what it is on its face, is now before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Nebraska that there is an obvious error between the entitling of the paper and its enacting clause, and that the title ought to be amended so as to make it a bill in its title.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move to so amend the title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the title will be amended so as read: "A bill authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia;" and as amended the title will stand.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of M. F. Wooster Post, No. 34, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, praying for the purchase by the Government of Miss Ransom's portrait of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of 535 citizens of New York city, praying that all acts fixing the term of many administrative offices at four years be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented the petition of Margaret F. Rawdon, of Little Falls, N. Y., praying for the passage of the joint resolution (S. R. 111) referring the controversy between the United States and Venezuela, in respect to the awards of the mixed commission, to the President; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of letter-carriers in the employ of the Post-Office Department, praying additional compensation for labor in excess of eight hours per day; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Adam Johnson, late of Company G, One hundred and fifty-third Regiment New York Volunteers, and the petition of George W. Collins, late of Company C, Sixteenth Regiment New York Volunteers, praying for an extension of the time for filing pension claims; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of Robert McFarland and 648 other citizens of Pittsburgh, Pa., and vicinity, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Allegheny River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill just reported by the Senator from California will be postponed indefinitely, if there be no objection, and the proposed amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of J. SAINT CROIX RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3258) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at the most accessible point between Stillwater and Taylor's Falls, Minn., to report it favorably with amendments. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered at the present time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that the Senate passed a bill which contains all that is in this bill as proposed to be amended. The committee have recommended such amendments as will make the House bill correspond with the bill which the Senate passed. All the amendments are inserted in their places in the House bill to make it correspond to the bill which the Senate has approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments may be read as we proceed with the paragraphs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce be considered in the order which they shall be reached in the reading of the text of the bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill and read to line 17 of section 2.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 2, line 11, to strike out "of such" and insert "other;" and in the same line, after the word "works," to insert the words "provided for in this act;" so as to read:

Shall submit to the Secretary of War a plan of the bridge and other accessory works provided for in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 34 of section 2, before the word "navigable," to insert the words "the best;" so as to read:

With a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and the best navigable point.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in line 39 of section 2, after the word "boats," to insert "vessels, and other water-craft;" so as to read:

Provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats, vessels, and other water-craft.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "water-craft," in line 40 of section 2, to insert:

Provided, however, That no bridge shall be built under the provisions of this act except there also be built, at the time of the erection of the piers, proper sheer-booms or other proper protections to safely guide boats, vessels, rafts, and other water-craft through said draw-spans, and at the expense of the company or corporation erecting said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 3, line 10, before the word "accessory," to insert the word "other;" and in the same line, after the word "works," to insert "provided for in this act;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, upon receiving any such plan and map and other information, and upon being satisfied that a bridge built on such plan and with such accessory works and at such locality will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act, to notify the company that he approves the same; and upon receiving such notification the said company may proceed to an erection of said bridge conforming strictly to the approved plan and location; but until the Secretary of War approves the plan and location of said bridge and other accessory works provided for in this act, and notify the company of the same, the bridge shall not be built.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 12, after the word "or," to strike out "said" and insert "other;" in line 13, after the word "works," to insert "provided for in this act;" and at the end of the section to add "not, however, to be in any wise inconsistent with the provisions or conditions of this act;" so as to read:

And notify the company of the same, the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of the bridge or other accessory works, provided for in this act, during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War, not, however, to be in any wise inconsistent with the provisions or conditions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 4, line 2, after the words "according to," to strike out the words "the terms and limitations thereof" and insert "its provisions and conditions;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That any bridge and accessory works, when built and constructed under this act and according to its provisions and conditions, shall be a lawful structure.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to add to section 4 the following words:

And the United States shall have the right of way for postal telegraph and telephone lines, free of charge, across said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert after section 4, as an additional section, the following:

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to require the company or persons owning said bridge to cause such aids to the passage of said bridge authorized by the provisions of this act to be constructed, placed, and maintained, at their own cost and expense, in the form of booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for confining the flow of water to a permanent channel, and for the guiding of rafts, steamboats, and other water-craft safely through the draw and raft spans, as shall be specified in his order in that behalf; and on the failure of the company or persons aforesaid to make and establish such additional structures within a reasonable time, the said Secretary shall proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense of the United States, and shall refer the matter without delay to the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it shall be to institute, in the name of the United States, proceedings in any circuit court of the United States in which such bridge, or any part thereof, is located, for the recovery of the cost thereof; and all moneys accruing from such proceedings shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The numbers of the concluding sections will be changed to correspond with the number of the additional section, inserted as section 5.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear the last section but one of the bill read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structure, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interests require it, is also expressly reserved.

Mr. COCKRELL. There ought to be a provision not giving Congress the right to require a change or anything of the kind in order not to impede navigation, but giving the power to the Secretary of War. It seems to me that has always been left to the discretion of the Secretary of War. There may be some other clause that gives the control of the structure. It would not be appropriate to vest in Congress the right to require a mere change to be made in the bridge or a repair to be made to it.

Mr. CONGER. In section 3 there is a provision that any change or alteration in the bridge "shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War."

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the third section of the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, upon receiving any such plan and map and other information, and upon being satisfied that a bridge built on such plan and with such accessory works and at such locality will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act, to notify the company that he approves the same; and upon receiving such notification the said company may proceed to an erection of said bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location; but until the Secretary of War approve the plan and location of said bridge and other accessory works provided for in this act, and notify the company of the same, the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of the bridge or other accessory works, provided for in this act, during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War, not, however, to be in any wise inconsistent with the provisions or conditions of this act.

Mr. COCKRELL. That does not cover the point I suggested. For example, where repairs have to be made or any change is to be made in the bridge, that ought to be done by the company at their own expense, under the direction of the Secretary of War, and not of Congress.

Mr. CONGER. The power is given to Congress to change, alter, amend, or repeal. That provision was inserted in the Senate bill, I think, on the motion of the present President of the Senate; and it has been inserted in other bills since that time, and received the approval of the Senate. That would apply after the bridge is built, if any material change should be made there, in which case it is provided that Congress shall have the right to repeal, alter, or amend.

Mr. COCKRELL. The provision is all right, except as to keeping the bridge in repair, or making any change that may be necessary after the structure is completed. The bill leaves it to Congress to determine that, when I think the Secretary of War ought to determine it. Let that section be read again.

Mr. CONGER. If the Senator has any amendment that he would like to offer, let him present it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the section be read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structure, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interests require it, is also expressly reserved.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think that clause is sufficient. There might be changes required and necessary which the Secretary of War ought to have the right to order. My recollection is that a provision has always been inserted in similar bills heretofore that keeping the bridge in repair and things of that kind shall be under the direction of the Secretary of War. But still if the Senator from Michigan desires no change, I shall not make any further suggestion.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator will find that section 3 provides for the approval of the Secretary of War of the plan and construction of the bridge, and that any changes which may be made in it shall also be subject to his approval—that is, while it is being constructed; and in case there should be a necessity for making any great material change, that comes in under the clause to alter, amend, and repeal, and the power is reserved to Congress to require those changes. It is not a direction; it is a limitation. I have no objection to any other phrase, but it seems to me that the bill is one of the most full in respect of the reservation of power to the Government of any that we have passed. So the committee thought, and I think so myself.

Mr. FRYE. I suggest to the Senator having the bill in charge to strike out the last section:

That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

It is surplusage. There is no necessity for it. It performs no office there.

Mr. CONGER. Very well; I move that that section be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, to strike out the seventh section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report back to the Senate the letter of the Postmaster-General, dated January 20, 1885, and the accompanying documentary history of the railway mail service, with a concurrent resolution, which I ask may be read, and that the resolution, communication, and document be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the letter from the Postmaster-General, dated January 20, 1885, and the accompanying documentary history of the railway mail service from its origin in 1834 to the present time, be printed, and that 2,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and for the use of the Post-Office Department 5,000 copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution, with the accompanying papers, reported by the Senator from Iowa, will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD REPORTS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution providing that the reports in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be an accurate transcript of the proceedings and debates of the two Houses of Congress, to report it favorably. Believing that the Senate is practically unanimous in favor of the resolution, and that it will take no time, I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOAR. Without objecting, I may say that I should like to make a few observations on that resolution when it comes up. It will not be a very long discussion, but the resolution will not pass without debate.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that it be laid over for a day.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to its consideration now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANDERSON. I withdraw the request at the suggestion of Senators. Let the resolution go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print the letter of the Secretary of State dated December 12, 1884, and the accompanying reports of United States consuls on labor in Europe.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1565) to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 1017) relative to the Inspector-General's Department of the Army; and

A bill (H. R. 7768) to authorize the National Bank of Bloomington, Ill., to change its name to the First National Bank of Bloomington.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GARLAND introduced a bill (S. 2571) to authorize the Merchants' National Bank of Little Rock, Ark., to change its name to the First National Bank of Little Rock; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 2572) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Cadet-Engineer John U. Crygier an assistant engineer in the United States Navy, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

LANDS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate, pursuant to the order of the Senate yesterday, the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the United States in 1866 acquired from the Creek and Seminole Indians by treaty certain lands situate in the Indian Territory, a portion of which have remained unoccupied until the present time; and

Whereas a widely extended belief exists that such unoccupied lands are public lands of the United States, and as such subject to homestead and pre-emption settlement, and pursuant to such belief a large number of citizens of the United States have gone upon them claiming the right to settle and acquire title thereto under the general laws of the United States; and

Whereas it is understood that the President of the United States does not regard said lands as open to settlement, and believes it to be his duty to remove all persons who go upon the same claiming the right to settle thereon, and for that purpose has directed the expulsion of the persons now on said lands by the use of military force, and there seems to be a probability of a conflict growing out of the attempt to expel said persons so claiming right and attempting to settle: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to advise the Senate as to the status of the lands in question as viewed by the Executive, the action taken, if any, to expel persons seeking to settle thereon, and the reason for the same, together with any other information in his possession bearing upon the existing controversy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed and empowered to ascertain, by communication with the authorities of the Creek and Seminole Nations of Indians in the Indian Territory, upon what terms the said nations will relinquish and convey to the United States all the right, title, and interest in and to all that country described in article 3 of the treaty made between the United States and the Creek Nation on June 14, 1866, as "the west half of their entire domain, to be divided by a line running north and south," the lands so described in the treaty being now known as "Oklahoma," and being fully described in Senate Executive Document No. 109, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, page 4, and the lands described in article 3 of the Seminole treaty of March 21, 1866. (14 Statutes, 756.)

That the Secretary of the Interior shall communicate with the authorities of the Creek and Seminole Nations immediately, by special agent or otherwise, as he may deem necessary, and transmit the result to Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, upon reflection I do not wish to substitute the resolution I offered for that of the Senator from Kansas. There is really no conflict between the two resolutions, and I think it would be very well in the present contingency to adopt both.

The information this morning from the Indian Territory is to the effect that General Hatch has telegraphed to the War Department to know whether he is expected to attack the persons who have settled in what is known as the Oklahoma country at any or all hazards, and he has further informed the Department, as I see by the papers, that he is satisfied those people can not be removed except in the event of force being used for that purpose. The man who is now at the head of the persons who have gone into the Territory bears the character of being a very determined, if not a desperate man, and he seems resolved to push matters to an extremity. This being the case, it is of the utmost importance that the prevention of bloodshed should be secured by the action of Congress.

For myself I do not see that the President of the United States can take but one course, and that is the course already adopted by him. I do not think that any intelligent lawyer will undertake to say that the Oklahoma country is subject to settlement by white persons at this time. It has not been declared by the authorities of the United States to be open for homestead or pre-emption. It stands in a position to-day before the law which absolutely prevents its settlement by white men, at least until there shall be some sort of arrangement with the Indians from whom the land must be purchased. This being the case, the President could adopt but one course. In July last by proclamation he warned all persons from entering into that territory in its present condition. Notwithstanding that, in absolute defiance of the authorities of the United States, three raids have been made upon the territory, and now there are more than two hundred and fifty armed men encamped upon the Stillwater prepared to resist the forces of the United States, and the dispatches state this morning that the force is being rapidly augmented by accessions from all the adjacent States.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri a question in regard to a matter with which he is more familiar than I am, he being a member of the Committee on Territories. Is any land of the United States not surveyed, sectionized, and subdivided subject to settlement?

Mr. VEST. I do not understand that it is.

Mr. MAXEY. Has this land ever been surveyed and sectionized?

Mr. VEST. This never has been, and in addition to that there are other considerations to which I propose to refer very briefly.

Mr. MAXEY. It is not subject to settlement.

Mr. VEST. No. As a matter of course the Senators representing the States bordering upon the Indian Territory, particularly the Senators from the States of Kansas and Missouri, are very deeply interested in this question. Large numbers of our people, I think under very bad advice and entirely misguided, have gone into that Territory, and they have gone there honestly believing that they have the right as citizens of the United States to occupy that soil. They have gone there in spite of advice, so far as I am concerned, always given to the same intent, that if they wished to avoid trouble they should stay out of that country. That it will be eventually opened up to settlement there is no sort of question. I say this reluctantly, because I do not want to be put even in the apparent position of encouraging the people who have gone in there under the present circumstances. Still I am bound to say, in what few words I shall submit here to-day, that it is inevitable that this country shall be opened up to settlement. Our past experience, the nature of the American people, the course of events, to say nothing about manifest destiny, all point in one direction, that all this land, much of which is of the most valuable description, will be occupied by white men. That is the inevitable course of events in regard to Oklahoma.

Some misapprehension exists as to what is Oklahoma. We find gentlemen in public life who seem not to understand at all what is the nature of this controversy, if we can term it such, between the people who have gone in there and the authorities of the United States. Recent debates held in another portion of the Capitol seem to indicate that gentlemen occupying public position believe that the President has violated the law. As I said before, the President could do nothing but what he has done. Under his oath of office, as the Chief Executive of the nation, he is sworn to carry out the law, and the law as it stands to-day absolutely prohibits the settlement of white men upon that soil.

Now, what is Oklahoma? Because if I can reach the men who have gone in there, whether a single Senator listens to me or not, I shall have achieved something in the interest of peace and law and order. Oklahoma proper is a country nearly 5,000 square miles in area. It is located in almost the central part of what is known as the Indian country, and that Indian country, by law of 1834 of the American Congress, was declared to be all the lands west of the Mississippi River that were not entered, that were not surveyed, that were not assigned by the Government or authorities of the United States. It was a loose description, and it has settled down now to be what is called in common parlance, but what is not known to the law by that expression, as the Indian Territory. In the statute it is called the Indian country. The five civilized tribes—the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees, Seminoles, and Creeks—occupy the eastern portion of this Territory, using that word. The Creeks sold the western half of their possessions to the United States in 1866, at 30 cents per acre. In Senate Report No. 64 a succinct statement will be found. It reads as follows:

> The country known as "Oklahoma" covers a portion of the lands ceded to the United States by the treaties of 1866 with the Creek and Seminole Nations of Indians, respectively; the unassigned portion of which extends from the Canadian River on the south to the Cimarron River on the north, and from the country of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes on the west to the country occupied by the Iowas, Kickapoos, and Pottawatomies on the east.

And if Senators will take the trouble to look at the map furnished by the Interior Department in which the boundaries of Oklahoma are definitely described, they will find that in order to go to that country it is necessary to go from the borders of Kansas one hundred and twenty-one miles through the Cherokee country west of where the civilized Cherokees now reside in order to reach this debatable land, Oklahoma. As I have stated, its boundary on the south is the Canadian River, on the north the Cimarron, on the west the reservation of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, who were intended to be located on the line of the State of Kansas. They were taken there by General Sheridan, at their own request, and placed down south of the Cimarron River, where they have remained ever since. This country known as Oklahoma originally embraced a little less than 5,000 square miles of territory. A large portion of it is represented as possessing a most delightful climate.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to inquire whether I understood him to say it is 5,000 square miles in area?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. The Secretary of the Interior reports that it contains 1,210,000 acres. Five thousand square miles would be more than that.

Mr. VEST. I speak of what was known as Oklahoma proper prior to the time that the western portion of it was set off for Indian tribes.

Mr. DAWES. I have before me a map furnished by the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of last winter, giving the boundaries of Oklahoma. It is bounded in this map on the north by the Cimarron River, on the east by what is now occupied by the Iowas, Kickapoos, and Pottawatomies, on the south by the Canadian River, and on the west by what is occupied by the Cheyennes and Arapahoes.

Mr. VEST. The present boundaries.

Mr. DAWES. That area is stated by the Secretary in this same document to contain 1,210,000 acres.

Mr. VEST. That is correct, I have no doubt.

Mr. DAWES. Five thousand square miles would contain three times that.

Mr. VEST. Certainly; but I spoke of Oklahoma as originally known. Since that time the Sacs and Foxes, the Seminoles, the Pottawatomies, the Kickapoos and Iowas, Cheyennes and Arapahoes have all been located within the original boundaries.

Mr. DAWES. In the Secretary's estimate that part is taken out.

Mr. VEST. That part is now taken out.

Mr. DAWES. And I understand that those parts are occupied by Indians under executive orders.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; they are. The Senator from Massachusetts has correctly given the boundaries as they are, south by the Canadian River, north by the Cimarron, west by the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, and east by the Iowas, Kickapoos, and Pottawatomies.

Now, Mr. President, the difficulty in regard to this matter arises under a clause in the treaty of 1866 made between the United States and the Creek Nation of Indians and a treaty made in August of the same year between the United States and the Seminoles. I ask the attention of Senators to this clause, because here is the whole difficulty, and upon this a plausible pretext has originated for leading people into that territory on the ground that it is open to settlement, homestead and pre-emption. The third article of the treaty of 1866 with the Creeks is:

> In compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon, the Creeks hereby cede and convey to the United States, to be sold to and used as homes for such other civilized Indians as the United States may choose to settle thereon, the west half of their entire domain, to be divided by a line running north and south.

I have examined the contemporaneous debate, and in my opinion the intention of the Senate of the United States, when it used the word "freedmen" in these treaties, was to include all the freedmen in all the States of the Union. The idea then existed that public policy demanded that the negroes emancipated by the proclamation of President Lincoln could be colonized in the Indian Territory and segregated to themselves. It is unnecessary to say that it was a great mistake, and no man who knew the negroes ever conceived that such a thing was possible, that they ever could be taken from the homes they then had and colonized in any such way. But that was the intention unquestionably. Afterward, Mr. Schurz, Secretary of the Interior, when the question first came up under the raid of Captain Payne, now dead, construed this section of the treaty to mean the freedmen among the five civilized tribes.

These Indians were slave-owners, and they divided in the war just as their white brethren did in the border States, a large number participating with the confederacy and raising troops for the confederate army. They were slave-owners, and at the close of the war had a large number of freedmen among them. Mr. Schurz, I think, improperly construed this clause of the treaty to mean the freedmen among the Indians themselves. But even these were not colonized.

The Creeks conveyed this land at 30 cents an acre, subject only to one condition, and that was that the United States should only settle upon it Indians from the plains and freedmen. Whatever may be the technical right of this matter, no lawyer, I undertake to say, would, as between man and man, between one citizen and another, hold that the land belongs to the United States without condition. No court of equity would refuse to carry out the conditions of this grant. If it were a case between individuals, one of whom accepted the grant under those conditions, and afterward undertook to violate them, any court of equity would interfere and cause him to carry out the terms of the grant. There would be a perfect estoppel to his doing aught else; he would be prevented from saying that was not his contract and not his understanding.

The Government of the United States made this treaty with these Indians, and bought from the Creeks 3,260,560 acres, at 30 cents an acre, amounting to $978,168. We have paid this or secured it to their satisfaction. After we have made that treaty, we can no more tear up its conditions, and say that we can put upon those lands anybody that we please, than an individual who had bought a piece of property for a certain expressed use could ignore that use and say it was his illimitably and in fee. It is in fact a conditional fee. The land was sold to the United States under certain conditions and for certain purposes. Only Indians or freedmen were to go on the land. What man has a right to say they would have sold for 30 cents an acre if they thought that white men with their acquisitive propensities were to become their immediate neighbors?

It seems to me a question too plain for argument. When I saw some weeks since in the public prints that a United States judge in Kansas had made a decision that these lands were open to settlement, I could not believe it, and I venture to say no man on the bench has ever made such a declaration. I have read the opinion delivered by Judge Foster. It decides nothing else except that persons going in there were subject to a penalty. It does not pretend to say, and I undertake to say that no judge who wears the ermine to-day will ever say that under present laws white men have a right to go into that territory and make settlements.

We purchased from the Seminoles by the treaty of August, 1866, 2,169,080 acres of land, at 15 cents an acre, making $325,362, which we have paid. We have acquired from the two tribes 5,419,640 acres of land in the middle of the temperate zone, as fair as any upon which the sun has ever shone, for $1,303,530. Yet the greed of our people is such that they propose to break through these treaties—for the Seminole treaty contains the same provisions with the Creek treaty—go on this land before it is surveyed, take possession of it in defiance of the proclamation of the President and of the law and treaties, and appropriate it to their own use.

This is the whole of this question. It seems to me that Congress should meet it now fairly and openly in accordance with our honor as a people, in accordance with the strict faith of the nation. The story of our dealings with the red man is a sad one. I do not propose to use any rhetoric about it. It is a story that beggars rhetoric. No mortal man can do justice to the terrible wrongs inflicted on those people. It is enough to say now that we ought to deal with them equitably and honestly, and it can be done in but one way. They have rights in this land. They have the right—call it residuary or contingent or uncertain interest, or what you may—to say that none except Indians and freedmen shall be located on this territory. That right can be purchased. This land was sold at a price ridiculously low, if it was to be regarded as a sale of the fee. There is but one way for us to act as a great people of overwhelming power, and that is to go to these friendly Indians and say to their authorities who are struggling day by day, advancing slowly and gradually, "We come to deal with you now as if you were one of the greatest and most powerful nationalities on the face of the earth; not even the lion of England shall receive more deference." My view is that if we will so treat these people we can acquire their interest, whatever it is, in this land, and remove from controversy this question that will be settled in blood unless it is settled by law. Congress a few years ago, I believe in 1875, prohibited the further introduction of Indians from the plains into this territory.

That does not affect the question of these treaties. If we have no further use for that country for the Indians of the plains, that does not give us the right to put upon it our own citizens, independent of the claim set up under the treaties which I have read.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the relations of the United States to the Indian Territory have at last forced themselves upon the attention of the country. No one connected with Indian matters in the Senate, at least since I have been a member, has failed to try to arrest the attention of the Senate in reference to those peculiar relations session after session, but hitherto without avail. Matters have been left to drift and to drift in precisely the same direction as has alarmed every one who has had anything to do with the subject, until it is presented to us now whether we shall indifferently stand by and see it settled by force and perhaps by bloodshed. For one, I am obliged to both the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Missouri for bringing the matter before the Senate in the manner in which they have done, and for the apparent spirit and the real spirit, so far as I know, which actuates them, for I confess that I have not been able heretofore to make any Senator think there was any occasion to look very seriously into this matter.

The resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas I said yesterday I thought might result in this good: that it would give the President of the United States, while asserting the supremacy of the law, another opportunity to call the attention in the most formal and serious manner of those affected by his proclamation to the clear and unquestioned position in which they have put themselves of violation of the law, and trust to the effect of such a renewed proclamation upon them to obviate the necessity of force and possible bloodshed, for the supremacy of the law is the one thing about which we can raise no possible question. That must be maintained by the President of the United States at whatever cost; but every one must be desirous, while maintaining the supremacy of the law, to find some way of doing it without the sad result of bloodshed.

There are two classes of people down in Oklahoma defying the authority of the United States. One of them is the leaders who have gone there with their eyes open and with full knowledge, and, as I am credibly informed, largely as a matter of speculation and revenue. The other is their followers, innocent but deluded people, anxious to obtain homes upon the public land, and only knowing that here is desirable land, unoccupied, which they are told by their leaders is public land and whom their leaders have undertaken for a specified sum per capita paid into their treasury to take upon that land and to maintain them there. The leaders have been from time to time prosecuted, under such laws as the United States have, for trespass. I see in the public papers Congress arraigned for not having provided laws sufficient to punish these trespassers upon the public land. That charge does not lie against the Senate of the United States, for repeatedly the Senate of the United States has passed a bill providing for the punishment of such trespassers by imprisonment as well as fine. More than a year ago, during this Congress, the Senate passed such a bill, which remains elsewhere unacted upon. If that had been passed into a law when it was first reported here, three or four years ago, and these leaders had been punished under it, not only by fine but by imprisonment, the three or four hundred innocent and honest followers of these men would have been kept from the trouble they are in now. The blame, therefore, does not lie at the door of the Senate. It has done everything in its power to furnish the Executive with authority to punish efficiently these leaders. It is in order that the President may have the opportunity to show these leaders what will be the consequences of their persisting in this violation of the law, as well as their innocent and deluded followers the consequences of continuing to follow the advice of these leaders, that I think good will come from the adoption of the resolution proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

There is another class of citizens, much larger, to whom also in my opinion it will be serviceable, and that is that large class of citizens, especially residing in the Western country, desirous of taking up homes upon the unoccupied lands of the United States as soon as they can lawfully, in conformity with law; but the policy of the Government and the treatment of such cases by the Government have been such as to lead them to believe that the only man who can secure a desirable homestead upon the public land is the man who first gets upon it, whether he get upon it in conformity with the law or not, and this large class of our fellow-citizens complain and rightfully complain that, after persons have gone on in violation of law and got possession the Government, when it comes to open the territory, recognizes those persons to the exclusion of the honest citizen who will not violate the law and seems to himself to have as good a right certainly as a trespasser to occupy the public land. Now, I want the President of the United States in some form, in his proclamation, to assure the law-abiding citizens of this country who are desirous to go upon the public land that the violators of the law shall not profit to their exclusion by getting upon any unoccupied land in violation of the law; and therefore these three classes of our citizens, the larger one conforming to the law, another class following leaders who know better, and the leaders themselves, shall have brought to their minds distinctly the consequences of this persistence in the violation of the law.

I see that the Legislature of one of the largest of the Western States yesterday denounced the exclusion of these people from this territory and called upon Congress at once to open it.

Mr. ALLISON. What State?

Mr. DAWES. The Legislature of Kansas. In the other branch (if I may be allowed to allude to it), the day before yesterday the proceedings of a public meeting, held at a court-house in one of the large and populous counties of one of the Western States, were put upon the record there, in which they denounced this attempt of the President of the United States by force to exclude their fellow-citizens from occupying this land.

That is a spirit which a proper proclamation from the President of the United States may do something toward allaying; something toward showing those who promote it that they are putting themselves on the side of the violators of law. I desire that the President may have the occasion, which such a resolution may offer, to present again to all these classes of citizens, for such consideration as each from his standpoint will be likely to give to it, the consequences of this attempt not only to violate the law but to defy the force of the United States sent there to enforce the law. I hope it will have the effect and save us, therefore, from the sad and deplorable consequences which must ensue.

It may not be improper to allude to the fact that I see already printed circulars sent among the followers of these men and among the people in the States, who as good citizens refuse to violate the law but are as anxious to better themselves by making new homes as anybody, urging them to hold on to this position until the 5th of March as if this trouble could be devised by an outgoing administration to an incoming one. I do not for a moment believe that there is any possibility of anything being gained by the breakers of the law by any such suggestion as that. Those who will take charge of this Government after the 4th of March will in my judgment be as much disposed as anybody else to enforce the laws while they remain upon the statute-book, and these poor people are being further deluded, in my opinion, if they are deluded with the idea that it is possible for them to maintain under any incoming administration any violation of the law with impunity.

But, sir, the resolution of the Senator from Missouri opens up another subject and looks to what is ultimately to be done with these lands, and that is a subject which is forced by this condition of things upon the attention of the Senate, and I trust will hold its place in the consideration of the Senate until some proper disposition shall have been made of it. Here is a large tract of land, a million and a quarter acres, more or less, as fine land as is in any part of the Indian Territory unoccupied, of no use for the purposes for which it was obtained and in all probability never likely to be appropriated for those purposes. There is other land in the Territory, much larger tracts of land, similarly situated; and what is to be done with that land is a serious question embraced within the resolution of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to make a suggestion——

Mr. DAWES. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I notice that the resolution of the Senator from Missouri proposes to initiate at once negotiations with a view to securing an absolute title to this strip called Oklahoma. If those negotiations should be instituted and brought to a conclusion, the Government would find itself in the ownership of a strip of land in the interior of the Indian Territory cut off from everywhere else. So that can not be considered separately.

Mr. DAWES. I was about to say when I was interrupted, properly enough, by the Senator from Indiana, that Oklahoma is a little tract of land very nearly in the center of the Indian Territory, like that label on that book [exhibiting]; a little over a million acres of land located very nearly in the center of the Indian Territory. There is above it one tract of land, between it and Kansas, over 6,000,000 acres, a tract a good deal larger than the whole State of Massachusetts, on which there is not a dwelling of an Indian or of a white man save the cowboys who take care of the cattle grazing there under one single lease. That land is, I say, unoccupied by white people, unoccupied by Indians, and in the future, according to the best reasoning as to the prospects of the Indian race, never to be occupied by the Indians.

The last of the many policies the United States have undertaken to adopt toward the Indian race, after having tried all others and failed, is to set him up for himself on just so much land, and no more, as he can himself profitably use for his own maintenance. That leaves on all the Indian reservations all over the United States vast tracts of land that can never be used for such purpose by the Indian, and yet to which the Indian has in many cases a perfect title, in all of them some sort of qualified title. With this large tract above Oklahoma left, we are asked to open to public settlement this region in the very heart of the Indian Territory, a project which every one will see in a moment is utterly impracticable if you stop there. It is surrounded by Indians and one hundred and fifty miles from a State on the one side and two hundred miles on the east, and I do not know how much on the south. It is utterly impracticable to have a settlement or a colony of white people of the United States there, over whom the laws of the United States and among whom the courts of the United States must be established—utterly impossible unless you go further.

The title to this land was ceded to the United States for one purpose, and one only, by the Creeks and Cherokees. All the vast tract above it is substantially in the same condition, though not granted in the same words. The Cherokees have covenanted with the United States by treaty that the United States may have all that vast tract for the same purpose. It is true, I think, as the Senator from Missouri says, that when the purpose was stated to be that of settling friendly Indians and freedmen, it did not contemplate the settlement of freedmen from the States, but only those who were freedmen in the Indian Territory itself. The same treaty provided, however, and imposed the obligation upon the five tribes, to take care of the freedmen themselves, with the stipulation that if the tribes did not take care of the freedmen, then the United States would take care of them upon this land. They have undertaken, after their manner, to take care of the freedmen. They have not accomplished it, but they have undertaken it. There have been no freedmen settled on this land. There never will be any. They do not care to go there. They will not separate themselves from those through whose blood they came into existence and whose blood they share with the tribes. They prefer to stay where they are. So it never can be used for that purpose.

In my opinion—I agree with the Senator from Missouri and with the Senator from Kansas—sooner or later the white man as a settler will take possession of this land. How is he going to obtain it? We are called upon to open it by a statute, but the title to it does not belong to us. Within the last twenty years we have covenanted by treaty that it shall never be occupied by white men, and yet we are called upon to disregard that treaty. In matters of great importance, where we think treaties are in the way, matters of vastly more importance than this, we may with propriety hesitate lest we violate a treaty; but here is a treaty lying across our path, executed with equal solemnity and with only this difference, that it is with a weak people while other treaties that are in the way of larger enterprises are with powerful nations and we hesitate when we come to them.

I am for the policy suggested by the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, but I want it applied to all that land. It would be utterly impracticable and it would be nonsense to attempt to open Oklahoma, a little patch in the center of the Indian Territory, if by fair and honest negotiation with the Creeks and Seminoles we can obtain the absolute title free from condition. We must have with it the 6,000,000 acres between it and Kansas, and we can obtain that and obtain this title from the Creeks and Seminoles if we will negotiate with them as we negotiate with powerful peoples, fairly, honestly, and frankly. If the Senator from Missouri will make his resolution broad enough to embrace all the lands now liable to be occupied by Indians and freedmen, and not needed by the United States for that purpose, although the cattle-men have now got all of them as well in Oklahoma as the rest surrounded by wire fences, to open negotiations with those who hold the title, open them fairly and frankly and honestly, as I have no doubt the incoming administration will feel it its duty to do if it does it—and whatever is done must be done under that administration—I have confidence enough in the future to believe that the day has passed when any man, any official in this country, desires longer to wrong the Indian. Daylight has been so poured in upon transactions with the Indians that it is not safe longer to pursue the policy of stealing their lands and robbing them.

Let us, therefore, recognize the necessity of opening these lands sooner or later to settlement, and let us clear the way by honest and fair negotiation. Let us not do as we have done within the last two years here in the Senate, when the United States bound itself by solemn covenant with these people that it would not cut railroads through their country and then undertook to assert its right of eminent domain after we had covenanted that we would not exercise it. The people of the country looking around and seeing the United States itself trampling on its own treaties may well infer that they may do likewise, and do with impunity what the United States has set up in this Chamber its right to do. Let us deal with the Indians having had the fee to this territory granted to them, dealt with them with regard to the vast regions to which they held the fee in the States—let us deal with them fairly, extinguishing their title for what will in the public judgment be deemed a fair and honest consideration for it, and let us then open the land so acquired to the homesteader who obeys and observes the law, and not give it to the trespassers who go in in violation of the law and take possession of the land, and then come here and obtain, if possible, some consideration as innocent settlers; often they are, but more often they are like the leaders of this Oklahoma band, going in for the purpose of getting possession and claiming the benefit of a homestead to be given them by the United States as apparently honest settlers.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Missouri, whose attention I should like for a moment, exhibited to us a map of the Indian Territory, and I find in the center of that a yellow spot, relatively insignificant, designated as Oklahoma. I wish to know whether there is any legal authority anywhere for calling any portion of that Territory Oklahoma, whether Oklahoma has any legal definition or limits of nature, or whether that is the name given by cattle-raisers who have seized a piece of land there, or has the Secretary of the Interior out of his own brain devised the name?

Mr. VEST. There is no authority of law for that name. It originated, I believe, with Colonel Boudinot, a Cherokee, and it was used first in a proposed act of Congress in the bill introduced by Mr. Franklin, a Member from Missouri, for establishing a Territorial government in the Indian Territory, to be called Oklahoma. The original signification of the name in the Cherokee tongue, I believe, is the home of the red man; and therefore the white men want it. That is the meaning of it, I believe.

Mr. HARRISON. I wanted to make an inquiry and I think a practical suggestion in connection with this matter. I believe there was a petition presented asking Congress to take some action with a view to opening this tract of country for settlement; and that it was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Now, I think if that committee would promptly report back that petition unfavorably with a resolution declaring it to be the sense of the Senate that that land is not open to settlement——

Mr. DAWES. I call the attention of my colleague upon the committee to a report which I hold in my hand, No. 64 of the last session, upon that petition, made by our colleague on the left [Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin], in which that very conclusion was reached.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true, but that has become a little musty and the subject is brought to our attention again by this. I believe if such a resolution could be again reported, could be voted upon in the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote, and a practically unanimous expression of this body given on the subject, it would do a great deal toward preventing that armed collision which is imminent now in the territory.

Mr. MAXEY. I think this a fit occasion for the Senate of the United States to put their seal of condemnation upon organized lawlessness. The territory of Oklahoma is not subject to location, to entry, or to private sale or public sale. It has not been surveyed, sectionized, or subdivided. Those who go there know that they go in utter violation of the law of this land, and if they are permitted to violate the law and stay in that country, and the Senate of the United States refuses to prevent it, it seems to me we present the humiliating spectacle of tolerating or acquiescing in a violation of the laws that we have made.

If the territory of Oklahoma can be settled by parties going in there, then there is a large tract of country lying south of the south boundary of Kansas and north of the north line of the panhandle of Texas, about sixty miles wide, as large as an ordinary-sized State, which has never been surveyed or sectionized, and which may in like manner be invaded and settled upon by these lawless people, and between the ninety-eighth degree of west longitude and the one hundredth degree of west longitude is another immense tract of territory west of the Chickasaw Nation and east of the east line of the panhandle of Texas, which to-day belongs to the United States and has not been surveyed or sectionized; and if you permit the invasion of Oklahoma the same principle would apply to all that great body of land lying between the north line of Texas and the south line of Kansas and between the west line of the Chickasaw Nation and the east line of Texas, and what will you do?

The five civilized tribes, so called, are doing their best to become civilized and enlightened, and if this country is ever opened up to settlement, as in all human probability it will be, surveyed, and sectionized, and subdivided, and the people of the United States by law invited to go and settle there, instead of getting honest neighbors, as they would if the law was obeyed, these Indians get settled all around them lawless depredators, and thus instead of having the hand of help extended to those civilized tribes by the people of the United States we sit here and permit a violation of our own laws, and have these people surrounded by lawless men.

Mr. President, such a policy will not do, and I say this is an occasion when the Senate of the United States ought in the most emphatic manner to put its seal of condemnation upon all this lawless invasion of territories which are not open to settlement and which belong to the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. I had not in mind in the introduction of this resolution that such a debate would follow. I thought the condition of things which existed in the new territory, and of which we were advised by telegraphic dispatches in the daily newspapers, warranted the Senate in making the inquiry of the President in regard to the facts, as he understood them to be, in order that we might ascertain if on the basis of those facts we should undertake legislation, or whether there was anything which ought to be done to meet the situation as presented. I do not desire to enter into the debate after so much has been said by others upon this subject, especially after the exposition given of the status of these lands by the Senator from Missouri. But I desire to say that it is plain that some people have gone in there who are undoubtedly honestly of the opinion that they have a right to be there, and some others probably who have a different view of their rights, but it is impossible to distinguish one class from the other in dealing with them, whether we do it by the armed forces of the United States or otherwise. But the fact that men are there believing they have a right to be there, that by various processes which have been put forth and by arguments which have been addressed in various places and which have been published in regard to the status of these lands known as the Oklahoma lands, these people have come to believe honestly that they are entitled to go there, is unquestionable.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator how they can possibly think they have a right to be there when they have been notified in every conceivable way, and even by armed force, that they have no right to be there.

Mr. PLUMB. I will come to that in a moment. As I said, the fact that they are there, that they are American citizens, that their offense is apparently venial at worst, entitles them to more than a passing consideration. It has received such at the hands of the Senate, and I am glad of it. As I said in the beginning, I did not expect the resolution to lead to debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent to have the special order informally set aside.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope that request will be granted.

Mr. PLUMB. I think we can get rid of the resolution in a few moments.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate, and then unanimous consent undoubtedly will be given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be laid before the Senate, being the bill (H. R. 5461) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the special order be informally laid aside in order that the consideration of the resolution may continue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. CULLOM. Has the Senator any idea how long the debate will last?

Mr. PLUMB. I think five or ten minutes will dispose of the question. I shall detain the Senate but a moment myself.

The reason for the belief these people have is, in the first place, the fact that the United States Government acquired these lands for a purpose which it afterward abandoned, and that it has paid for the lands or substantially paid for them. That carries the conviction to these people that the Indians, not having the right themselves to go upon the lands and use them by reason of the fact that the Government has purchased them, became subject to the general laws of the United States, which provide that the public lands shall be open to homestead and pre-emption settlement. That has been amplified in a great many ways to make it effective. In addition to that, it was currently reported last fall that Judge Foster, of the district court for the district of Kansas, had decided in a case brought in the name of the United States against certain persons who had been trespassing upon these lands, that the lands were public lands of the United States and open to settlement. I heard that that opinion had been rendered and made inquiry and ascertained that no such opinion had been rendered, but that the prisoner had been discharged, and that out of that had grown perhaps the belief that Judge Foster's decision was to that effect. Some time since, for the purpose of ascertaining exactly what the judge did decide in the opinion formally rendered, I sent to the district attorney for the district of Kansas and asked him for a copy of the opinion, which I have, and if the Senate does not desire to hear it I ask that it be incorporated in the RECORD.

The paper is as follows:

United States district court, district of Kansas.

The United States vs. David L. Payne et al. On motion to quash indictment.

J. R. Hallowell, United States attorney, for United States; J. W. McDonald, attorney for defendants.

The indictment in this case charges the defendants with conspiracy, and confederating together to commit an offense against the United States, under chapter 8, Supplement Revised Statutes, 484. The offense alleged in brief is that the defendants conspired and confederated together among themselves and with other persons to enter upon and make settlement on certain lands belonging, secured, and granted by treaty of the United States to certain Indian tribes, and lying between the Canadian and North Fork of the Canadian Rivers in the Indian Territory, and commonly known as the Oklahoma lands, and also having before that time been removed from the Indian country by the military forces of the United States, did conspire and confederate together and with other persons to return to said Indian country, commonly known as the Oklahoma country, and also to enter upon lands known as the Cherokee strip or outlet in said Indian country, and charging defendants with certain overt acts to effect the object of said conspiracy, &c.

The law concerning the entering and making settlement on Indian lands is found in section 2118, Revised Statutes United States, page 370, title 38, and reads as follows: "Every person who makes a settlement on any lands belonging, secured, or granted by treaty with the United States to any Indian tribe, or surveys or attempts to survey such lands, or to designate any of the boundaries by marking trees, or otherwise, is liable to a penalty of $1,000. The President may, moreover, take such measures and employ such military force as he may judge necessary to remove any such person from the lands."

The law concerning the removal of persons from the Indian country further provides as follows:

"SEC. 2147. The Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and the Indian agents and subagents, shall have authority to remove from the Indian country all persons found therein contrary to law, and the President is authorized to direct the military force to be employed in such removal.

"SEC. 2148. If any person who has been removed from the Indian country shall thereafter at any time return or be found within the Indian country, he shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000."

It will be observed that the law fixes a penalty of $1,000 in either case, and section 2124 defines how this penalty shall be enforced. It reads as follows:

"All penalties which shall accrue under this title shall be sued for and recovered in an action in the nature of an action of debt, in the name of the United States, before any court having jurisdiction of the same, in any State or Territory in which the defendant shall be arrested or found, the one half to the use of the informer and the other half to the use of the United States, except when the prosecution shall be first instituted on behalf of the United States, in which case the whole shall be to their use."

The act to accomplish which this conspiracy was formed, i. e., to make settlement on Indian lands and to return to the Indian country after being removed therefrom, might be termed an offense against the United States, but it is evidently not an indictable offense, nor could it be prosecuted by criminal proceedings. It is an offense created by statute, with a definite penalty attached and the mode prescribed for enforcing the penalty.

The prosecution may be instituted by any informer, and this because it is a qui tam action. We find all through the acts of Congress a distinction made between prosecutions for crimes and offenses, and suits for penalties and forfeitures. Thus, in defining the jurisdiction of the district court (Revised Statutes, section 563) after defining its jurisdiction of crimes and offenses, it reads as follows: "Third. Of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under any law of the United States." Again, in defining the jurisdiction of the circuit court (Revised Statutes, section 629) subdivision 20 gives the circuit court jurisdiction with the district court of crimes and offenses, &c., but in subdivision 4 of the same section, defining suits of which the court shall have jurisdiction, it expressly excepts from the circuit court jurisdiction of suits for penalties and forfeitures. In section 711, defining the general jurisdiction of the United States courts, this distinction is again observed. Section 732 provides where such suits may be brought. Section 1047 prescribes the period of limitation in such suits. There are various penalties prescribed for violations of the internal revenue and navigation laws, and sections 3213 and 4234 appertain to that subject. From these several provisions of the statutes I am of opinion that the acts charged do not show a conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States within the meaning of the conspiracy clause, chapter 8, Supplement Revised Statutes, and for this reason these indictments must be quashed.

Mr. PLUMB. It does not decide in any way that the lands are public lands of the United States of the character of lands which are open to homestead and pre-emption entry. It does not decide anything about the character of the lands whatever. If there is anything in it which does bear on that question it is that they are a part of the Indian country, as that term is used in the statutes, and that they are lands from which the President may, under the law, remove persons whom he may characterize as intruders and who are there in violation of the intercourse act of the United States; but the case went off on the proposition that the action was one for a penalty alone, a qui tam action, and that consequently there was no indictable offense, and on that theory of the case the persons who had been indicted and arrested were discharged.

The effect given to that decision or the report of that decision has done a great deal and possibly more than almost anything else to convey the idea that these lands were open to settlement; but the opinion itself has not so far as I know ever been published, and consequently there has been no means at hand readily of disputing what has been alleged as to the character of the decision.

I differ, Mr. President, with the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to the rights of the United States in these lands. My own belief is that these lands may be opened to settlement by Congress and the President, without the consent of the Indians. In pursuance of that belief I introduced a bill at the last session of Congress which not only provides for the opening of these lands to settlement, but which embraces besides the instruction to the President contained in the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri except that it goes further and requires the President of the United States to inaugurate measures looking to the diminution of all the reservations in the Indian Territory which are in excess of the needs of the Indians and the acquisition of the lands by the Government for the purpose of opening them to settlement. I believe that now either by resolution or law the President ought to be advised to take such action not only in regard to these so-called Oklahoma lands, but in regard to all the reservations in the Indian Territory which in his judgment are in excess of the needs of the Indians in whose occupancy they are to-day.

Some action of this kind must at some time be taken. The interposition of the Indian Territory, of an unoccupied section of country, as a barrier to the commerce between great States, has become a source of irritation, of loss, of constant inconvenience, which the people are restive under and do not wish any longer to exist if they can help it; and this will amount to a condition of public opinion in the West principally and to some extent in the entire country, that will compel substantially something to be done. I do not mean to say that it shall be done without the consent of the Indians, but I believe that the Indians themselves will come to see, under the persuasive power of the President and under the force of this aroused public opinion, that their interests lie in the direction of concession on this point, and therefore we shall be rid shortly of this anomalous condition of things and shall have the power to open up to the landless people of the United States a large body of very fine land on which they will be able and also willing to make homes, and I hope that this discussion will tend strongly in that direction.

I trust that this discussion will lead to some action of that kind to be taken by the present Congress, and that we shall not dwell on this matter and carry it over from session to session to be confronted each year with just the condition of things we are confronted with now, with men who, however they may be violating the law, are still in a measure by reason of the purpose or alleged purpose for which they go there entitled to some degree of sympathy and consideration, and because of the further fact that it is confessed everywhere that this land is not to be used any more for the purpose for which it was originally acquired, and that following the universal practice of the Government from time immemorial all such lands have been brought under conditions for settlement. As this must so come soon, it is better it should come now right away, and thus avoid these constant conflicts and these alarms on the borders, when people are there seeking this land which they think the Government is unnecessarily and unwisely holding from settlement.

I believe this can all be done with due regard to the interests of the Indians; I believe it can be done with a due regard to the obligations of the Government to the Indians. I believe there is a peaceful and a proper and a just solution of all this question if only we move in time. But as I have had occasion to say before, if we withhold action too long we may sometimes be under constraint to act promptly and to some extent perhaps unjustly, acting under the pressure of an emergency which our own delay has brought to pass.

Now, I may say one thing in regard to the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Connecticut, in addition to what the Senator from Missouri has said about Oklahoma. The map which the Senator from Connecticut saw, and which bears on it, I think, the name of Oklahoma as applied to a tract of land, was not a creation of the Interior Department—that is to say, the Interior Department did not put that name upon it. That name, Oklahoma, is not part or parcel of the records of the Government at all, and is in no way an official designation of that section of country, but it has become a designation in the local vernacular which applies to that particular tract of land, and generally also in a measure to the entire Indian Territory. But what is known as Oklahoma now for the purposes of this controversy is a limited area of land, stated by the Senator from Massachusetts as being about a million and a quarter acres. There is some doubt, I think, as to whether it covers quite so much, but at all events not more. It is a tract of land which I understand is not occupied either by Indians or white men, and is in no sense encumbered by any occupancy of anybody claiming a right to be there, except as it is occupied by the persons who are now there as colonists claiming the right to settle.

The Senator from Missouri stated, I believe, in the opening of his remarks that he did not desire to have the resolution which he offered yesterday proposed as a substitute for the one which I offered, but that he would permit his to come up as a separate measure. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to the passage of the resolution I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes the consideration of the bill to regulate interstate commerce.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senate is ready to vote on the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the unfinished business was laid aside simply for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Kansas to finish his remarks.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope we shall reach a conclusion on this resolution. I do not think we have anything more important before us. It need not take long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection——

Mr. VEST. If the resolution is to go over until to-morrow, I have not the slightest objection to extending the resolution that I offered so as to cover all that territory and to bring the whole question up, if it is the wish of the Senate, in such a form that we can dispose of it at once. I can arrange the resolution that I offered so as to cover all these points by to-morrow, and by that time we can take a vote on both resolutions.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not see any necessary connection between the two. I do not propose delay; and as my resolution calls for information merely, I think it would be better to have that information to-day rather than to-morrow, or to-morrow rather than next day. If it is important to have it at all, let us have it now.

Mr. VEST. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. PLUMB. The other resolution, which relates to something in the future, can of course come up as a separate measure.

Mr. VEST. Very good. With the understanding, then, that the resolution I offered will come up to-morrow, I am perfectly willing to have a vote on the resolution of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri withdraw his amendment?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I desire to offer the resolution which I submitted as an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Kansas as an original resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As a joint resolution?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

The joint resolution (S. R. 113) in relation to certain lands in the Indian Territory acquired by the United States from the Creek and Seminole Indians was read twice by its title.

Mr. VEST. Let it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will lie on the table.

MOTHER OF J. P. RINGGOLD.

Mr. MCMILLAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN TEXAS AND INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up, for the purpose of moving concurrence in the Senate amendment, House bill 1565—a bill to authorize the appointment of a commission by the President of the United States to run and mark the boundary lines between a portion of the Indian Territory and the State of Texas, in connection with a similar commission to be appointed by the State of Texas.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have the amendments read?

Mr. LANHAM. I do not, unless there is some special request for the reading.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Let us have them read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to detail one or more officers of the Army, who, in conjunction with such person or persons as may be appointed by the State of Texas, shall ascertain and mark the point where the one hundredth meridian of longitude crosses Red River, in accordance with the terms of the treaty aforesaid; and the person or persons appointed by virtue of this act shall make report of his or their action in the premises to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall transmit the same to Congress at the next session thereof after such report may be made for action by Congress.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the War Department, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of the United States in carrying out the provisions of this act.

Amend the preamble so as to read as follows:

Whereas the treaty between the United States and Spain executed February 22, 1819, fixed the boundary line between the two countries west of the Mississippi River as follows: Beginning on the Gulf of Mexico at the mouth of the Sabine River, in the sea, and continuing north along the western bank of that river to the thirty-second degree of latitude; thence by a line due north to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Nachitoches, or Red River; thence following the course of the Rio Roxo westward to the one hundredth degree of longitude west from London and the twenty-third from Washington; thence crossing the said Red River and running thence by a line due north to the river Arkansas; thence following the course of the southern bank of the Arkansas to its source in latitude 42 degrees north; and thence by that parallel of latitude to the South Sea; the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818; and

Whereas a controversy exists between the United States and Texas as to the point where the one hundredth degree of longitude crosses the Red River, as described in the treaty; and

Whereas the point of crossing has never been ascertained and fixed by any authority competent to bind the United States and Texas; and

Whereas it is desirable that a settlement of this controversy should be had, to the end that the question of boundary, now in dispute because of a difference of opinion as to said crossing, may also be settled: Therefore, &c.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust, before that is done, the gentleman from Texas will explain the effect of these amendments.

Mr. LANHAM. The bill as it now comes from the Senate is in the same form as the substitute which was offered in the House at the time this bill was passed. The Senate committee after considering the House bill reported in favor of the adoption of this substitute, which is identical, word for word, with that offered on behalf of the Judiciary Committee by Mr. Willits in the Forty-seventh Congress, and offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] in the present Congress when this bill was under consideration in the House at the last session. The bill as now amended is not in all respects the bill we would desire, and is not entirely approved by me, for the reasons I have heretofore stated; but it seems to be the only legislation on the subject which can now be had, and may offer some possible solution of the question. Therefore I have moved to concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. LANHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND GRANT TO RAILROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. COBB. I rise to present a privileged report from a committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain land granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to all the amendments of the Senate to said bill, and agree to the same.

T. R. COBB,
BARCLAY HENLEY,
L. D. PAYSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. H. SLATER,
J. N. DOLPH,
P. B. PLUMB,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STENOGRAPHER IN HOT SPRINGS INVESTIGATION.

Mr. STORM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That there is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House a sum sufficient to pay for the service of stenographer to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, in addition to the amount heretofore allowed said committee for payment of expenses of investigation of Hot Springs matters, as directed by resolution of the House; said payment to said stenographer to be upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee and by the chairman of the Committee on Accounts.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4681) for the relief of Yost Harbaugh.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 200) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Mo.; and

A bill (S. 1025) for the relief of William Ervin.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. WELLBORN in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7970) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

The pending amendment was the following:

After line 503 insert as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of the Interior to appraise and sell, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to provide for the sale of a part of the reservation of the Omaha tribe of Indians in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes,' approved August 7, 1882, that portion of said reservation in township 24, range 7 east, remaining unallotted on the 1st day of June, 1885, $1,000; said sum to be reimbursed from the fund received from the sale of said lands: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion and with the consent of the Indians, extend the time of payment for lands as fixed by section 2 of said act so that one-third of the purchase-money shall become due and payable in two years from the date when the land shall be or has been thrown open to settlement, together with one year's interest on the amount of the first installment, to be paid when entry is made, and the second installment of one-third shall become due and payable in one year, and the remaining one-third in two years from date of first payment, with interest as provided in said act. And in case of default in either of said payments or interest thereon the person thus defaulting for a period of sixty days shall forfeit absolutely his right to the tract which he has purchased and any payment or payments he may have made: Provided further, That also with the consent of the Indians the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cause to be appraised and sold to the highest bidder, under such regulations and upon such terms as to payment as he may deem to be most advantageous to the said Indians, that part or parcel of said reservation described as follows: All that portion of the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 27 and the west half of the northwest quarter of section 26, in township 25, range 6 east, lying east of the Sioux City and Nebraska Railroad, containing about fifty acres, more or less, conditioned, however, that the purchaser thereof shall erect, operate, and maintain a flouring mill thereon."

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], upon which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] reserved a point of order.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. So far as I am individually concerned, having had sufficient explanation of the subject, I am willing to withdraw my point of order—not, however, so as to prevent any other member who may not be satisfied from renewing it.

Mr. ELLIS. This amendment is right. If any explanation is desired, I will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE].

Mr. VALENTINE. I am ready to give an explanation; but I do not think any is desired. The amendment has the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Secretary of the Interior, the Indians, and all parties in interest. It has been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and has been unanimously approved at a full meeting of that committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

OTOES AND MISSOURIAS.

For third of twelve installments, being the last series, in money or otherwise, per fourth article treaty of March 15, 1854, $5,000.

Mr. WEAVER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 523 insert the following:

"The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make such extension of time for the payment of the purchase-money under the sale made under an act entitled 'An act to provide for the sale of the remainder of the reservation of the Confederate Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes,' as he may deem just to said Indians and settlers: Provided, That the interest shall be paid at the rate as now provided by said act; but the time for the payment of the whole of said purchase-money shall not be extended more than two years from the time the said purchase-money became due according to the original terms of sale under said act."

Mr. ELLIS. I have no power to accept this amendment on the part of the Committee on Appropriations; but I have examined it, and believe it to be right. It provides merely an extension of the time within which those settlers shall make payment of purchase-money for their lands.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a point of order. I can not hear what is going on, there is so much confusion. I did not hear what the gentleman from Louisiana said.

Mr. ELLIS. I will again repeat that the proposed amendment merely extends the time to certain purchasers who are settlers upon the lands sold from the Indian reservation under treaty stipulation. It is for the advantage of these men, who have been unfortunate, and are not able to meet their payments. It does no harm to anybody, and is of great good to this class of settlers. I think it should pass.

Mr. WEAVER'S amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, I have been listening attentively, but there has been so much confusion I do not know exactly where we are in the reading of the bill. I desire to offer an amendment to page 22, in lines 525 and 526. The paragraph is as follows:

For perpetual annuity, at least one-half of which is to be paid in goods and such articles as may be deemed necessary for them, per second article of treaty of September 24, 1857, $30,000.

I desire to know whether we have passed that point.

Mr. ELLIS. We have passed it.

The CHAIRMAN. By two pages.

Mr. WELLER. Is an amendment permissible at this time under the rules?

Mr. ELLIS. If germane to the pending paragraph, certainly.

Mr. WELLER. I understand the gentleman from Indiana states it would be proper to move an amendment at this time.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, if germane to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be if objected to, but if not objected to the Chair will entertain it.

Mr. WELLER. Then I offer the following amendment:

In lines 525 and 526 strike out the words "at least one-half of which is to be paid in goods and such articles as may be deemed necessary for them," and in lieu thereof to insert "payment shall be made in cash in standard silver dollars." [Laughter.]

Mr. ELLIS. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. ELLIS. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order, the paragraph having been passed.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to suggest this: that this paragraph of the bill was passed while the confusion was such I was unable to determine whether it had been passed or not. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order under the circumstances. I am able to give good and valid reasons why payment should be made to relieve the Treasury of the United States of its surplus of standard dollars.

Mr. STEELE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. ELLIS. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. WELLER. Instead of payment being made in goods out of which speculators can make rich profits.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained and the amendment is ruled out.

The Clerk read as follows:

SHOSHONES AND BANNOCKS.

Shoshones: For sixteenth of thirty installments, to purchase suits of clothing for males over 14 years of age, flannel, hose, calico, and domestics for females over the age of 12 years, and such goods as may be needed to make suits for boys and girls under the ages named, as per ninth article of treaty of July 3, 1868, $10,000.

Mr. ELLIS. The committee directed me to offer the following amendment.

At the end of line 767 add the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment by the Secretary of the Interior, to J. M. Hogan, of Stockton, Cal., the sum of $6,600 out of funds herein appropriated for Shoshone Indians, the same being a claim for damages caused by depredations of said Indians, examined, approved, allowed, and reported to Congress by the Department of the Interior, $6,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For sixteenth of thirty installments, to purchase such articles as may be considered proper by the Secretary of the Interior for persons roaming, $150,000.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to inquire whether under the treaty with these Indians $200,000 should not be appropriated. Are we not compelled by the treaty to pay that amount?

Mr. ELLIS. No, sir. You refer to the second clause on page 24.

Mr. JAMES. I refer to the treaty of April 29, 1868.

Mr. ELLIS. On what page?

Mr. JAMES. In line 804.

Mr. ELLIS. That is a flexible provision of the treaty and leaves it discretionary, and we considered this amount to be enough. There is no specific sum mentioned in the treaty.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of additional employés at the several agencies for the Sioux in Nebraska and Dakota, $20,000.

Mr. JAMES. I move to amend that by making it $25,000. There are seven agencies, and the sum appropriated is not sufficient to go around—seven agencies and 22,000 Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. JAMES. My amendment is in line 816, after the word "twenty," to insert "five;" so it will read "twenty-five thousand dollars."

Mr. ELLIS. I should like to hear the gentleman on the necessity of that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Arkansas to reserve the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Yes; I reserved the point of order, but I am willing to hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. JAMES. There are seven agencies and 22,000 Indians to be looked after in these seven agencies, and the sum allowed is not sufficient in the estimation of the Indian Commissioner to enable them to give the proper educational facilities and to have the proper number of employés.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. ELLIS. We pay an agent at each one of these agencies, and we believe $3,000 is plenty to pay for employés. If we were guided by the estimates of the Department this bill would be out of all proportion. The committee carefully considered this and believed $3,000 at each agency to be plenty. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. It is that it increases expenditures.

Mr. CHACE. That point is not well taken.

Mr. ELLIS. It is not liable to a point of order, I think.

Mr. CHACE. It is not liable to the point of order inasmuch as it does not change existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of second blacksmith, and furnishing iron, steel, and other material, per eighth article of same treaty, $2,000; in all, $1,590,300.

Mr. ELLIS. The committee direct me, Mr. Chairman, to propose an amendment to this clause, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 829 insert:

"That so much of the act approved July 4, 1884, as makes an appropriation of $10,000 for the Medewakanton band of Sioux Indians be so amended as to allow the Secretary of the Interior to disburse the same to the Medewakanton band of full-blooded Indians in Minnesota for agricultural implements, land, or cash, as in his judgment may seem best for said Indians; and of this amount $720 shall be expended to pay a practical farmer for instructing said Indians in agriculture."

Mr. ELLIS. This proposes simply to reappropriate the unexpended appropriation of last year and devote it to the civilization and instruction of these Indians. I hope it will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to pay, out of the moneys herein appropriated for the Sioux Indians, to John McCall $70, and to Mrs. John Bohl $25; the same being claims for damages caused by depredations of said Indians, and examined, approved, and reported to Congress by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. ELLIS. I am instructed by the committee to propose an amendment to come in after the words "Sioux Indians" in line 831.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Abner Lowry, sr., $2,306.60,

Mr. ELLIS. This is a depredation claim which has been examined, approved, and transmitted to Congress for payment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment to come in after line 836.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 836:

"The Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to pay, out of the moneys herein appropriated for the Sioux Indians, to George Storrs $840; the same being a claim for damages caused by depredations of said Indians, and examined, approved, and reported to Congress by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs."

Mr. ELLIS. That is right, sir; the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Louisiana, when a deduction is made from an amount appropriated to the Sioux Indians, as in this case, which is divided into many items, out of what item the deduction is to be made.

Mr. ELLIS. It will be deducted from the treaty funds, and is discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Then it would not affect certain specific appropriations like that on line 826 or 818 or 815?

Mr. ELLIS. It would not, sir.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I would inquire if the amendment which has just been offered has been passed upon by the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. WASHBURN. It has been examined and reported upon unanimously.

The amendment of Mr. WASHBURN was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For seventeenth of thirty installments, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for clothing, blankets, and such other articles as he may deem proper and necessary, under eleventh article of same treaty, $25,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend in line 861 by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "thirty;" so that it will read "thirty thousand dollars."

Article XI of the treaty referred to in this paragraph of the bill provides that a sum sufficient in the discretion of Congress, not to exceed $30,000, shall be appropriated. I claim that the amount appropriated in this clause of the bill is not sufficient and should be increased.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 861, strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty;" so that it will read, "$30,000."

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I think we have given enough for the item contemplated by this paragraph of the bill. I will state to the gentleman from New York that this article of the treaty is flexible, and does not require a specific appropriation of the sum named. We computed the number of Indians and dealt justly by them as we believe. It is the same exactly as the provision for the current year, and no deficiency has been reported. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The amendment of Mr. JAMES was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

UTES.

For fifth of ten installments, to be distributed, at the discretion of the President, to such Ute Indians as distinguish themselves by good sense, energy, and perseverance in the pursuits of civilized life and in the promotion of a good understanding between the Indians and the Government and people of the United States, $4,000.

Mr. ELLIS. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 894 insert:

"The Secretary of the Interior shall cause a complete and accurate list of all approved and pending claims of citizens on account of depredations of Indians chargeable against any treaty fund of Indians to be made and presented to Congress on or before the first Monday of December, 1885. Said list shall contain the name and address of the claimant, the date of the depredation, the date of examination and approval, by what Indians committed, what funds remain to said Indians out of any treaty stipulations and reference to the clause of the particular treaty by which the Indians agreed to pay for depredations by them committed; and said Secretary of the Interior shall also report such suggestions looking to the payment of said claims as may seem wise to him, and whether in his judgment a pro rata allowance out of the respective Indian treaty-funds to be applied to the payment of said claims can be made, and if so to what extent and in what cases."

Mr. ELLIS. The design of this amendment is to bring all the facts in regard to Indian depredations and claims of this character to the attention of Congress. It would give Congress full information in regard to their nature and in regard to their extent, so that the legislators of the future may deal intelligently with this subject. It is necessary information for Congress, and if presented in that form will facilitate the action of Congress in dealing with these questions.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana the question as to whether the provisions of this amendment are broad enough to extend into the Indian Territory proper?

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly; it covers all claims for depredations by any Indians with whom we have treaties providing for payment on account of such depredations.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Does it extend also to the payment of those claims which have been rejected by the Department in years gone by?

Mr. ELLIS. It does not.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. My judgment is the amendment ought to be broader in that regard. I know myself there are various claims of that description, some of which are being now proposed for the consideration of the various committees of Congress; and if we have this report to Congress touching these claims I think it ought to embrace all claims pending before the Department or before Congress.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I suppose the gentleman from Louisiana wants to cover all claims that have been reported to Congress by the Secretary under the law of 1872.

Mr. ELLIS. That was my intention. I have no objection, however, to broadening the provision.

Mr. MAGINNIS. If a claim comes before a committee of Congress information can be got in some other way. I think the amendment should be as the gentleman has made it.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Montana please to explain the effect of the statute to which he has referred?

Mr. MAGINNIS. About the year I have named, about 1872 or 1873, the practice of paying for these depredations out of Indian allowances was stopped by act of Congress and all claims were referred to the Secretary of the Interior to be examined, adjudicated, and reported upon to Congress; and such claims have been reported upon and no action taken upon them.

Mr. ELLIS. The Secretary was constituted the judge.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. And it is those claims favorably reported upon to which the amendment refers?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I desire to make one further inquiry: whether the claims when adjudicated unfavorably by the Secretary of the Interior are to be excluded from future consideration by Congress?

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly not.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana is correct. The subject to which it refers has been fully explained by the gentleman from Montana. I do not think the amendment to this bill should go any further than this. The claims referred to by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] have been reported with the other claims by the Secretary of the Interior to Congress; and for the information of the gentleman from Arkansas I desire to say that every session of Congress since this law was enacted the Secretary of the Interior has reported to Congress various claims that have been filed with him that have been examined by the agents among the different Indian tribes, and passed upon by the agents and then by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and then finally by the Secretary of the Interior; and they have been reported from time to time to Congress, not only approved claims and the amounts approved, but the claims that have been rejected.

Now I am well aware of the fact that there are a great many claims that ought to have been passed; but this examination in the Indian country of these claims has been altogether a one-sided affair. Indians have passed upon them and said whether they were guilty of the depredations or not, and the citizen has had to rely upon such proof as he could get up in different places to show the spoliations committed on him and get that before the Indian agency and the Department; and in many an agency gross injustice has been done in regard to these claims. Nevertheless the claims have been reported to Congress, whether approved or rejected; and it is within the power of Congress to refer these rejected claims to the Committee on Indian Affairs, that they may be examined into; and where there is evidence that would justify or warrant a reversal of the decision of the Secretary of the Interior the Committee on Indian Affairs would be fully justified in reversing that decision and recommending Congress to pay the claims.

I think the amendment proposed by the committee is a judicious one, and that it should not go further than it does. These claims alluded to have already been adjudicated, and it is meting out now tardy justice to men that have suffered from these depredations. This brings them prominently before Congress, and will perhaps insure speedy action upon them. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I want to make one further observation. It will not be understood that I oppose the amendment at all. I simply desired to understand fully the purport of it, and to see to it that these claims which have been adjudicated unfavorably by the Interior Department were not excluded from relief by Congress if additional evidence should be obtained showing that they were just. I am in full accord with the object and purport of this amendment; but I say it is an unwise policy for us in passing upon these claims to adjudicate in favor of A and reject B, where the one may be as meritorious as the other.

A high public policy, a wise public policy, would dictate that these Indians who demand on all occasions, in season and out of season, that the Government shall be just to them, should be compelled promptly to give back to the citizens upon whom they commit depredations an ample consideration for such depredations as they commit. If Congress will provide for this the tendency of that kind of legislation will be to suppress these depredations and bring about peace and order upon the border. Therefore I am in full accord with the amendment, and only desire to see to it that, by the amendment, these claims which were favorably adjudicated before the Secretary of the Interior are not excluded from future consideration by Congress.

The question being taken, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Support of Indians at Fort Peck agency: For this amount, to be expended in such goods, provisions, and other useful articles as the President may, from time to time, determine, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in providing employés, educating children, procuring medicine and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, $90,000.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] in charge of this bill whether it is not the fact that we have been obliged to make a deficiency appropriation for the last year for these Indians at the Fort Peck agency.

Mr. ELLIS. We have, sir.

Mr. CHACE. And are not the circumstances this year the same as they were last?

Mr. ELLIS. No.

Mr. CHACE. I am informed that they are.

Mr. ELLIS. At this time last year those Indians were dying of starvation. To-day they have plenty of rations, and the Department has ordered their rations to be exhausted by the 21st day of March. The bill has taken into consideration the deficiency, and reported the appropriation of last year and $3,000 additional.

Mr. CHACE. I do not so understand it. I understand that you are $10,000 short.

Mr. ELLIS. No; $53,000 long.

Mr. CHACE. The appropriation is $10,000 short on the very basis stated by the gentleman from Louisiana himself, as I understand it.

Mr. ELLIS. That is not all for these particular Indians. There are three other agencies in Montana.

Mr. MAGINNIS. There are four agencies included there.

Mr. CHACE. I understand that; but there was a deficiency last year.

Mr. ELLIS. There was a deficiency for the current year of $10,000. It was a deficiency which would exist after March. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has taken the appropriation and has ordered the supplies to be exhausted on the 21st of March, and reported what was necessary ($50,000) to carry them to the 30th of June.

Mr. CHACE. But you do not give him that sum by $10,000.

Mr. ELLIS. The deficiency of which the gentleman from Rhode Island speaks did not apply simply to these particular Indians but to the three other agencies also; this is only one of four agencies in Montana.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I think the gentleman from Rhode Island will find that this is right, except that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs ought to take some means to remove these Indians to the Standing Rock agency and incorporate them with the rest of the Sioux. They have no business at this isolated agency. They were gathered up there under the fraudulent administration of affairs which existed in 1872, and the proper way to deal with them is to let them go where they want to go, and join their relations of the other Sioux tribes.

Mr. ELLIS. I certainly should have no objection to that; but no such recommendation has reached us from the Department.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I suppose not; nor is such a recommendation likely to be made so long as the Department relies upon an agent whose salary depends on the existence of that agency.

Mr. ELLIS. If the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] will offer a proper amendment, we will not regard the recommendation of the Department, but will do what is right as to these Indians.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that these are the four tribes of Indians that have been alluded to here by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], and it seems that the appropriation is less than the estimates recommended by the Department. I rise now for the purpose of making a statement in relation to this matter. Upon page 947 of the RECORD I find in the remarks made by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] the other day certain language which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Notwithstanding these facts, a certain gentleman connected with the "Indian rights" department has seen fit to write me an open letter, and has seen fit to let loose upon my devoted head the anathemas of the press East and North—one Mr. C. C. Painter, I believe, a member of the Indian Rights Association, one of those self-constituted friends of the Indians, coming here by what credentials I do not know, appearing frequently before the committee and urging us to discharge our duty.

In the letter of Painter, which was published in the New York Tribune, appear the grossest misrepresentation and statements, which he should have known were utterly and infamously false. I desire now, sir, to place on record here the full history of this matter in order that that gentleman, who is represented to be a minister of the gospel, may either inform himself properly before he undertakes to write a public letter to anybody, or else that he may refresh his memory with the story of Ananias.

Now in the letter here referred to, which was an open letter to the gentleman from Louisiana, which appeared in the New York Tribune on the 5th of January, there were certain statements showing that these appropriations were less than the estimates, and as the gentleman from Louisiana has characterized unfavorably the writer of this letter, who is the representative of the Indian Rights Association, one of the noblest associations of this country, established in Philadelphia and having a branch association in the capital city of the Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent—I would like to hear the gentleman from Louisiana tell the House what statements in this open letter written to him in relation to the appropriations for these Indians are false. The gentleman has characterized the writer of this letter, a constituent of mine, as making statements that are unqualifiedly false, and I should like to hear him specify those statements.

This gentleman, a constituent of mine, whose statements the gentleman from Louisiana has characterized as false, is a man well-known in the district I have the honor to represent, a man who has been selected for the position he occupies on account of previous meritorious service, a man whose record is unstained, whose integrity has never been impeached. I call on the gentleman from Louisiana to submit on this floor any evidence bearing out his assertions, and showing wherein the statements contained in this letter are wrong.

The gentleman from Louisiana also, in the speech from which I have quoted, made a statement in reference to the appropriations made during the last few years for the Indians. This statement he submits as a defense against this open letter, and winds up by showing that on the 6th of January, in this House, a contingency resolution was introduced giving $50,000 more on account of certain starving Indians who are included in the four classes I have mentioned. Then the gentleman goes on to state that in spite of these circumstances Mr. Painter writes this open letter to him.

Now, I wish to make the point here that this open letter appeared in the New York Tribune of January 5; and I ask the gentleman whether it is not the fact that this resolution to which he refers as vindicating the conduct of the committee against the attacks made in this open letter was presented here on the day after this letter had appeared in the New York Tribune, and whether he did not know at the time the resolution was passed that this letter had been published.

Mr. ELLIS. I have not seen any letter yet. I have seen only editorial comments, from which I gathered my information as to the character of the letter and the assertions made therein. Has the gentleman the letter?

Mr. ROCKWELL. I have the letter.

Mr. ELLIS. Will you oblige me by giving it to me?

Mr. ROCKWELL. Certainly I will, first asking to have it printed as part of my remarks. If the gentleman will allow me further——

Mr. ELLIS. Then, Mr. Chairman, when I take the floor, after having moved the previous question on this bill, if I do not brand "falsehood" on C. C. Painter's brow I will make an elaborate apology to him. I object to the printing of that letter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move to amend by striking out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROCKWELL].

Mr. ROCKWELL. I understand the gentleman from Louisiana has objected to the printing of this letter.

Mr. ELLIS. I do.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I suppose I have the right, Mr Chairman, to read it as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that right in his five minutes.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I have five minutes, then, in which to read the letter, and I bring up this matter not alone because I believe that this constituent of mine has been falsely accused in this matter, but also because I think it brings home to all of us the fact so well illustrated in the life of that great statesman of Kentucky, Henry Clay—and illustrated to-day in the conduct of another great statesman of Kentucky who presides over the deliberations of this body—that "whenever business of whatever nature is to be transacted in a deliberative assembly or in private life, courtesy, forbearance, and moderation are best calculated to bring it to a successful conclusion."

Mr. ROCKWELL proceeded to read the letter, as published later in the proceedings, but was interrupted by,

Mr. ELLIS, who said: Is the gentleman proceeding under unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has five minutes yielded to him by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] on a pro forma motion.

Mr. ROCKWELL continued the reading until the expiration of his five minutes.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, what is pending?

The CHAIRMAN. A pro forma amendment moved by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE]. Does the gentleman insist on that amendment?

Mr. HISCOCK. Is debate on the amendment exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I renew it, and yield my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROCKWELL].

Mr. ROCKWELL continued the reading of the letter.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after the five minutes of the gentleman from Massachusetts have expired.

Mr. ROCKWELL continued the reading of the letter until its conclusion.

The letter is as follows:

RESPONSIBILITY FOR STARVATION AMONG THE PIEGANS.

[An open letter to Mr. ELLIS from Professor Painter.]

GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS., December 24, 1884.

SIR: My surprise and astonishment were so great the other morning because of your sudden change of purpose regarding the "deficiency estimate" for the relief of certain Montana Indians, that I could not in the brief time allowed me answer your questions. You had only the evening before repeated to me the explicit promise made by you and Mr. RYAN to the committee of the Indian Rights Association, on the 12th instant, that you would, just as soon as the estimate reached your committee, introduce and secure the passage of a joint resolution appropriating the sum asked for.

You were informed in the letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, which accompanied this estimate, and which was referred with it to your committee, that the agent at the Blackfeet agency had been instructed by the Department to exhaust his supplies by the 31st of March, and that unless supplies to meet the deficiency were sent in by the 15th of January, that it would be all but impossible to get them in through that country in time to prevent starvation.

Certainly nothing contained in this letter was calculated to lessen the urgency of the action which was sought from you, and which you had so explicitly promised.

I fear that no importunity can now secure action in this matter which will save these poor people from extreme suffering, and it is not with the hope of averting this, but with the purpose rather of locating responsibility for it, that I proceed to answer your questions: (1) How did it happen that there was such suffering among them; and (2) what has become of the money ($100,000) appropriated last winter for their relief?

1. It appears that the Department asked for the support of these Indians (food and clothing), for the year ending June 30, 1884, the sum of $260,000, and that Congress, at the suggestion of your committee, gave $176,000, being $84,000 less than the Department deemed necessary. It may be well to say in this connection that the sum asked for was based upon the expectation that game would be as abundant as in years past, which proved a mistake, as none was to be found.

The deficiency created by the action of your committee was $84,000; the utter failure of all crops by reason of frost, drought, &c., and the entire absence of game, threatened this people with absolute starvation. Senator VEST and Delegate MAGINNIS reported this condition of things at the very opening of the last session of Congress. The President called the attention of Congress to the facts as communicated to him by the Secretary of the Interior, who asked for $138,000 to meet the emergency. Special Inspector Howard appeared before your committee and informed you of what he had just seen among these people, and you introduced a joint resolution the next day appropriating $50,000 to this purpose. The Senate amended this and appropriated $100,000. If you are doubtful as to your responsibility for the non-concurrence of the House in this amendment, I will respectfully refer you to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 1, 1884, pages 823 and 824. Mr. MAGINNIS related what he had seen and heard in a personal visit to these people a few months previous, and was sure that at least $100,000 was both needed and asked for. Mr. CHACE was confident that the Department had asked for $138,000.

Your assertion, made with great positiveness, and reiterated, that your committee had given every dollar that had been asked for by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, caused the House to reject the Senate amendment, and a delay ensued before you were forced to correct a mistake which was fatal to many poor starving Indians; and so, after a delay of two months after it was informed of the facts, Congress appropriated about three-fourths of the sum asked for.

That this was not sufficient appears from a mild statement in the last report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who says: "There is little doubt that many deaths among them (these Montana Indians) were the direct result of lack of food."

During a recent visit to the Blackfeet agency the agent informed me that he issued during the spring and early summer from four to six burial boxes per day for some time, and that no money would induce him to witness again the scenes through which he had passed during those fearful months.

It was estimated that four hundred of the Indians of that agency, which numbered not more than twenty-four hundred or twenty-six hundred, died from want of food.

At Fort Belknap the suffering would have been just as great but for the fact that it is near a large military post, and that the men brought their wives and daughters—even little girls—and prostituted them to the whites for money with which to purchase food.

This, I agree with you, is "an infamy," one for which, as chairman of the Subcommittee of Appropriations for Indian Affairs, who cut down estimates, who delayed action, and who has now deliberately refused to report a resolution appropriating for the deficiency for this year, the country will hold you responsible.

The answer to your second question is not hard to find. Divide the sum of money appropriated to feed and clothe these people, 14,000 of them in round numbers, and you will have for this purpose about 3½ cents per diem per capita; a sum which might be used honestly for such a purpose without raising such strong suspicions that it had been wasted that you are forced, as a prudent public officer, intrusted with grave responsibilities, to thrust aside with contempt the estimate of the Interior Department and the urgent cry that there will be another "infamy" unless you act at once, and say you must know how this has been expended before you will ask for any more.

For the year ending June 30, 1885, the Department asked for these same Indians, for food and clothing, $275,000. Acting under your advice Congress has appropriated $243,000. That is $32,000 less than the needed sum.

You have before you the facts that $50,000 is needed to prevent the infamy of starvation again; that the supplies at one agency will be exhausted on the 1st of April next, and that the supplies must be sent in by the middle of January. Your promise to the committee, composed of General Armstrong, Messrs. Biddle, Welsh, and Frazer, of Philadelphia, was explicit that you would act upon these facts as soon as they reached your committee; but this, the next morning after they did reach you, you flatly refused to do until you had satisfactory answers to your questions.

These I have attempted to answer, whether satisfactory or not I can not say, but with facts from the official record.

Your argument that you had given money for irrigating-ditches, and that these people ought to do something to support themselves, is fully met by the fact that this bill was not approved until the 4th of July last, and consequently practical relief for those whom it was designed to aid could not be derived in so short a time. Your remark that "the Indian seems to have too many friends about here" betrays, I fear, the animus by which you are controlled. As all known methods for securing relief for these Indians from your committee have been exhausted, I am forced to appeal to our citizens at large, who, I am confident, do not desire either that these people shall starve or be forced to prostitution to save themselves from such a fate; and so I send these answers to your questions to the country at large.

Yours, &c.,
C. C. PAINTER.

To Hon. E. JOHN ELLIS,
Chairman of Subcommittee Indian Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Now, the argument used by the gentleman from Louisiana——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ELLIS. Let the gentleman finish his speech.

Mr. PARKER. If the gentleman from New York will withdraw his pro forma amendment, I will renew it and give my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HISCOCK. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. PARKER. I renew it, and will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ELLIS. Let the gentleman finish his speech.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, the argument used by the gentleman from Louisiana, made in these statements—I refer now to the speech he made January 6, when he introduced the resolution for $50,000 for the temporary support of some of these Indians, the day after this letter was published in the New York Tribune——

Mr. ELLIS. I did not know such a letter had been written. I told Mr. Painter I could discharge my duty without further suggestions from him. I did not know of the existence of such a letter.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the speech made by the gentleman from Louisiana the day after this letter had been published in the New York Tribune (I am sorry the gentleman did not see it; it was a short speech)—I allude also to the speech to be found on the page of the RECORD which I have indicated, January 21—in that he seems to hold up these arguments: These appropriations were made smaller for two reasons, first, because it appeared to be the settled policy of some one to cut down appropriations; and, secondly, because game was plenty and abundant. These appropriations were cut down for that purpose and for that reason.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana whether as a matter of fact the Department did not take into consideration that very fact—whether the Department did not take into consideration that very fact that there was game there in abundance when they made their estimates and cut down the appropriations; and why, when that is so, is it necessary for the committee further to cut down the estimates on the same ground? Was not that the same argument the gentleman from Louisiana made in his speech delivered on this floor on the 6th of January? These statements that he has since made, and to which I have alluded in the RECORD, as attacking the character and integrity of this honest man, this representative of the Indian Rights Association of America, if he had made them on that day I should then and there have corrected him, for I was upon the floor and heard him as he introduced the resolution.

But, sir, he has not made this representation in reference to the character of this gentleman in haste or anger after reading the letter, but he waits from the 6th of January, when he makes his first speech, until the 20th of January, when he makes his next speech. If he had left out the reflection on this gentleman's character and integrity I should not now take the floor to defend my constituent. But, sir, from long acquaintance with the man assailed, I desire to place on the public records of this country in a spot where the record will be imperishable, and not merely in newspapers, which are evanescent, and which are forgotten and perhaps go into the waste-basket, my estimate of this gentleman, whom I have known for years, and who, although I am sorry he is so unfortunate as to have a controversy with the gentleman from Louisiana, I feel bound from my acquaintance not only with him but from knowledge of the character for ability he has won for himself in the community in which we both live to state that he is an honest man, that he is a Christian gentleman, and that the aspersions of the gentleman from Louisiana are not merited. I believe upon further consideration of the matter, whatever may be the facts in dispute in this case, the first man in this House to regret the attack upon this honest man will be the gentleman from Louisiana himself. [Applause.]

Mr. CHACE. Unless the gentleman from Louisiana wishes to reply I will go on. I believe if the gentleman will carefully revise this matter and look it over he will withdraw his offensive remarks in regard to this gentleman.

Mr. ELLIS. Not if my present impressions are correct; but I will intensify them.

Mr. CHACE. I desire to call the attention of the House to two or three pregnant facts in connection with this matter. In the first place, whose money is this we are appropriating? It is not our money we are appropriating. This money belongs to the Indians. The Government of the United States have in their Treasury $5,000,000 long since overdue. We have here four tribes of Montana Indians, who year after year have died from starvation because of the outrageous wrong of the people of this country. They have been removed from the lands which belonged to them under solemn obligation from the people of this country to pay them an annuity, which has not been paid.

The Department brings in estimates of the amount necessary for their support. Year after year we cut these estimates down and leave these Indians to perish of starvation. Now, again we are asked to make another cut of the estimates. The question arises, sir, are we innocent of the blood of these people? I hope gentlemen will join me in voting for an amendment to this bill that I shall now offer: to insert in line 971 the sum of $100,000, instead of $90,000 as proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

The estimates for these four tribes amount to $467,000. The Committee have appropriated $412,000, a reduction of nearly $15,000 to each tribe. It is a wrong to these Indians which we can not afford to perpetrate any more.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York withdraw the pro forma amendment?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support, civilization, and instruction of the Shoshones——

Mr. MAGINNIS. I want to submit a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Chairman, I have already offered an amendment to the preceding paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not aware that the gentleman from Rhode Island had offered an amendment.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I hope the gentleman from Rhode Island will permit me to go on now in this connection for a few moments.

Mr. CHACE. I will wait, of course, until the gentleman from Montana has concluded, and then press the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I would like to call the attention of the Committee, as this question has arisen, to the history of this Fort Peck agency and the real responsibility in regard to the starvation of these Indians. There was at the time this began a number of Indians collected at the Fort Peck agency under the administration of Columbus Delano, by an Indian agent out of the remnants of several Sioux tribes. This House appropriated, I think, about $850,000 for their support the first year.

Mr. CHACE. To what year does the gentleman refer?

Mr. MAGINNIS. To 1872 or 1873. I do not exactly remember which year, but about that time.

Mr. CHACE. I thought the gentleman was referring to the present year.

Mr. MAGINNIS. No, sir.

About $50,000 of that appropriation was given to the Indians and the $800,000 was divided up among the boys. [Laughter and applause.] The Indian ring, since broken up, at that time was in full fling in this country. They used to meet in the parlors of a hotel in New York and divide the dividends arising from the Indian appropriations as regularly as the board of directors of a prosperous railroad company might meet and divide the surplus and profits of their business.

Mr. CHACE. The gentleman does not pretend to say that there is any such thing in existence at this time?

Mr. MAGINNIS. No, sir; I am not saying anything of the kind.

Mr. CHACE. Nor has there been since the organization of the present board of Indian inspectors.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I am not making such complaint at present. I am speaking of the origin of this thing. I want to show how the reduction came to be made.

At this time steamboats used to go up the Missouri River lightly loaded with supplies for the mythical Indians who were supposed to be in that vicinity. They required no assistance to get up the river. But when they came back—when they came down the river again—every appliance necessary in navigation was required to carry them safely over the bars, so heavily laden were they with vouchers. [Laughter.] This is the agency at which it is familiarly understood they used to drive the cattle around the corral three or four times, counting them each time, and finally ran them off and sold them to the white men. [Laughter.] It was here that ten sacks of sugar were delivered and the voucher was raised to a hundred or a thousand sacks.

These facts, Mr. Chairman, were made known by another eminent gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Walsh.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Welsh.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Yes, Mr. Welsh; but for a long time we were unable to break that practice down. Mr. Orville Grant, since deceased, obtained a tradership at that agency, and there were some very warm debates in this House in regard to his connection with it. Finally, our late lamented President, Mr. Garfield, and the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], knowing these facts, cut down the appropriation of $500,000 to a reasonable amount for the sustenance of the Fort Peck Indians. And, by the way, let me say in this connection these Indians should not be at Fort Peck at all, but should be with the remainder of the Dakota tribe.

In relation to the suffering of the Piegans, the Blackfeet, and the Blood Indians, the direct responsibility rests with the Indian Department. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] will bear me out in this statement, that the amounts under the treaty were denied to these tribes for many years; and it was by the kindness and generosity of the gentleman from Louisiana himself, who investigated the subject, that we restored the appropriation to what it should be; and he and I were both grateful to Mr. ELLIS, I think, in the last Congress for his connection with this matter.

Mr. CHACE. I wish to be as gracious to the gentleman from Louisiana as it is possible to be; but I have a distinct recollection of having a year ago hard work to get an appropriation raised from $50,000 to $138,000.

Mr. MAGINNIS. If the gentleman from Rhode Island will look back at the Indian appropriation bills for the last ten or twelve years——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. REAGAN was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. MAGINNIS.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Now, if the gentleman will look back at the Indian appropriation bills for the last twelve years or the last ten years, he will find the appropriations for the Piegans, the Bloods, and the Blackfeet have ranged from $25,000 to $35,000, having been cut down from $50,000.

Mr. CHACE. The appropriation has averaged less than $25,000, when we owe them under treaty stipulations an annuity of $50,000.

Mr. MAGINNIS. But, as I said before, the Indian Department, through its inefficiency, is responsible for this whole matter.

Mr. CHACE. Is it responsible for the non-fulfillment of the treaty?

Mr. MAGINNIS. No, sir. Will the gentleman just listen to me? Those Indians occupy an immense area of country. I hold in my hand the report of Senator DAWES, including the report of a subcommittee made by Senator VEST and myself. Some years ago we went to that country. We made arrangements with the Indians. They said, "This land is no longer of any use to us; when you gave it to us you gave it for a hunting country; it was then a great buffalo country and we did not need your supplies then. Now the game is all gone; we want to surrender this country; we do not want it."

Mr. CHACE. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman; but is he not putting that in a somewhat erroneous light? Did not the first proposition come from our side for them to surrender that reservation?

Mr. MAGINNIS. No, sir.

Mr. CHACE. And did not the Government make a treaty with these Indians by which they undertook to pay them that annuity?

Mr. MAGINNIS. The gentleman from Rhode Island is wrong. He is going back too far. I am speaking of recent events. They proposed to surrender all the unnecessary portions of that reservation from which the game was gone and from which they derived no benefit. And four years ago I introduced into this House a bill to provide for those Northern Indians, and Senator VEST introduced into the Senate a similar bill to provide for them, which gave them the amount they wanted, which gave them ample appropriations, which provided that homes should be built for them, which provided they should receive cattle, schools, &c. And that bill has failed to pass this House and has failed to pass the Senate, simply because the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has been unable to make up his mind about it, although the Secretary of the Interior has recommended it, he being a Western man and knowing a great deal more about it than the Commissioner, who is a good, honest man; and if he had recommended that bill, if he had indorsed it and approved it, it would have gone through this House three years ago. It would have passed last winter but for him, and a remedy would have been provided, instead of those Indians suffering every year and starving. But this thing is to be repeated this year and next year and next year till a final settlement is made. If the Commissioner would not take the recommendation of the Senator from Missouri and myself he should have sent out some other men, some of his own men; but the officers of the Indian Department have simply rested on their oars and done nothing, and are, therefore, unable to give the House an opinion upon which the House can act; and, therefore, the House has taken no action. I hold all the suffering that has fallen upon those Indians to be directly traceable to the inefficiency of the Indian Department.

Mr. CHACE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Montana two or three questions. If I understand him he admits on our motion——

Mr. MAGINNIS. On whose motion?

Mr. CHACE. The motion of the United States Government, a treaty was made with these tribes by which they surrendered their reservation and we agreed to pay them an annuity of $50,000.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That was by the treaty of 1868.

Mr. CHACE. And the gentleman admits that they ratified the treaty, and we did not ratify it, but took possession of their reservation?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. We moved them on a reservation where there was no game, and we failed to pay the annuity.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That was the failure of preceding Congresses.

Mr. CHACE. Are not those the facts?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Exactly, but you can not blame the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] for the policy inaugurated by Mr. Garfield.

Mr. CHACE. I blame nobody. I will take my own share of responsibility until I have discharged my duty in protesting against a recurrence of this thing.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I agree very much with the gentleman from Rhode Island in what he has said. He has said this before.

Mr. CHACE. And I would like to have it emphasized. The gentleman has just said that this starvation of these Indians has been brought about by a wrong and outrage committed upon them. It has recurred over and over again, and is likely to recur again another year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], which had escaped the attention of the Chair.

Mr. ELLIS. Does the gentleman from Rhode Island wish to support his amendment?

Mr. CHACE. I do.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 971 strike out "ninety" and insert "one hundred;" making it read: "To promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, one hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. CHACE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to plead with this House to depart in this instance from the usual custom and to remember that this is not our money that we are appropriating. It is money that belongs to these Indians. It is their money; they have a right to it. And, in reply to some remarks made by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS], which, although he may not have intended it certainly do detract somewhat from the force of my amendment, I desire to say that since the time to which he has alluded the board of Indian inspectors has been appointed, composed of gentlemen of the very highest character—Christian gentlemen who have nothing whatever to do with the objectionable transactions to which he has alluded here, except to exercise their influence to correct them.

Mr. MAGINNIS. If the gentleman from Rhode Island understood me to charge the existence of fraudulent practices under the present administration, I wish to correct him, because I did not intend to make any such charge or intimation.

Mr. CHACE. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say so.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from Montana did not make any such charge.

Mr. COSGROVE. I understand the gentleman from Rhode Island to say that this is not the money of the United States that we are called upon to appropriate, but that it is the money of the Indians. I should like to hear him explain how it came to be their money.

Mr. CHACE. It became their money by the solemn obligation of the United States to the Indians under a treaty when we took their lands. There are $5,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States, all of which belong to the Indians.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman from Rhode Island refer us to the treaty?

Mr. CHACE. Certainly; there is no difficulty about it.

Mr. ELLIS. I want the treaty and the article.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The gentleman from Rhode Island is mistaken. We never had a treaty with these Fort Peck Indians. He refers to the Blackfeet and Bloods and Piegans.

Mr. RYAN. This is not the money of these Indians. It is simply a gratuity and does not come out of the tribal fund at all.

Mr. CHACE. If gentlemen will give me time, I will look for the treaty to which I have referred. I may be wrong, but I will look and see. In the mean time I would like to have this amendment passed over for a few moments.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to participate in the discussion of this bill, but I simply rise to say that it would be very interesting to me, and I have no doubt to the American people generally, if somebody would find out a way by which the Indians, like other people, could be made to work for their living. We have millions of poor people in the United States, many of them quite as poor as these Indians, but we do not appropriate money to support them in idleness, to feed and clothe them off the labor of other people; and it has always been a curious fact to me that we have gone on year after year appropriating large sums of money to feed an idle, lazy, vagabond set of Indians and have never been able to find any way to put them to work for their living. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] asks unanimous consent to pass over the paragraph now under consideration until the bill has been read through. Has the Chair correctly stated the request of the gentleman?

Mr. CHACE. Yes.

Mr. ELLIS. I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak to that amendment. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] will search in vain for any treaty which gives these Indians a title to this money. It is simply a gratuity on the part of the United States. Now, sir, I believe that no living mortal should starve or want, especially the Indians, occupying the relation they do to the United States; but I believe that we have given them enough here. There is even-handed justice required in this matter—justice to the people whose money we are appropriating, justice to the Indian who has been made dependent by our civilization. Our civilized agencies have driven away from him or destroyed the game on which he lived; the Government of the United States, by a policy which I am unable to fathom, permitted the cattle of the Indians, their natural cattle—the buffalo—to be slaughtered for the sport of English gentlemen, for the sport of gentlemen from New York, of gentlemen from Boston, of gentlemen from Chicago and from New Orleans, and from every other city from which they chose to go out to slaughter for the mere love of slaughter.

Our girdle of civilization has been extending all the time, and the result of all this is that the Indian is deprived of his natural food. I do not agree with my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. I think the United States Government should see to it that these Indians do work; but until they are located upon a reservation which will reward their toil with abundant crops, I believe that we are bound to see that they do not suffer. At the same time we should take care that the money of the people is not recklessly expended. Now, what have we done? In the last session of the Forty-seventh Congress this last year we gave these Indians $243,000. That appropriation gave out, and the present Congress was called upon for a deficiency appropriation, first of $50,000, and afterward of $50,000 more.

Mr. CHACE. To what Indians does the gentleman now refer?

Mr. ELLIS. The Montana Indians—the four agencies in Montana. So that the total amount appropriated for the last session of the Forty-seventh Congress, supplemented by the deficiency appropriation at the first session of this Congress, made the total sum $343,000.

Mr. Chairman, I thought the Department ought to know its business, that it ought to know what these Indians needed. I did not believe the Department would come and present a deficiency that would not cover every supply. It presented first a deficiency of $50,000; that was given by the House. Afterward this was increased in the Senate by adding a deficiency which I never saw until it came from the Senate, making the deficiency appropriation $100,000. This made the aggregate amount $343,000. With the preparation of that bill I had nothing to do.

Mr. CHACE rose.

Mr. ELLIS. If the gentleman will only be still, I think he will learn something. When I came to prepare this bill, anxious to do justice to these people, I estimated the appropriation upon the basis of the appropriation made last year, plus the deficiency; and then I "went $3,000 better" than that. So that we gave $296,000, which, supplemented by the deficiency, makes $346,000, or $3,000 over and above the appropriations of last year, plus the deficiency.

I thought this would be sufficient. I knew that appropriations were made for irrigating the lands of these people and to assist them in agricultural pursuits. We thought they would raise something of a crop. The policy is in the direction of the position taken by my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. The policy is not to support these people in idleness, but merely to maintain them until they can become self-supporting. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the way to do that is not to fill them with everything good and maintain them in idleness. If you intend to make these people self-supporting you must teach them that there will come a time when the fostering hand of the Government will be withdrawn and they will be compelled to look to themselves. This has been the policy of the Committee on Appropriations and of Congress in gradually cutting down the provisions for the support of the Indians, furnishing them with stock and agricultural implements, with farmers to teach them how to work, and with industrial schools, in order that the time may come when Government support can be entirely withdrawn.

Now, we have given to these people, to the Montana tribes at the agency now in question, where the gentleman wishes to give $10,000 more, a proper proportion of the increased appropriations contained in this bill, which, as I have said, amount to $3,000 more than the appropriations made last year, plus the deficiency. I believe this is enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I have listened to this discussion with profound interest. I think it is very profitable. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] who spoke in the general debate on this bill, from his large experience and from that relation which he of all men in this House or perhaps in the country has been able to establish with the Indians, because he has kept the faith with them, laid down a policy which is concurred in, I believe, by every friend of the red man. I had not the pleasure of hearing the gentleman's remarks; but while reading them in the RECORD with great satisfaction and entire approbation, I received from one of the truest friends of the Indian that this country has produced a letter so touching, so full of sympathy and wisdom, and asking from the President-elect a boon so desirable to be granted, that I communed with myself as to how I could best give effect to the writer's wishes. The sainted man who wrote this letter without any idea that it would be published, a good bishop of the church to which I profess allegiance, is now prostrated with disease in a far-off land. After a lifetime devoted to missionary work in the far West his last prayer as it were comes as an invitation to this House to do justice, as it is striving to do, to the red man. I trust I do not violate that sacred character which belongs to private communications when I take the liberty of reading to the House this letter from Bishop Whipple. I do this only because I believe that I shall thus best secure the object so dear to his heart. For I have reason to believe that the President-elect reads the RECORD, and I venture to hope that this letter will make such an impression upon his memory that the Indian Bureau will be confided to the management of some experienced and trusted friend of these wards of the nation:

HOTEL DES ANGLAIS, MENTONE, FRANCE,
January 4, 1885.

HONORABLE AND DEAR SIR: I have not the privilege of knowing the President-elect. You know how many years I have labored for the poor Indians. I have given them all a man could give—my time, my means, and my heart. When I began my efforts for them, our Indian affairs were at the darkest. My best friends said it was hopeless. I carried it to that One who always hears every cry of a burdened heart, and I resolved, God being my helper, I never would turn my back on the heathen at my door. I have tried to keep the vow. The Indian system has not been reformed; but the difference in its administration is as day to midnight. Instead of establishing almshouses to graduate savage paupers, the Government encourages labor, provides schools, employs Indians at wages, and the whole drift is toward Christian civilization. There are many abuses to be reformed, and dishonesties to be stopped, but the general administration is just. In the absence of a well-defined system of government, with personal rights of property, the success or failure of the Indian Bureau depends wholly on its head. I know your pity for this poor race. Will you not ask the President-elect to be doubly careful in the selection of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs? No appointment in his gift can bring him and his party greater honor, and none cause him, if unworthy, so much shame and disgrace.

I am here an invalid. You will pardon my request.

Your friend,
H. B. WHIPPLE,
Bishop of Minnesota.

Hon. ABRAM S. HEWITT.

Stricken with sickness and possibly dying on the shores of the Mediterranean, far away from the children of the forest whom he has loved so well and for whom he has done so much, his heart goes back into the frozen regions of Minnesota and the prayer which he utters to that Almighty One who is the God of justice will, I trust, be heard through His servant who is chosen to administer the government and to execute the wise provisions of this bill, so carefully matured by the committee.

The question recurred on Mr. CHACE'S amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of the Modoc Indians now residing within the Indian Territory, $5,000.

Mr. JAMES. I wish to amend by adding at the end of line 994 an appropriation for the Navajo Indians, left out by mistake. They have money in the Treasury, and there is no appropriation for them. I move the following.
